HE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTY

PRINCE, IAMES, BY THE Grace of God, King of England, Scotland,

France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

N this generall joy of affectionate and loyall subjects, testified by their frequent confluence from all parts, longing for nothing so much as the full fruition of that beautiful starre, which lately upon the shutting in of the evening with us after our long Summers day, immediatly by his radiant beames mainteined still a twilight from the North , and within some few houres appeared bright shining above our Horizon, suffering neither the dark night and confused Chaos of Anarchie to overspred and survert, nor the turbulent tempests and bloudy broiles of factious sidings to trouble and pervert our State: I also, for my part could not flay behinde, but in testimony of semblable love and allegeance shew my selfe; and withall, most humbly present unto your Highneffe, This Philosophie of PLUTARCH: which being first naturally bred in Greece; then, transplanted in Italie, France and other regions of the continent; after fundry $\mathcal N$ attivities, if Imay so speake, reserved (not without some divine providence) unto these daies, is now in this our Iland newly come to light; ready both to congratulate your Majesties first entrie upon the inheritance of these Kingdomes, and destrous also to enjoy the benefit of that happy Horoscope and fortunate Ascendent, under which it was borne; even the favourable aspect of your gracious countenance: by vertue whereof, it may not onely be marked to long life, feeble otherwise of it selfe, but also yeeld pleasure with profit to the English nation.

Vouchsafe therefore, my deere Lord and dread Soveraine, to accept accept that now at my hands, whole & entire, which in part Trajanus the best Romaine Emperour that ever was, received sometime from the first Authour and Stock-sather himselse: Protect the same in English habit, whom in French attire Amiot dedicated to the late most Christian King: and deigne unto ber no lesse favour and grace, than her yoonger sister, to wit, the History or Parallele Lives, hath already obtained: which being transported out of France into England by that woorthy Knight Sir Thomas North our countryman, was patronized by our late Soveraigne Lady of samous memory Elizabet. And the rather, for that considering the prerogative of birth-right, and the same accompanied with more variety and depth of knowledge, I may be bold to pronounce as much in her commendation, as the Poet wrote of Iupiter in comparison of his brother Neptune:

Homer.

These regards, albeit they were sufficient motives in themselves to induce me, for to attempt none other patronage than the Name of my Liege Lord so gracious; nor to submit my labours to the censure of any person, before a King so judicious: yet was I more animated to enterprise the same, by the former experience that I had of a Princes benignity in that behalfe: what time as I confecrated my English Translation of the Romane Historie written by Titus Livius, unto the immortall memory of the said Noble and renowmed Queene. Now, seeing that with her Realmes and Dominions, the best parts and gifts that were in her, be likewise hæreditarily descended upon your roiall person, and the same multiplied in greater measure, proportionable to the dignity of sex, the addition of scepters and diademes, and the weighty charge of so puissant and populous an Empire; it were in me a grosse absurdity, if not meere impiety, to make any doubt of that excellent vertue of all others, whereby Princes come neerest unto the Nature of God, whose Majesty heere upon earth they represent. To say nothing, how the world hath taken knowledge already, as well by your vertuous life and politicke regiment hitherto, as also by the prudent and religious designements delivered in those sage and learned Compositions of Alexandi, said mighty Monarch; in virus, 38 minus inst.

Since then both these attributes concurre in your Noble person, just cause have we, in all devout thankefulnesse to acknowledge the goodnesse of the Almighty, who from heaven above hath sent us so wise a Prince, under whose reigne we (if ever any Nation under the Sunne) may assuredly expect that felicity and happinesse, which the divine Philosopher Plato so much recommendeth: and in due Derepter reverence unto your Majesty, with one heart and voice, both sing and say:

OF THE NOVRITVRE AND EDVCATION OF CHILDREN.

The Summarie.

He very title of this Treatsfe discoveresh sufficiently the intention of the authour 3 and whospecure he was that reduced these Morals and mixt works of his into one entire volume, was well advised, and had great reason to range this present Discourse in the sirst and former place: For unlesseous minds be framed unto vertue from our insance, impossible is u that we should performe any a oorthy act so long as we live. Now, albeit

Plutarch (as a meere Pagane) hash bosh in this booke and also in others ensuing, where he treateth of vertues and vices, left out the chiefe and principall thing, to wit, The Law of God and his Tructh, (wherein he was altogether ignorant) yet neverthelesse, bese excellent precepts by him desurered like raies which proceed from the light of nature remaining still in the spirit and soule of man, as well to lease sinners inexcusable, as to show how happie they be, who are guided by the heavenly light of holy scripture; are able to commence action against those, who make prosession in word how they embrace the true and sourceigne Good, but in deed and effect do annihilate, as much as lieth in them, the power and efficacie thereof.

Moreover, in this Treatife he proveth first of all. That the generation of infants ought in no wife 30 to be defamed with the blot either of adulteries or annhenness: Then, he entreth into a discourse of their education : and after he hash showed, that Nature, Reason & Vsage ought to concurre in their instruction, he teacheth how & by whom they should be nurtured, brought up and taught, where he reproveth sharply the slouth ignorance and avarice of some fushers. And the better to desare the excellencie of these benefits, namely, good instruction, knowledge and wertue, which the studie of Philosophia doth promise and teach, he compareth the same with all the greatest goods of the world: and so consequently letteth downe what wices especially they are to sum and avoid, who would be capable of sincere and enables to the same whose the same when the same who would be capable of sincere and enables to the same who would be capable of sincere and enables to the same who would be capable of sincere and enables to the same who would be capable of sincere and enables to the same same and enables of sincere and enables of sincere and enables the same sincere and enables of sincere and e

But before he proceeded h further, hedescribeth and limiteth how farforth children well borne and of goodparentage should be urged and sorced by compulsion; disciphering briefly the praises of morall 40 Philosophie: and concluding withall. That the man is blessed, who is both helpfull to his neighbour as it becommet h, and also good unto himselfe. All these points above rehearsed, when he hath enriched and embelished with similitudes, examples, apoph hegmes, and such like ornaments, he propounded hivers rules pertinent to the Institution of young children: which done, he passed from tender child hood to you blull age, shewing what government there oughs to be of young men: sarre from whom, he banisheth and chiefeth flatterers especially: and for a finallocation discourse to other health and consistent of the kinde behavior of fathers and the good example that they are to give unto the sunto their children.

THE EDVCATION OF CHILDREN.

Orasimuch as we are to consider what may be sayd as touching the education of children free borne and descended from gentle blood. how and by what discipline they may become honest and vertuous, we thall perhaps treat hereof the better, if we begin at their very generation and nativitie. First and formost therefore, I would advise those who defire to be the fathers of such children, as may live ano- 10 ther day in honour and reputation among men, not to match themselves and meddle with light women, common courtifans I meane, or private concubines. For a reproch this is that followeth a man all the dayes of his life, and a thamefull staine which by no meanes can be fetched out, if haply he be not come of a good father or good mother: neither is there any one thing that prefenteth it felfe more readily unto his adversaries, and sooner is in their mouth when they are disposed to checke, taunt and revile, than to twit him with fuch parentage. In which regard, wifely fayd the Poët Euripides:

When as the ground is not well laid at first, for our nativity; With parents fault, men will upbraid both us, and our posterity.

A goodly treasure then have they who are well and honestly borne, when in the confidence and affurance thereof, they may be bold to beare their heads aloft, and speake their minds frankly wherefoever they come : and verily they of all others are to make the greatest account of this bleffing, who with to have faire iffue of their bodies lawfully begotten. Certes, a thing it is that ordinarily daunteth and casteth downe the heart of a man, when he is privie to the basenesse of his birth, and knoweth fome defect, blemish and imperfection by his parents. Most truly therefore, and to the purpose right fitly spake the same Poët:

> The privitie to fathers vice or mothers fault reprochable, Will him debase who otherwise is hautic, stout and commendable.

Whereas contrariwife, they that are knowen to be the children of noble and worthy parents, beare themselves highly, and are full of thomacke and generositie. In which conceit and lostic spirit it is reported, that Diaphantus the some of Themistocles, was woont to say, and that in the hearing of many, That what focuer pleased him, the same also the people of Athens thought well of: for, that which I would have done, quoth he, my mother likewife fayth Yea unto it: what my mothers minde stands to, Themistocles my father will not gainfay it: and looke what likes Themissiocles, the Athenians all are well contented therewith. Where by the way, the magnanimitie, 40 and brave mind of the Lacedemoninas is highly to be praifed, who condemned their king Archidames in a great fine of money, for that he could finde in his heart to espouse a wife of little stature, alledging therewith a good reason: Because, say they, his meaning is to get, not a breed of Kings, but Kinglins, or divers Kings, to reigne over us.

Well, upon this first advertisement concerning children, there dependeth another, which they who wrote before us of the like argument, forgat not to fet downe; and what is that? namely, That they who for procreation of children will come neere unto women, ought to meddle with them, either upon empty flomacks, and before they have drunke any wine at all, or at leastwife, after they have taken their wine in measure, and soberly: for such will proove commonly wine-bibbers and drunkards, who were engendred when their fathers were drunken: according 50 to that which Diogenes fayd upon a time unto a youth whom he saw beside himselfe, and farre overseene with drinke; My ladde, quoth he, thy father gat thee when he was drunke. And thus much may suffice for the generation of children.

Astouching their nourture and education, whereof now I am to discourse: That which we are woont generally to fay of all Arts and Sciences, the fame we may be bolde to pronounce of Education of children.

vertue, to wit, that to the accomplishment thereof, and to make a man perfectly vertuous, three things ought to concurre, Nature, Reason and Vsage, By reason, I understand doctrine and precepts: by ulage, exercise and practise. The first beginnings we have from nature: progresse and proceeding come by teaching and instruction: exercise and practise is performed by diligence: And all three together bring foorth the height of perfection. If any one of these faile, it cannot otherwise be, but that vertue also should have her desect and be maimed: For nature without learning is blind: Doctrine wanting the gift of nature is defectuous; and exercise void of the other twame, imperfect. And verily, it fareth in this case much like as in Husbandrie and tillage of the earth. For first and formest requisite it is, that the ground be good: Secondly, 10 that the Husbandman be skilfull; and in the third place that the feed be cleane and well chosen. Semblaby, Nature refembleth the foile: the Mafter who teacheth, representeth the labouring Husbandman; and last of all, the rules, precepts, admonitions and examples are compared to the feede. All these good meanes (I dare with confidence avouch) met together, and inspired their power into the mindes of these woorthy personages, who throughout the world are so renowmed, Pythagoras I meane, Socrates, Plato, and all the rest who have attained to a memorable name and immortall glorie. Bleffed then is that man and entirely beloved of the gods, whole hap it is by their favor and grace to be furnished with all three. Now if any one be of this opinion, that those who are not endued with the gift of naturall wit, and yet have the helpes of true instruction and diligent exercise to the attaining of vertue, cannot by this meanes recover 20 and repaire the forefaid defect: Knowhe, that he is much deceived, and to fay more truely, quite out of the way: for as idlenesse and negligence doth marre and corrupt the goodnesse of nature: 10, the industrie and diligence of good erudition supplies the defect, and correctes the the default thereof. Idle and flothfull persons (we see) are not able to compasse the things that be easie: whereas contrariwise by studie and travell, the greatest difficulties are atchieved. Moreover, of what efficacie, and execution, diligence and labour is, a man may eafily know by fundrie effects that are daily observed. For we do evidently perceive that drops of water falling upon the hard rocke, doe cate the fame hollow: yron and braffe we fee to we are and confume onely by continual handling: The fellies in chariot wheeles which by labour are bended and curbed, will not returne and be reduced againe, do what you can to their former streight-30 neffe: Like as it is impossible by any device to fet streight the crooked staves that Stage-players goe withall. And evident it is, that whatfoever against nature, is by force and labour chaunged and redreffed, becometh much better and more fure, than those things that continue in their ownekinde. But, are these the things onely wherein appeareth the power of studie and diligence? Noverily. For there are an infinite number of other experiments, which proove the fame most cleerely. Is there a peece of ground naturally good? Let it lie neglected, it becommeth wilde and barrain: Yea, and the more rich and fertill that it is of it selfe, the more waste and fruitlesse it prooveth for want of tillage and husbandry. Contrariwise, you shall see another plot hard, rough, and more stonie than it should be: which by good ordering and the carefull hand of the husbandman, soone bringeth foorth faire and goodly fruit. Againe, what trees are 40 there which will not twine, grow crooked and proove fruitleffe, if good heed be not taken unto them? Whereas, if due regard be had, and that carefulnes employed about them which becommeth, they beare fruit, and yeeld the fame ripe in due feafon. Is there any body fo found and able, but by neglect, rior, delicacie, and an evill habit or custome it will grow dull, seeble and unlustie, yea and fall into a misliking and consumption? On the other side, what complexion is there so faint and weake, which is not brought to great strength and perfection in the end, by continual travell and ordinary exercises? Are there any horses in the world, which if they be well handled and broken while they are colts, will not proove gentle in the end and fuffer themselves easily to be mounted and manned? Contrariwife, let them remaine untamed in their youth: ftrongheaded, stiffenecked and unruly will they be alwaies after, and never fit for service. And why 50 should we marvell at these and such like matters, considering that many of the most savage and cruell beafts that be, are made gentle and familiar, yea and brought to hand by labour and paines taken about them? Well faid therefore that Theffalian who loever he was, who being demaunded, which The falians of all others were most dull and softest of spirit, Answered thus, Even they that have given over warfare. But what need we to stand longer upon this point? For certaine it is, that our manners and conditions are qualities imprinted in us by tract and "Gracemeling continuance of time: and who foever faith that * Morall vertues are gotten by cultome, in my with the conceit speaketh not amisse but to very great purpose. And therefore with one example and no more produced by Lycargus as touching this matter, I will knit up and conclude my difcourse thereof. Lycurgus, him I meane who established the lawes of the Lacedamonians, tooke two whelpes of one letter, and comming both from the fame fire and damme: Those he caused to be nourished and brought up diversly, and unlike one to the other; that as the one prooved a greedie and ravenous curre and full of Threwd turnes: fo the other was given to hunting and minded nothing but to quest and follow the game. Now upon a certaine day afterwards, when the Laceda monians were met together in a frequent affembly, he spake unto them in this manner, My Masters, citizens of Lacedamon, Of what importance to engender vertue in the hart 10 of man, cultonic, nourture, discipline and education is, I will presently shew unto you by an evident demonstration: and with that he brought foorth in the fight of them all, those two whelpes, and fet directly before them a great platter of fops in broth, and therewith let loofe also a live hare : but behold, one of them followed immediately after the hare, but the other ranne thraight to flap in the platter aforefaid. The Lacedamonians will not what to make of this, nor to what purpose he shewed unto them these two dogs before faid, untill he brake out into this speech, These two dogs (quoth he) had one damme and the same sire, but being bred and brought up diverfly, See how the one is become a greedy gut, and the other a kinde hound. And thus much may ferve as touching cuftome and diverfitie of education.

thus much may ferve as touching custome and diversitie of education. It were meete now in the next place to treat of the feeding and nourifhing of infants newly 20 borne. I hold it therefore convenient, that mothers reare their babes, and fuckle them with their owne breafts: For feede them they will with greater affection, with more care and diligence, as loving them inwardly, and (as the proverbe faith) from their tender nailes, whereas mileh nources and fostermothers carie not so kinde a hart unto their nourcelings, but rather a fained and counterfet affection, as being mercenarie and loving them indeed for hire onely and reward. Furthermore, even nature her selfe is sufficient to proove, that mothers ought to suckle and nourish those whom they have borne and brought into the world: For to this end hath the given to every living creature that bringeth foorth yoong, the foode of milke: and in great wisedome the divine providence hath furnished a woman with two teats for this purpose, that if happily the should be delivered of two twinnes at once, the might have likewife two fountaines 30 of milke to yeeld nouriflyment for them both. Moreover, by this meanes more kinde and loving they will be unto their children: and verily not without great reason: For this fellowship in feeding together is a bond that knitteth, or rather a wrest that straineth and stretcheth benevolence to the utmost. The experience whereof we may see even in the very brute and wilde beafts, which hardly are parted from their companie, with whom they have been enourished, but still they lowe and mowe after them. Mothers therefore (as I have faid) ought especially to endevour and do their best for to be nources of their owne children, if it be possible. But in case they cannot, by reason either of some bodily infirmitie and indisposition that way (for so it may fall out) or that they have a defire and do make hast to be with childe againe, and to have more children: then a carefull eie and good regard would be had, not to entertaine those for nources 40 and governesses that come next to hand, but to make choise of the very best and most honest that they can come by, and namely for faire conditions and good behavior, to choose Greekish women before any other. For like as the members and limmes of little infants, fo foone as ever they be borne, are of necessitie to be formed and fashioned, that afterwards they may grow ftraight and not crooked: even so, at the very first their harts and manners ought to be framed and fet in order: For this first age of childhood is moist and soft, apt to receive any impression: whiles the heart is tender every leffon may be soone instilled into it, and quickly will take hold, whereas hard things are not fo cafic to be wronght and made foft. And as fignets or feales will quickly fet a print upon fost wax; so the tender hearts of yoong children take readily the imprestion of whatfoever is taught them. In which regard, Plato that heavenly and divine Philoso- 50 pher, seemeth unto me to have given a wife admonition for nources, when he warned them not to tell foolish tales, nor to use vaine speeches inconsiderately in the heating of yoong infants, tor feare least at the first their minds might apprehend folly and conceive corrupt opinions, Semblably the Poet Phocylides seemeth to deliver sage counsaile in this behalfe when hee faith:

Ought to be taught things good and fage.

Neither is this precept in any wife to be forgotten or paffed by, That other children also who are either to attend upon them, whiles they be nourced and brought up, or to beare them companie and be fedde together with them, be chosen such as above all things are well mannered and of good conditions: Then, that they speake the Greeke toong naturally, and pronounce the same most plainely and distinctly, for seare, least if they fort with such secrets as either in language are barbarous, or in behaviour leawd and ungratious, they catch infection from them, and be stained with their vices. For such old sawes and proverbes as these, are not for the with 10 out good reason, If thou converse and cohebite with a lame creaple, thou will soone learne to simpe

Now when children be growen to that age, wherin they are to be committed unto the charge of Tutors, Schoolemasters and governors: then, parents ought to have an especial care of their state, namely, under whom they fet them to be trained up: least for want of good providence and forefight, they betray them into the hands of fome vile flaves, base barbarians, vaine and light-headed persons. For most absurd and ridiculous is the practise of many men in this point: who if they have any fervants more vertuous or better disposed than others, some of them they appoint to husbandry and tillage of their ground; others they make Masters of their ships. They employ them (I fay) either in merchandife to be their factours, or as flewards of their 20 house to receive and pay all; or else to be banquers, and so they trust them with the exchaunging and turning of their monies. But if they meete with one flave among the reft that ufeth to becupfhotten, given to gluttony & belly cheere, or otherwife is untoward for any good fervice, him they fet over their children to bring them up: Whereas indeed a governour over youth should be wel given, & of a right good nature himselfe, such an one as Phanix was, who had the breeding and education of Achilles. The principal point therfore and most important of all that hitherto hath bene alledged is this, That choise men be fought out for to be teachers & masters of our children; who live in good name and without challenge, whose carriage and behaviour is blameles; & who for their knowledge & experience of the world are the best that may be found. For furely the fource & roote of all goodnes and honefty, is the good education and training up 20 of our children in their renderage. And like as good hisbandmen and gardeners are woont to pitch props & flakes close unto their yong plants, to flay them up and keepe them ftreight: even To, difference and wife teachers plant good precepts and holefome instructions round about their yoong schollers, to the end that thereby, their manners may bud foorth commendably, and be framed to the rule of vertue. But contrariwife, you shall have some fathers now addies, that deferve no better than to be spit at in their very faces; who either upon ignorance, or for want of experience, before any triall made of those masters, who are to have the conduct and charge of their children, committhem hand over head to the tuition of lewd persons, and such as beare thew and make profession of that which they are not. Neither were this absurditie altogether so groffe and ridiculous, if so be they faulted herein of meere simplicitie & default of foreknow-40 ledge. But here is the heights of their folly and errour, that themselves knowing otherwhiles the infufficiencie, yea and the naughtines of fome fuch Masters, better than they doe who advertife them thereof; yet for all that, they commit their children unto them, partly being overcome by Heflatteric of claw-backes, and partly willing to gratific fome friends upon their kinde and carnest entreaties. Wherein they do much like for all the world to him, who lying verice ficke in bodie, for to content and fatisfie a friend, leavethan expert and learned physition who was able to cure him; and entertaineth another blind leech, who for want of skill and experience quickly killeth him: or elfe unto one who being at fea; forgoeth an excellent pilot whom he knoweth to be very skilfull, and for the love of a friend maketh choise of another that is most insufficient: O Inpiter and all the gods in Heaven! Is it possible that a man bearing the name 30 of a father, thould make more account of a friends request, than of the good education of his owne children? Which confidered, had not that ancient Philosopher Crates (timke you) just occasion to fay oftentimes, that if possibly he might, he would willingly mount to the highest place of the citie, and there cric out about in this manner: What meane you my Masters, and whether rinne you headlong, carking and cating all that ever you can, to gather goods and rake riches together as you downliles in the mean time you make little or no reckoning at all of your children, unto whom you are to leave all your wealth? To which exclamation of his, I may adde thus much moreover, and fay, That fuch fathers are like unto him that hath great regard of his floc, but taketh no heed unto his foot. And verily, a man shall see many of these fathers, who upon a covetous minde, and a cold affection toward their owne children, are growen to this passe, that for to spare their purse, and case themselves of charge, chuse men of no woorth to teach them: which is as much as to feeke a good market where they may buy ignorance cheapest. Certes Aristippus said verie well to this purpose, when upon a time he pretily mocked fuch a father who had neither wit nor understanding, and jibed pleafantly with him in this maner: For when he demaunded of him how much he would take for the training up and teaching of his fonne? He answered, An hundred crownes: A hundred crownes! quoth the father: by 10 Hercules I sweare, you aske too much out of the way; For with a hundred crownes I could buy 2 good flave. True quoth Aristippus againe, Lay out this hundred crownes so, you may have twaine, your fonne for one, and him whom you buy for the other. And is not this a follie of all follies, that nourses should use their yoong infants to take meate and seed themselves with the right hand, yea and rebuke them if haply they put foorth their left: and not to forecast and give order that they may learne civility, and heare fage & holefom instructions? But what befalleth afterward to these good fathers, when they have first noursed their children badly, & then taught them as lewelly? Mary I will tell you, When these children of theirs are growne to mans estate, and will not abide to heare of living orderly, and as it becommeth honest men: but contrariwise fall headlong into outragious courfes, and give themselves wholy to sensuality and service plea- 20 fures: Then fuch fathers all repent for their negligence past, in taking no better order for their education: but all too late confidering no good enfueth thereupon: but contrariwife, the lewd prancks which they commit daily, augment their griefe of heart and cause them to languish in forrow. For some of them they see to keepe companie with flatterers, parasites, and smell seasts, the lewdeft, bafeft, and most cursed wretches of all other, who serve for nothing but to corrupt, spoile, and marre youth: Others, to captivate and spend themselves upon harlots, queanes and common strumpers, proud and sumptuous in expence; the entertainment of whom is infinitly coftly. Many of them confirme all in delicate fare, and feeding a daintie and fine tooth: Many of them fall to dice, and with mumming and masking hazard all they have. And divers of them againe entangle themselves in other vices more hardy and adventurous, courting faire dames, 30 and making love to other mens wives: for which purpose they walke disguised in the night, like the frantike priefts of Bacches, to commit adulteries, buying fometimes one onely nights pleafure with the price of their life: Whereas if fuch as these had conversed before with any Philofopher, they would never have taken fuch waies as this, and give themselves to like vanities: but rather they would have turned over a new leafe and learned a leffon of Diogenes, who in words not very civill and feemely, howbeit to the point not untruly, gave this counsell and faid, Goc thy waies to the Stewes (I advise thee) and enter into some brothell house, where thou mailt know how the pleasure that costeth little or nothing, differeth not from that which is bought full decrely.

To knir up thereforeall in one fumme I will conclude, and this my conclusion ought 40 of right to bee esteemed for an oracle, rather than a simple counsell and admonition; That the beginning, mids, and ende of all these matters, lieth onely in vertuous nourture and honeft education, which I avouch are the very meanes that be operative and powerfull for the attaining both of vertue and true happinesse. As for all other things which we count good in this world, are in comparison heereof, mortall, transitorie, small, and not woorth the seeking after with fuch care and studie. Nobilitie, I confesse to be a goodly thing, but it is the gift of our ancestors. Riches who doubteth that they be gay and pretious matters? Howbeit, lying in the power of fortune onely, who taketh the fame many times from those that possession, and give th them away to fuch as never looke for them. Moreover, much wealth is the very marke whereat they thoot who are common out purfes, privic & domesticall theeves, Sycophants and 50 promoters, and that which is most, the wickedest persons in the world oftentimes meete therewith. Glorie and honor be things venerable, howbeit uncertaine and mutable. Beautie is lovely and verie much defired, but it continueth a small while. Health is woorth much and yet you fee how foone it changeth. Strength of body who witheth not? but quickly it is decaied and gone, either by fickenes or yeeres: in fo much, as who foever younteth and beareth himfelfe in his able bodie, is greatly deceived, and commeth farre short of his reckoning: For what is mans force, compared with that of other beafts, I meane Elephants, Buls and Lions? It is learning and knowledge onely, which in us is divine, heavenly and immortall. For inmans nature two parts there are to be confidered of all other most principall, to wit, understanding and speech. And of thefe, understanding is as it were the maister that commandeth: Speech, the fervant that obeyeth. Now the forefaid understanding is not exposed to the injurie of fortune: no flanders raifed by Sycophants can take it away: Sickneffe hath no power to corrupt and destroy it; neither doth it decay or perish by olde age : For it is the onely thing that being in yeeres, waxeth yoong and fresh. Length of time which doth diminish and impaire all things else, addeth still 10 more knowledge to our understanding, the elder that we are. So violence of warre which in manner of a streame casteth downe and carieth all away with it is not able to make havocke and spoyle of knowledge and learning: that onely is not in danger thereof. And in my conceir, Stifpe the Megarian Philosopher gave a most woorthy and memorable answere unto K. Demetrius, who having forced, facked and rafed the citie of Megarato the very foundation, demannded of him what loffes he fulfained in that generall facking? None at all (quoth he) For warre can make no spoile of vertue. To which answere of his, accordeth and soundeth well the Apophthegment Socrates, who (as I take it) being asked of Gorgias, what opinion he had of the great King and Monarch of the Persians in those daies, whether he deemed him Happie or no? I wotnot (quoth he) how he is furnished with vertue and learning: as if he judged, that true 20 felicitie confifted in these two things, and not in the transitorie gifts of fortune.

But as my counfell and advice unto parents is, to hold nothing in the world more deere and pretious, then to traine up their children in good letters and vertuous manners: fo I fay againe, that they ought to have an cie unto that literature and institution which is found, pure and uncorrupt: furthermore, to fequester and withdraw their children as farre as possibly they can, from the vanitie and foolish desire to be seene and heard in the frequent and publike affemblies of the people. For commonly we finde, that to please a multitude, is to displease the wifer sort.

And that I speake truth herein Euripides giveth good testimonic in these verses:

No filed toong I have nor eloquence, To speake in place of frequent audience: Among my feeres and those in number few, Hove to give advise and make no shew: For, those whose speech doth please a multitude, With learned men are fooligh thought and rude.

For mine owne part, I observe those men who endevour to speake to the appetite and pleafure of the base and vulgar fort, that ordinarily they become loose and dissolute persons, abandoned to all fentualitie. And verily not without great apparance of reason. For if to gratifie and content others, they have no regard of honelty: more likelyhood there is a great deale, that for to do apleasure to themselves, and seede their owne humour and appetite, they will forget all honor and devoir; yea and fooner give the reines to their owne delights, than follow the

But now, what good thing is there moreover, that we are to teach our children? and whereto fould we advise them for to give their minds? A goodly matter no doubt it is to do nothing raffily, nor to speake a word unadvisedly: But (as the old Proverbe faith) what soever is faire and goodly, the same also is hard and difficult. As for these orations which be made extempore and without premeditation', they goe away with great facilitie, and are verie rash and full of vanitie: And fuch commonly as to speake, know not well either where to begin or when to make an end. Alfo, over and above other abfurdities and faults which they commit, who are accustomed in this wife to parle at aventure, and to let their toong runne at randome, know not how to keepe any meane or measure of speech, but fall into a marvellous superfluitie and ex-50 cesseof wordes: Whereas on the contrarie side, when a man thinketh before hand what hee should say, newill never overshoot him so fance as to passe beyond the bonds of temperate and proportionable language. Pericles, as we have beene given to understand, being oftentimes called upon & importuned by the people, and that expressly by name, for to deliver his opinion as rouching a matter in question, would not fo much as rise from his place, but excused himrelie and faid, I am not provided to speake. Semblably Demosthenes, one who greatly affected the faid Pericles, and followed his steps in policy and managing of State affaires, being called by the Athenians to fit in counfell with them, & requested to give his advise in certain points, refufed and made the fame answer, saying, I have not yet thought upon it, neither am I prepared. But peradventure fome man will fay, this is an headles tale and a devifed report received by tradition from hand to hand, and not grounded upon any certaine tellimonie. Liften then, what he faith himselfe in that oration which he made against Midias, wherein he setteth evidently before our cies, the profit that commeth by premeditation: For in one place thereof, there be his », words: My Masters of Athens, I confesse plainely, and cannot denie or diffemble, that I have ta-, ken as much paines in composing of this oration as possibly I could: For an idle wretch I had beene if having fuffred, and fuffring still such indignities as these, I would not consider and 10 2) studie before hand, what I had to say in reason concerning these matters. Neither alledge I this, as one who condemned altogether the promptitude and readineffe of the toong, and the gift of interance ex tempore, but the ordinary cultome and exercise therof in everie smal matter, and of no great importance. For otherwhiles it is tolerable; provided alwaies that we use it to, as we would take a purging medicine. And to speake more plainely, my meaning is, that I would not have young men before they bee growen to mans age, for to speake ought without good advise and consideration. But after they bee well grounded and have gathered fufficient roote which may yeelde pithic speech, then if occasion be offered, and that they bee called unto it, I thinke it convenient, they should bee allowed to speake freely. For even as they who have beene fettered a long time and worne yrons on their 20 feete, when they are loofed from their gives, cannot goe well at the first, because they have continued fuch a while with clogs at their heeles, but ever and anone are ready to trip and stumble: fo it fareth with those that of long time have been etoong tied (as it were) and restrained of their libertic of speech: For if haply there be presented some matter, whereto they are to speake on a fudden, they will retaine Itill the fame manner and forme of Itile, and speake no otherwife than they did before with premeditation. Mary, to fuffer young boies to make subitanie and inconfiderate orations, is the next way to bring them to vaine babling, and causeth them to utter many words altogether impertinent to the matter. It is reported that upon a time a vaine and foolith painter came to Apelles, and shewed him a picture, faying withall, This Image I drew thus and thus foone. I wot well (quoth apelles) at the first fight , although thou faidst 30 never a word that it was quickly painted and in hafte. And I marvell rather that thou haft not painted many more such in the same time. But to return e againe to my former discourse which I began withall, as touching speech, like as I would give counsell to beware of glorious and brave words, and to avoide that maner of haughtic voice which befeemeth tragedies, and is meete for Theaters: So I advite and admonish againe to flie as much that kinde of language which is too finall and over-lowly: For that the one which is fo loude and aloft, exceedeth civilitie: and the other that is as much beneath, bewrayeth overmuch fearfulneffe, Moreover, as the bodie ought not onely to be found and in health, but also in good plight and well liking: so our speech should be not onely cleere from ficknesse as it were and malady, but also strong and able: For that a thing that is found and fafe only, we do but barely praife: whereas that which is hardy 40 and adventurous, we admire and woonder at. That which I have faid, as touching the toong and speech, the same opinion I have of the heart and the disposition thereof. For I would not have a youth to be overbold and audacious: neither do I like of him, if he be too timorous and fearefull: For as the one turneth in the end to prefumption and impudencie; fo the other into fervile cowardife. But here lieth all the maistrie and cunning, as well in this as in all things else, namely, to cut even in the mids, and to hold the golden meane. And fince I am entred thus far into the discourse as touching the literature and erudition of youth, before I proceed any farther, I will deliver mine opinion thereof generally in these termes: Namely, That to be able to speake of one thing and no more, is first and formest in my conceit no small signe of ignorance. Then, I suppose that the exercise and practise thereof, soone bringeth sacietie. And againe, I 50 hold it impossible to continue evermore in the same : For so to be ever in one song, breedeth tediousnes, and soone a man is weary of it: wheras varietie is alwaies delectable both in this, and also in all other objects as well of the cie as the care. And therefore it behooveth, that a childe well descended and free borne, be not suffred to want either the fight or the hearing of all those arts and liberall sciences, which are linked as it were and comprehended within one circle, and thereupon called Encyclia.i. Circular. These would I have him to runne through every one fuperficially, for a rafte onely of them all: for as much as to attaine unto the perfection thereof were impossible. Yet so, as his chiese and principall studie be employed in Philosophie: which opinion of mine I may very well confirme by a proper fimilitude. For all one it is, as if a man would fay, a commendable thing it were to faile along the coatts, and fee many a citie: but expedient and profitable to make abode and dwell in the best: and much like to that pleasant and pretie conceited speech of Bion the Philosopher, who faid, That even as the lovers and wooers of Lady Penelope, when they could not enjoy the Mistresse herselfe, went in hand with her wayting maidens, and companied with them: fo, as are not able to attaine unto Philosophie, spend 10 and confume themselves in the studie of other Arts, which in comparison of it are nothing woorth. And therefore we ought to make this account, that Philosophie is the principall head (as it were) of all other learning and knowledge whatfoever. True it is, that for the maintenance and preservation of the body, men have devised two Arts, to wit, Physicke and bodily exercise: of which twaine, the one procureth health; the other addeth thereto a good habitude and firong constitution: but for the infirmities and maladies of the soule, there is no other physicke but onely Philosophie: For by the meanes of it and together with it, we may know what is good, what is badde, what is honest and dishonest, what is just, and generally what to choise and what to refuse, how we ought to beare our selves towards the gods, and towards our parents, what our demeanour should bee with our elders, what regard we are to have of lawes, what 20 our cariage must be to strangers, to superiours: how we are to converse with our friends, In what fort we ought to demeane our felves towards our children and wives, and finally, what behaviour it befeemeth us to thew unto our fervants and familie: For as much as our duetie is to worthip and adore the gods, to honour our parents, to reverence our ancients, to obey the lawes, to give place unto our superiors and betters, to love our friends, to use our wives chastely and with moderation: to be kinde and affectionate to our children, and not to be outragious with our fervants, nor to tyrannize over them. But the principall and chiefe of all is this, not to fliew our felves over joious and merric in prosperitie, nor yet exceeding heavie and sad in adversitie: not in pleasures and delight dissolute, nor in anger furious, and transported or rather transformed into brutish beasts by choler. And these I esteeme to be the soveraigne fruits that 30 are to be gathered and gotten by Philosophie. For to carrie a generous and noble heart in prosperitie, is the part of a brave minded man: to live without envie and malice, is the figne of a good and tractible nature: to overcome pleasures by the guidance of reason, is the act of wife and fage men: and to bridle and restraine choler, is a mastry that every one cannot skill of: But the height of perfection in my judgement those onely attaine unto, who are able to joine and intermingle the politicke government of weale publike with the profession and studie of Philosophie: For by this meanes (I suppose) they may enjoy two of the best things in the world, to wit, the profit of the common weale by managing State affaires: and their owne good, living fo as they doe in tranquilitie and repose of mind, by the meanes of Philosophie. For whereas there be amongst men three forts of life, namely, Active, Contemplative, and Volup-40 tuous: this last named, being diffolute, loofe, and thrall to pleasures, is bruitish, beastly, base and vile: The contemplative wanting the active is unprofitable: and the active, not participating with the speculation of Philosophie, committeth many absurde enormities, and wanteth ornaments to grace and beautifie it. In which regard, men must endevour and assay as much as lieth in them both to deale in government of the State, and also to give their mindes to the studie of Philosophie, so farre foorth as they have time, and publike affaires will permit. Thus governed in timespast noble Pericles: thus ruled Archytas the Tarentine: thus Dion the Syracusian, and Epaminondas of Thebes swaied the State where they lived; and both of them aswell the one as the other converfed familiarly with Plato. Astouching the Institution of children in good literature, needleffe (I suppose) it is to write any more. This onely will I adde unto the rest that 50 hath beene faid, which I suppose to be expedient or rather necessarie: namely, that they make no finall account of the workes and bookes of the ancient Sages and Philosophers, but diligentlie collect and gather them together: fo as they do it after the maner of good husbandmen: For as they doe make provision of such tooles as pertaine to Agriculture and husbandrie, not onely to keepe them in their possession, but also to use them accordingly: so this reckoning ought to be made, that the instruments and furniture of knowledge and learning, bee good bookes, if they be read and perused: For from thence as from a fountaine they may be sure to maintaine

And here we are not to forget the diligence that is to be imployed in the bodily exercise of children: but to remember that they bee fent into the schooles of those masters who make profession of such feats, there to be trained and exercised sufficiently, aswell for the streight and decent grouth, as for the abilitie and strength of their bodies: For the fast knitting and strong complexion of the bodie in children, is a good foundation to make them another day decent and personable old men. And like as in time of a calme & faire season, they that are at sea, ought to make provision of necessarie meanes to withstand foule weather and a tempest : even so, verie meete it is, that tender age be furnished with temperance, sobrietie and continencie, and even 10 betimes referve and lay up fuch voyage provision, for the better sustenance of old age. Howbeit in fuch order ought this labour and travell of children to be dispensed, that their bodies be not exhauft and dried up, and fo by that meanes they themselves be overwearied, and made either unmeet or unwilling to follow their booke afresh and take their learning: For as Plato said very well, Sleepe and laffitude be enemies to learning. But why do I ftand hereupon fo much, being in comparison so small a matter?

Proceed I will therefore and make hafte to that which is of greatest importance, and passeth all the rest that hath beene said before: For this I say, that youth ought to be trained to militaric feats, namely, in launcing darts and javelins, in drawing a bow and shooting arrowes, in chasing also and hunting wilde beafts. For a fruch as all the goods of those who are vanquished in 20 fight, be exposed as a prey and bootie to the conquerours: neither are they fit for warfarre and to beare armes, whose bodies having beene daintily brought up in the shade and within house, are corpulent, and of a foft and delicate conflitution.

The leane and dry the raw bone foldiour fierce, 14ho train'd bath beene in armes and warlike toile, In field wholerankes of enemies will pierce, Indin the lifts all his concurrents foile.

But what may fome men fay unto me? Sir, you have made promife to give us examples and precepts, concerning the education of all children free borne and of honest parentage: and now, me thinkes you neglect the education of commoners and poore mens children, and deli- 30 ver no inftructions but fuch as are for gentlemen, and be furable to the rich and wealthie onely. To which objection, it is no hard matter to make answere. For mine owne part, my defire especially is, that this inftruction of mine might ferve all: but in case there befome, who for want of meanes cannot make that use and profit which I could wish, let them lay the waight upon fortune, and not blame him who hath given them his advice and counfell in these points. And yet for poore men thus much will I fay, Let them endevour and straine themselves to the utmost of their power, to bring up their children in the best manner: and if they cannot reach unto that, yet must they aime thereat, and come as neere as their abilitie will give them leave.

I have beene willing to infert these points by the way, into this present argument, and to charge my discourse over and above therewith, that I might prosecute other precepts remay- 40 ning behinde, which concerne the education of young men. Thus much therefore I fay moreover, that children must be trained and brought to their duety in all lenity, by faire words, gentle exhortations, and milde remonstrance, and in no wife (pardie) by stripes and blowes: For this course of swinging and beating seemeth meete for bondslaves, rather than persons of free condition. And to fay a truth, by this meanes they become dull and fenfelesse, nay they have all fludie and labour afterwards in hatred and horrour: partly for the fmart and paine which they abide by fuch correction, and in part by the contumely and reproch that they fustaine thereby. Praise and dispraise be farrebetter and more profitable to children free borne, than all the whips, rods and boxes in the world: the one for to drive them forward to well doing, the other to draw them backe from doing ill: but both the one and the other are to be used in alternative 50 course. One while they would be commended; another while blamed and rebuked: and namelie, if at any time they be too jocund and infolent, they ought to be fnibbed a little and taken downe, yea and put to fome light shame : but soone after, railed up againe by giving them their due prailes. And herein we must imitate good nourses, who when they have fet their infants a crying, give them the breaft for to still them againe. Howbeit, a measure would be kept, and great heed taken that they be not too highly commended, for feare leaft they grow proude and prefume overmuch of themselves; For when they be praised exceedingly they waxe carelesses, diffolute and enervate; neither will they be willing afterwards to take more paines. Moreover, I have knowen certaine fathers, who through excessive love of their children have hated them afterwards. But what is my meaning by this speech? Surely I will declare my minde and make my words plaine anon by an evident example and demonstration. Some fathers (Ifay) there be, who upon a hot and halfie defire to have their children come foone forward, and to be the formost in every thing, put them to immoderate travell and excessive paines; in such fort, that they either fincke under the waight of the burden, and so fall into greevous maladies, or else 10 finding themselves thus surcharged and overladen, they are not willing to learne that which is taught them. And it fareth with them as it doth with yoong herbes and plants in a garden, which fo long as they be watered moderately, are nourished and thrive very well; but if they be overmuch drenched with water, they take harme thereby and are drowned: Even fo we must allow unto children a breathing time betweene their continual! labouts: confidering and making this account, That all the life of man is divided into labor & reft; and for this cause Nature hath fo ordained, that as there is a time to be awake, so we finde a time also to sleepe. One while there is warre, and another while peace: It is not alwaies winter and foule weather, but former likewife and a faire feafon. There be appointed not onely worke daies to toyle in, but also feastivall holidaies to folace and disport our selves. In sunne, rest and appose, is (as it were) the sance un-20 to our travaile. And this we may observe as well in senselesse and livelesse things, as in living and fenfible creature. For we unbend our bowes, and let flacke the strings of Luces, Harpes, and such musicall instruments, to the end that we may bend and stretch the same againe. And in one word, as the bodie is preferved and maintained by repletion and evacuation successively; fo the minde likewise by repose and travell in their turnes.

Furthermore, there be other fathers also woorthy of rebuke and blame, who after they have once betaken their children to Masters, Tutors and Governors, never deigne afterwards themfelves, either to fee or heare them, whereby they might know how they learne: wherein they do faile verie much in their dutie. For they ought in proper person to make triall how they profit, they should ever and anon (after some sew daies passed betweene) see into their progresse and 30 proceeding, and not to repose their hope and rest altogether upon the discretion and disposition of a mercenarie mafter. And verily this carefull regard of the fathers, will worke also greater diligence in the mafters themselves, seeing that by this meanes they are called estsoones, as it were to account and examine how much they plie their schollers, and how they profit under their hands. To this purpose may be well applied a prety woord spoken sometimes by a wife estugry of a stable, Nothing (quoth he) feedeth the steede so fat as doth the masters eie.

But above all things, the memorie of children ought daily to be exercised: for that it is as a man would fay the Treafury & Storehouse of all learning. Which was the cause that the ancient Poëts have feigned, That Lady Mnemofyne, that is to fay Memorie, was the mother of the Mufes: Whereby they would feeme under an ænigmaticall and darke speech to give us to under-40 fland, that nothing availeth fo much either to breed, or to feed and nourish learning, as Memorie. And therefore great diligence would be used in the exercise thereof everie way: whether the children be by nature good of remembrance and retentive: or otherwise of a fickle memorie and given to oblivion. For the gift of nature in the one, by exercise we shall confirme and augment; and the imperfection or default in the other, by diligence supplie and correct: in fuch fort, that as they, shall become better than others; so these, shall proove better then themfelves. For verie wifely to this purpose said the Poët Hesiodus:

If little still to little thou do ad

a heape at length and mickle will be had.

Over and befides, I would not have fathers to be ignorant of another point also, as touching 50 this memorative part & faculty of the mind: namely, that it ferveth much not onely to get learning and literature, but also is a meanes that carieth not the least stroke in worldly affaires: For the remembrance of matters past, furnisheth men with examples sufficient to guide and direct them in their confultatious of future things.

Furthermore, this care would be had of yoongchildren, that they be kept from filthie and unseemely speeches: For words (as Democritum saith) are the shadowes of deeds. Trained also they must be to be courteous, affable, & faire spoken, aswell in intertainment of talke with every one, as in faluting and greeting whomfoever they meete: for there is nothing in the world fo odious as to be coy and furly of speech; to make it strange and to disdaine for to speake with men. Againe, yoong students shall make themselves more lovely and amiable to those with whom they converte, in case they be not so opinative and stiffe that they will not relent nor give place one jot in disputations, if they have once taken a partie against others. For a commendable and goodly matter it is for a man to know, not only how to overcome, but also to suffer himfelse otherwhiles to be overcome: especially in such things wherein the victorie bringeth hurt and dammage: For verily fuch a conquest may well and truely be called according to the common Proverbe, A Cadmian victorie, that is to fay, which turneth to the detriment and losse of 10 the winner. In confirmation whereof I may well alleage the testimony of the wise Poët Euripides, who in one of his tragedies hath these verses:

When one of twaine, that argue and dispute, growes into heat of words and will not rest: I hold him much the wifer who is mute and staies his toong, that he do not contest.

Now come I to other points wherein youth is to be instructed, and those of no lesse importance, nay rather I may be bolde to fay, of greater consequence than all those whereof I have discoursed hitherto: And what be they? Namely, that yoong men be not riotous, and given to superfluity of expence: That they holde their tongue: That they master their anger: and final- 20 ly, That they keepe their hands pure & cleane. But let us confider these precepts particularlie, what ech of them in severall doeth import: and more easily may they be understood, if we illustrate the same by lively examples. To begin then first with the last : There have beene knowen great personages, who being once permitted to put forth their hands for to take bribes and money unjustly, lost all the honor which they had woon the rest of their life time: As for example, * Gylippus the Lacedæmonian, who having once opened those bagges or coffers of money by turning their bottomes upwards, and taken foorth what pleafed him, was shamefully banished out of Sparta, and lived obscurely in exile. Astouching the gift of bridling choler, and notto be angric at all, it is a fingular vertue, and perfect wife men they are indeed who can fo do: Such as Socrates was, who being greatly abused by an infolent, audacious and gracelesse youth, that 30 fpared him not, but had spurned & kicked him with his heeles, seeing shose about him to be very angrie and out of patience, stamping and faring as though they would run after the partie, to be avenged of fuch an indignitie; How now my mafters (quoth he) what if an affe had flung out, and given me a rap with his heeles, would you have had me to have yerked out and kicked him againe? Howbeit, this ungracious imperient not clere away with impunity : for being rated for his infolence & leud demeanor, and reproched by everie man with the termes of Winfing affe, Kicking colt, and such like nick-names, he fell into such a fit of melancholie, that he strangled himselle in a halter. Also when Aristophanes the Poet exhibited the Comedie called Cloudes, wherein he let flie and discharged upon Socrates all maner of slanders and contumelies that he could devise, infomuch as one of them who were present at the very time when he railed thus 40 licentiously, demanded of him, and faid, Art thou not netled, ô Socrates, to heare and fee thy felfe thus blasoned and noted in publike place? Not a whit (quoth hee againe) for well I wot, that I am in a Theatre, where I make fport, and am laughed at, no otherwise than at some great feast: and glad I am that I can make the audience so merie. The like for all the world, is reported of Archytas, the Tarentine, and Plato: the one being returned home from the warre, wherein he was L. Generall, found his land forlet, neglected and untilled; whereupon he fent for his Bailife of husbandrie, who had the charge thereof: and when he was come before him, Were I not exceeding angrie (quoth he) I would make thee feele my fingers, and give thee thy defert. And Plate being upon a time displeased with a servant of his, who had a licourous tooth, and had done some ungracious pranke, called unto him Spensippus his sisters sonne, and said, Goe 50 your waies, take me this knave afide, and fwinge him well: for I my felfeam verie angrie. But fome man perhaps will fay unto me, These be hard matters to do and imitate. True it is, I wote well; howbeit, endevour we must and strive with our selves what we can, according to the example of these worthie men, to cut off somewhat of our impatience, and to curbe our excessive anger: for we may not looke to be equall and comparable in any respect to them, either in experience and skill or in vertue. Howbeit, let us nevertheleffe, like the Priests and Torch-bearers (if I may fo fay) of the gods, ordeined to give light, and fnew unto men the reliques of their wifedome and learning, no leffe than if they were verie gods, affay to follow them, and tread in their fleps, endevouring as much as lieth in us, to be furnished with their examples for our better instruction. As for the rule and government of the tongue (for of it, according to my promise, I am to discourse) if there be any man, who thinketh it to be no great mastrie, but a small and frivolous matter, he is verie wide and farre out of the right way. For a point it is of great wildome, to know in time and place to keepe filence, and farre better by many degrees than any speech whatfoever. And for this cause (I suppose) it was, that our ancestours in times past instituted to those precise ceremonies of sacred mysteries, to the end that being used to holde our peace by that meanes, we might transferre that feare which we learned in the fervice of the gods, to the fidelitie and fecrecie which we are to observe in mens affaires; and verily never was there man that repented for holding his tongue, but many a one hath often beshrewed himselfe for speaking. Againe, that word which a man hath held in at one time, he may cafilie utter at another well enough; but a word once passed out of the mouth, he cannot possibly recall it againe. I remember that I have heard of an infinite number of men, who by occasion of an intemperate tongue of their own, have fallen headlong into exceeding great calamities, among whom I will felect one or two by way of example, to illustrate the theame that I have in hand, & overpasse the rest. Ptolomaus King of Aegypt, him I meane who was furnamed Philadelphia, espoused 20 his owne fifter Arsinoë, and maried her: at what time one Sotades came unto him and fayd, You putyour aglet, sir, thorow the oilet that is not made for it: For this one word, he was cast into prison, where he remained a long time in miserie, and rotted in the end, suffering condigne punishment due for his lauish tongue and foolish words ? and for that he thought to make other men laugh, himselse wept for it a long time after. The like, and in a maner the same, both did and suffered another, named Theoretim the Sophister, save that the punishment which he abid was much more grievous. For when King Alexander the Great had by his letters miffive given commandement that the Greekes should provide Robes of purple against his returne, because upon his comming home he minded to celebrate a solemne sacrifice unto the Gods, in token of thanksgiving for that he had atchieved a victorie over the Barbarians: by reason 30 of which commaundement the States and cities of Greece were enjoyeed to contribute money by the poll, Then this Theoritm, I have ever to this day (quoth he) doubted what Homer meant by this word Purple death: but now I know full well that this is the Purple death which he speaketh of. By which words he incurred the high displeasure of King Alexander, and made him his heavie friend ever after. The same Theoritus another time procured to himselfe the deadly hatred of Antigonus King of the Macedonians, by reproching him in way of mockerie with his deformity and defect, for that he had but one eie. For the King having advaunced Entropian his Mafter Cooke to a place of high calling and commaund, thought him a meete man to be fent unto Theoritus, as well to give account unto him, as also to take account of him reciprocally. Eutropion gave him to understand so much from the King, and about this businesse, repaired 40 often unto him. In the end, I know well (quoth Theoritus) thou wilt never have done untill thou have made a dish of meate of me, and serve me up raw to the table before this Cyclops to be eaten: twitting the King with his one cie, and Eutropion with his cookerie. But Eutropion came upon him againe prefently and faid: Thou shalt be then without a head first, For I will make thee pay for thy prating and foolish toong, and with that he went immediately to the King, and reported what he had faid, who made no more adoe but fent his writ and caused his head to be

Over and besides all these precepts before rehearsed, children ought to be inured from their very infancie in one thing which is most holy and beforeming religious education, and that is, to speake the truth: For furely, lying is a base and servile vice, detestable and hatefull among all 50 men, and not pardonable for much as to meane flaves, fuch as haue little or no good in them. Now as touching all that which I have delivered and advised hitherto which concerneth the honest behaviour, modestie and temperance of yoong children, I have delivered the same franckly, resolutely, and making no doubt thereof. Mary, for one point which now I am to touch and handle, I am not fo well refolved, but much diffracted in my mind, hanging to and fro as it were in a quall balance, and know not which way to incline, whether to the one fide or to another: Infomuch as I am in great perplexitie and feare: neither wote I whether I were better to go forward and utter it, or to turne backe and hold my peace, And yet I will take heart, and boldly declare what it is. The question to be debated is this, Whether we ought to permit those that love young boies, to converse with them and haunt their companie, or contrariwise, keepe them away and debar them that they neither come neere nor have any speech with them? For when I behold & confider the auftere nature & severitie of some fathers, who for feare that their fonnes should be abused, wil in no wife abide that those who love them should in any fort keepe copanie, or talke with them, but thinke it intolerable, I am affraid either to bring up fuch an order or to approove & mainteine the same. But when on the other side I propound before mine cies the examples of Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Aeschines, Cebes, and all the suit and fort of 10 those woorthy men in times past, who allowed the maner of loving yoong boies, and by that meanes brought such youthes to learne good sciences, to skill of government & State matters, and to frame their maners to the rule and square of vertue, I am turned quite and altogither of another mind, yea and inclined wholly to imitate and follow those great personages, who have the tellimonie of the Poet Euripides on their fide, faying in one place after this maner,

All loves do not the flesh großly respect: One love there is which doth the foule affect, With justice beweified and aquitie. With innocence likewise and chastitie.

Neither ought we to overpasse one faying of Plato, which he delivereth betweene mirth and 20 good carnest in this wise, Good reason it is, quoth he, that they who have done woorthy service and archieved great prowesse and victory in a battaile, be priviledged to kill whom it pleaseth them among their captives. And for those who desire nothing but the bewty and fresh sloure of the bodic, mine opinion is they should be put backe & kept away: but such in one word as love of the bewtie of the minde are to be chosen & admitted unto them. Also I hold, that such kind love is to be avoided and forbidden, which they practife in Thebes and Elis, as also that which in Candy they call Ravishment: but that which is used in Athens and Lacedamon, we ought to receive and allow, even in young and faire boies. Howbeit concerning this matter every man may for me opine what he thinketh good, and do as he feeth cause and can finde in his heart.

Moreover, having fufficiently treated of the good nourture and modest behaviour of chil- 30 dren, I purpose to proceed unto the age of young men: but first I will speake my mind briefly once for all as touching one point. For many a time I have complained of those who have brought up divers ill customes & this above the rest, namely to provide for their children whiles they be very yoong and little, mafters, teachers and governors: but after they are growen once to some yeeres, they give them head and suffer them to be caried away with the violent heat of youth: whereas contrariwife it were meet and needfull, to have a more carefull eie unto them, and to hold a streighter hand over them at that time, than during their infancic and childhood. For who knoweth not, that the faults of young children are but finall, light and eafie to be amended, as for example, some shrewdnesse and little disobedience to their tutors and governors, or haply some negligence and default in not giving eare to their teachers, and not 40 doing as their Maisters appoint them: But contrariwise the offences that yonkers commit, are many times outragious and heinous, as gourmandile and furfeting, robbing of their fathers, dice plaie in masks and mummeries, excelle in featling, banqueting, quaffing and caroufing, wanton love of yoong maidens, adulteries committed upon maried wives, & thereby the overthrow of houses and confusion of families. In regard of which enormities, it behooved parents to represse and bridle their wilde and untamed affections with great care and vigilance: For this floure of age having no forecast of thrift, but fet altogither upon spending, and given to delights and pleafures, winfeth and flingeth out like a skittifh and frampold horfe, in fuch fort that it had need of a sharpe bit and short curb: And therefore they that endeuor not by all good meanes forcibly to hold in and restraine this age, but give young men libertie and suffer so them to do after their own mind, plunge them ere they be aware into a licentious course of life and all maner of wickednesse. Wherefore good and wife fathers ought in this age especially to be vigilant and watchfull over their fonnes, they ought I say to keepe them downe, and inure them to wisedome and vertue, by teaching, by threatning, by intreatie and praiers, by advise and remonstrances, by persuation and counsell, by faire promises, by setting before their eies the examples of some who being abandoned to their pleasures and all sensualities, have fallen headlong into great calamities and wofull miferies: and contrariwife, of others who by maftering their lusts and conquering their delights, have wonne honor and glorious renowne. For furely these be the two Elements and foundations of vertue, Hope of reward, and Feare of punishment: For as hope inciteth and fetteth them forward to enterprise the best and most commendable acts, fo feare plucketh them backe, that they dare not enter upon lewd and wicked pranks. In fumme, Fathers ought with great care to divert their children from frequenting ill companie, for otherwise they shall be fure to catch infection and carie away the contagion of their leandnes. This is that Pythagoras expresly forbiddeth in his Aenigmaticall precepts under co-10 yert and dark words, which because they are of no small efficacie to the attaining of vertue, I will briefly fet downe by the way, and open their meaning, Tafte not (quoth he) of the black tailed fi-. Thes, Melanuri, which is as much to fay, as, Keepe not company with infamons persons, & such as for their naughtie life are noted (as it were) with a blacke coale. Paffe not over a balance, That is, we ought to make the greatest account of equitie and justice, and in no case to transgresse the fame. Sit not upon the *measure Choenix, That is to fay, we are to flie floth and idlenes, that we *Choenix cbmay forecast to make provision of things necessarie to this life. Give not every man thy right tars, or after hand, which is all one with this, Make no contracts and bargaines indifferently with all persons, some a sexter Weare not a ring streight upon thy finger i. Live in freedome and at libertie; neither intangle &halfe, which and clog thy life with troubles as with gives. Dignot nor rake into the fire with a fword: where-qualifanium, 20 by he giveth us a caveat, not to provoke farther a man that is angrie, for that is not meete and Fide Car. Riveexpedient; but rather to give place unto those that are in heat of choller. Eat not thy heart, that in mind and is to fay, offend not thine ownefoule, nor hurt and confume it with penfive cares. Abstaine from beanes. i. Intermeddle not in the affaires of State and government: for that in olde time men were woont to passe their voices by beanes, & so proceeded to the election of Magistrates. Put not viands in a chamber-pot: whereby he fignifieth, that we should not commit good and civill words to a wicked minde; because speech is the nutriment of the understanding, which becommeth polluted by the leudnesse of men. Returne not backe from the limits and confines when thou commest unto them, that is to fay, If wee perceive death approaching, and that wee are come to the uttermost bounds of our life, we ought to beare our death patiently, and not

But now is it time to return eagaine to my matter which I proposed before in the beginning. namely, as I have alreadic faid, we are to withdraw our children from the focietie and companie of leud persons, and flatterers especiallie: for that which many a time and often I have said to divers and fundrie fathers, I will now repeat once againe, namely, That there is not a more milchievous and pestilent kinde of men, or who doe greater hurt to youth, and sooner overthrow them, then these flatterers, who are the undoing both of fathers and sonnes, causing the olde age of the one, and the youth of the other, wretched and miferable, prefenting with their leud and wicked counfels an inevitable bait, to wit, Pleafure, wherewith they are fure to be caught. Fathers exhort their fonnes that be wealthie, to sobrietie; and these incite them to drunkenesse, 40 Fathers give them counfell to live chaste and continent; these provoke them to lust and loosenesse of life. Fathers bid them to save, spare, and be thriftie; these will them to spend, scatter, and be wasters. Fathers advise their children to labour and travell; these flatterers give them counfell to play or fit still and doe nothing; What? all our life, fay they, is no more but a moment and minute of time, to speake of: we must live therefore, and enjoy our owne, whiles wee have it: we must not live beside our selves, and languish. What need you regard and care for the menaces of a father, an olde doting foole carving death in his face, and having one foor in the grave, we shall see him one of these dayes turne up his heeles, and then will we soone have him forth, and cary him aloft bravely to his grave. You shall have one of these come, and bring unto a youth some common harlot our of the stinking stewes, having borne him in hand be-50 fore, that the is forme brave dame and citizens wife, for to furnish whom, he must robbe his father, there is no remedie. Thus fathers, good men, in one houre are bereaved and spoiled of that which they had faved many a yeere for the maintenance of their olde age. To be thort, a wretched and curfed generation they be; hypocrites, pretending friendship, but they can not skill of plaine dealing and frankespeech. Rich men they claw, sooth up and flatter: the poore they contemne and despile. It seemeth they have learned the Art of singing to the Harpe, for to feduce yoong men: for when their yoong mafters, who mainteine and feed them, begin to lungh, then they fet up by and by a loud laughter, then they yawne & flow all their teeth; counterfeit cranks, fained and supposed men; baltard members of mankinde and this life; who compose themselves, and live to the will and pleasure of rich men: and notwithstanding their fortune is to be free borne, and of franke condition, yet they chuse voluntarily to be slaves: who thinke they have great injurie done unto them, if they may not live in all sulnesse and superstanties, to be kept delicately, and doe nothing that good is. And therefore all fathers that have any away from them these gracelesse imps and than elesses they shall doe well also to keepe from them such schoole-tellowes as be unhappie and given to doe shrewd turnes: for such as ro

All these rules and lessons which hitherto I have delivered, do concerne honestie, vertue and profit: but those that now remaine behinde, pertaine rather to humanity, and are more agreeable to mans nature. For in no case would I have fathers to be verie hard, sharpe and rigorous to their children: but I could rather wish and desire that they winke at dome faults of a voong man, yea and pardon the fame when they espie them, remembring that they themselves were fometimes young. For like as Phylitians mingling and tempering otherwhiles some fweete juice or liquid with bitter drugs and medicines, have devifed that pleafure and delight should be the meanes and way to do their patients good : Even so, fatherslought to delay their cager reprehensions and cutting rebukes with kindnesse and clemencies one while letting the 20 bridle loofe, and giving head a little to the youthfull defires of their children: another while againe reigning them (hort and holding them in, as hard; but above all, with patience gently to beare with their faults. But if fo be fathers cannot otherwise doe, but be soone angrie; then they must assoone have done and be quickly pacified. For I had rather that a father should be hallie with his children, fo he be appealed anon; then flow to anger, and as hard to be pleafed againe. For when a father is so hard harted, that he will not be reconciled, but earleth still in minde the offence that is done, it is a great figne that he hateth his children. And I hold it good that fathers sometime take not knowledge of their childrens faults, and in this case make some use of hard hearing and dimme fight, which old age ordinarily bringeth with it, as if by reason of these infirmities, they neither saw somewhat when they see well ynough, nor heard that which 30 they heare plainely. We beare with the faults of friends; what strange matter is it then to tolerate the imperfections of our owne children? Many a time when our fervants have overdrunke themselves, & furfeited therwith, we search not too narrowly into them, nor rebuke them sharply: therefore keepe thy fonne one while fhort, be franke another while, and give him money to tpend freely. Thou haft beene highly offended, and angric with him once, pardon him another time for it. Hath he practifed fecretly with any one of thy houthold fervants, and beguiled thee? Diffemble the matter and bridle thine yre. Hath he beene at one of thy farmes, met with a good yoke of oxen & made money therof? Commeth he in the morning to do his dutie and bid thee good morrow, belching fowre and finelling strongly of wine, which the day before he drunke at the taverne with companions like himselse? seeme to know nothing. Senteth he of 40 fweete perfumes and coffly pomanders? Hold thy peace and fay nothing. There are the means to tame and breake a wilde and coltifh youth. True it is, that fuch as naturally be fubject to wantonnesse or carnall lust, and will not be reclaimed from it, nor give care to those that rebuke them, ought to have wives of their owne and to be yoked in marriage: for furely this is the belt and furest meanes to bridle those affections, and to keepe them in order. And when fathers are refolved upon this point, what wives are they to feeke for them? Surely those, that are neither in blood much more noble, nor in state farre wealthier than they: For an old said saw it is and a wife, Take a wife according to thy felte. As for those that wed women farre higher in degree, or much wealthier than themselves, I cannot say they be husbands unto their wives, butrather flaves unto their wives goods.

I have yet a few short lessons to annexe unto those above rehearsed, which when I have set downe, I will conclude, and knit up these precepts of mine. Above all things fathers are to take heed, that they neither commit any grosse fault, nor omit any one part of their owne dutie: to the end they may be as lively examples to their owne children; who looking into their life as into a cleere mirrour, may by the precedents by them given, forbeare to do or speake any thing that is unfeemely and difthoneft: For fuch fathers who reproove their children for those parts which they play themselves, see not how under the name of their children they condemne their owne selves. But surely, all those generally who are ill livers, have not the heart to rebuke so much as their owne servants; much lesse dare they finde fault with their children. And that which is woorst of all, in living ill themselves, they teach and counsell their fervants and children to do the same: For looke where old solke be shamelesse, there must yoong people of necessitie be most graceles and impudent Endevour therfore we ought for the reformation of our children, to do our selves all that our dutie requirest); and heerein to imitate that noble Ladie Eurydites, who being a Slavonian borne, and most barbarous, yet for the instruction of her owne to children, the tooke paines to learne good letters when she was well stept in yeeres. And how kinde a mother she was to her children, this Epigram which she her selse made and dedicated to the Muses, doth sufficiently testific and declare:

This Cupid here of honest love a true Memoriali is,
Which whilom Dame Eutydice of Hierapolis
To Muses nine did dedicate: whereby in soule and mind Conceived she was in later dries and brought foor is fruit in kind.
For when here children were well growen: good ancient Lady shee,
And carefull mother tooke the paines to learne the A.B.C.
And in good letters did so far proceed, that in the end
She taught them those sides lessons which they might comprehend.

But now to conclude this Treatife, To be able to observe and keepe all these precepts and rules together which I have before set downe, is a thing haply that I may with for, rather than give advise and exhort unto. Howbeit, to affect and follow the greater part of them, although it require a rare selicitie and singular diligence; yet it is a thing that man by nature is capable of, and may attaine unto.

HOW A YOONG MAN

OVGHT TO HEARE POETS, AND

HOW HE MAY TAKE PROFIT BY READING POEMES.

The Summarie.

Orafmuch as yoong Students are ordinarily allured as with a baite by reading of Poets in fuch fort, as willingly they employ their sime therein, confidering that Poefic hath I wot not what Sympathie with the first heats of this age: therefore by good right this prefent diffeourle in placed next unto the former. And alboit, to speake properly it persainesh unto those one symbo read anciens Poets, as well Greeke as Latin, so take heede and beware how they take an impression of dangerous opinions, in regard either of religion or manners; yet a man may comprehend likewife under it all other profan authors, cut of which a minde that is not corrupt may gather prossit, so they be handled wisely and used with discretion. 50 which essent Plutacch delivereth in this treasise good precepts. And after he hath sewed generally, that in Poose there is delight and danger withall: he refused briess those who statty condemness: Then, as he proceede the advertise that this ground and soundation is to be laid, namely, that Poose are tiers; he described hat their sections be, how they ough to be considered, and what the scope and marke is whereat Poose don't aime and shoot: Afterwards he advise the toweigh & ponder well the intention of Poots, unto which they addresse & accommodate their verses; to beware of their repagnara-ces and contradictions: and to the endethat we be not so soone damnified by any dangerous points which they deliver one after another, to oppose against them the opinions and counsels of other persons of bestermarke. Which done, he addesh woreover and faith, That the sentences intermingled here and there in Poets, do reply sufficiently against the evill doctrine that they may seeme to teach elsewhere: also, intaking heed to the diverse significations of words to be rid and freed from great encumbrances and difficulties: discoursing moreover how amanmay make use of their descriptions of vices and vertues: allo, of the words and deeds of those personages whom they bring in: searching unto the reasons and causes of such speeches and discourses : thereout to draw in the end a deeper sense and higher meaning reaching evento Morall Philosophie, and the gentle framing of the minde unto the love of vertue. And for that there be some hard and difficult places, which like unto forked waies, may leave 10 the mindes of the Readers doubtfull and insuspense: he sheweth that it is an easie matter to apply the same well, and that withall, a man may reforme those sentences ill placed, and accommodate them to many things. And in conclusion, framing this discourse to his principall intention, hetreatesh how the praises and dispraises which Poets attribute unto persons, are to be considered: and that we ought to confirme all that which we finde good in such authors by testimonies taken out of Philosophie, the onely scope whereunto young men must tend in reading of Poets.

READING AND HEARING of Poemes and Poets.

Hat which the Poet Philosenus said of siesh, that the sweetest is that which is least siesh. of fish likewise that the most savorie is that which is least sish, let us, O Marcus Sedatus, leave to be decided and judged by those, who as Cato said, had their palats more quicke and sensible than their hearts. But, that yoong men take more pleasure in those Philosophicall discourses, which savour least of Philosophic, and seeme rather spoken in mirth than in earnest, and are more willing to give eare thereto, and suffer themselves more easily to be led and directed thereby, is a thing to us notorious and evi-30

dent. For we fee, that in reading not onely Acfops fables and the fictions of Poets, but also the booke of Herselides entituled Abaris, and that of Ariston, named Lycas; wherein the opinions of Philosophers as touching the soule, are mingled with tales and seigned narrations devifedfor pleafure, they be ravished as one would say with great contentment and delight. And therefore such youthes ought not onely to keepe their bodies sober and temperate in the pleafures of meate and drinke, but also much more to accustome their minds to a moderate delight in those things which they heare and read, using the same temperately as a pleasant and delectable fauce to give a better and more favorie tafte to that which is healthfull, holfome and profitable therein. For neither those gates that be shut in a city do guard the same and secure it for being forced and won, if there be but one standing open to receive and let in the enimies : nor the 40 temperance and continencie in the pleafures of other fenses preserve a yoong man for being corrupted and perverted, if for want of forecast and heed taking he give himselfe to the pleafure onely of the care. But for that the hearing approcheth neerer to the proper feat of reason and understanding (which is the braine) so much the more hurt it doth unto him that receiveth delectation thereby, if it be neglected, and not better heed taken thereto. Now for a smuch haply, as it is neither possible nor profitable, to restraine from the reading and hearing of Poemes, fuch yoong men as are of the age either of my fonne Soclarus, or of your Cleander, let us I praie you, have a carefull eie unto them, as standing more in need of a guide now to direct them in their readings, then they did in times past to stay and dade them when they learned to go. This is the reason, that me thought in dutic I was bound to fend unto you in writing, that which not 50 long fince I discoursed of by mouth, as touching the writings of Poets: to the end that you may reade it your felfe, and if you find that the reasons therein delivered be of no lesse vertue & efficacie than the stones called Amethysts, which some take before and hang about their necks, to keepe them from drunkennesse as they sit at bankets, drinking wine merily; you may impart and communicate the fame to your fonne Cleander, to preoccupate and prevent his nature, which being not dull and heavie in any thing, but every way quicke, lively and pregnant, is more apt and eafie to be led by fuch allurements.

In Polypes head there is to be had,

One thing that good stand another as bad, for that the fless thereof is pleasant and savorie enough in taste to him that seedeth there upon: but (as they say) it causest troublesome dreames in the sleepe, and imprinted in the same taste strange and monitrous visions. Semblablie, there is in Poesie much delectation and pleafure, enough to entertaine and feed the understanding and spirit of a yoong man; yet neverthelesse, hee shall meet with that there which will trouble and cary away his minde into errours, if no his hearing be not well guided and conducted by sage direction. For verie well and fish yit may be said not onely of the land of Aegypt, but also of Poetrie;

Mixed drugs plentie, of well good as bad, Med cines and poisons are thereto be had, which it bringeth foorth and yeeldeth to as many as converse therein. Likewise: Therein sweet love and mantonnesse,

Therein sweet tone and wantownesses, with dalliance, you shall finde;
And sugred words, which do beguile
the best and wifest minde.

For that which is so deceitfull and dangerous therein, toucheth not at all those that be wit20 less fooles, and grosse of conceit. Like as Simonides answered upon a time to one, who demanded of him, Why he did not beguile and circumvent the Thessalams aswell as all other.
Greeks; Because, quoth he, they are too sortish for me to deale withall, and so rude, that I can not skill of deceiving them. Gorgius also the Leontine was woont to say of a Tragedie, That it was a kinde of deceive, whereby he that deceived became more just than he who deceived not;
and he that was deceived, wifer than another who was not deceived. What is then to be done?
Shall we constraine our youth to goe aboord into the Brigantine or Barke of Epicarus, to sale away and slie from Poetrie, by plastring and stopping their eares with hard and strong wase, a Viisse sometimes served those of Ithicae? or rather by environing and defending their judgement with some discourse of true reason, as with a defensative band about it, to keepe and guard them, that they be not caried away with the allurements of pleasure, unto that which might hurt them: Shall we reforme and preserve them?

For fure, Lycurgus, though he was The valiant sonne of stout Dryas, shewed himselfe not wife nor well in his wits, when he went throughout his whole realme and caused all the vines to be cut downe and destroied, because he saw many of his subjects troubled in their braines and drunken with wine: whereas he should rather have brought the nymphes (which are the fpring waters) neerer, and keepe in order that foolish, furious and outragious god Bacchio as Plato faith, with another goddeffe that was wife and fober. For the mingling of water with wine, delaieth and taketh away the hurtfull force thereof: but killeth not 40 withall the holfome vertue that it hath: Even fo we ought not to cut off, nor abolish Poetrie, which is a part and member of the Muses and good literature: But when as the straunge sables and Theatricall fictions therein, by reason of the exceeding pleasure and singular delight that they yeeld in reading them, do spred and swell unmeasurably, readie to enter forcibly into our conceit so farre as to imprint therein some corrupt opinions: then let us beware, put soorth our hands before us, keepe them backe and state their course. But where there is a Grace and Muse met togither, that is to fay, delight conjoigned with fome knowledge and learning: where I fay, the attractive pleasure and sweetenesse of speech, is not without some fruit nor void of utilitie, there let us bring in withall the reason of Philosophie, and make a good medly of pleasure and profit together. For as the herbe Mandragoras growing neere unto a vine, doth by infusion 50 transmit her medicinable vertue into the wine that commeth of it, and procureth in them that drinke afterwards thereof, a more milde defire and inclination to fleepe foundly: Even so, a Poeme receiving reasons and arguments out of Philosophie, and intermingling the same with fables and fictions, maketh the learning and knowledge therein conteined to be right amiable unto young men, and foone to be conceived. Which being fo, they that would be learned and Philosophers indeed, ought not to reject and condemne the works of Poetrie, but rather fearch for Philosophie in the writings of Poëts: or rather therein to practise Philosophie, by using to seeke profit in pleasure, and to love the same: otherwise, if they can finde no goodnesse therein, to be displeased and discontented, and to fall out therewith. And truely this is the very be ginning of knowledge and learning: for according to the Poët sophocles,

Lay well thy ground, what ever thou intend: For a good beginning, makes an happie end.

First and formost therefore, the yoong man whom we would induct and traineto the reading of Pocsie, ought to have nothing in his heart so well imprinted, nor so readie at hand, as this common laying.

Poets all to fay a footh

Arc Liers fout, and fpeake untruth.

And verily as Poets sometimes lie wilfully, so otherwhiles they do it against their wils: wilfully and of purpole, for that being defirous to tickle and pleafe the eares, a thing which most Readers defire and feeke after, they thinke that fimple and plaine veritie is more auftere for that purpose then leasing: For truth recounting a thing as it was done, keeperh to it still, and albeit the iffue and the end thereof haply be unpleafant, yet nevertheleffe the goeth not afide but reporteth it outright: whereas a tale or lie devised for delight, quickly diverteth out of the way, and soone turneth from a thing which greeveth, unto that which is more delightsome. For there is no fong in rime and metre, no trope or figuratine speech, no lostie stile, no metaphor fo fiely borowed, no harmonie, no composition of words, how smoothly soever they run, that 20 carieth the like grace, and is either fo attractive or retentive, as a fabulous narration well couched, artificially enterlaced, and aptly delivered. But as a picture drawen to the like, the colour is more effectuall to moove & affect our fense, then the simple purtraying and first draught, by reason of a certaine resemblance it hath to the personage of man or woman, which deceiveth our judgement: Evenfo, in Poëmes, a lie intermingled with some probabilitie and likelihood of a truth doth excite and ftirre more, yea and pleafe better by farre, than all the arte and ftudie that a man is able to employeither in composing excellent verses, or enditing any polished profe, without enterlarding fables and fictions Poeticall. Whereupon it came to paffe, that Secrates who all his life time made great profession to be a desender and mainteiner of the truth, being minded upon a time to take in hand Poetrie, by occasion of certeine dreames and visions 30 appearing unto him in his fleepe: in the enterprise whereof finding himselfe to have no aptnefie nor grace at all in deviling lies, did into verfe certaine fables of Aefope, supposing verilic there could be no Poësie where there were no lies. Many sacrifices we know to have beene celebrated without piping and danneing. But never was there knowen any Poetrie, but it was grounded upon some vaine fables & loud leasing. The verses of Empedocles and Parmendes, the booke of Nicander entituled Therfara, where he treateth of the biting and flinging of venemous serpents, and of their remedies, Themorall sentences of Theognis are writings which borrow of Poetrie their loftinesse of stile and measure of syllables, to bearethem up mounted on high to avoid the base soote pace (as it were) of prose. When as we read therefore in Poeticall compolitions, any strange and abfurd thing, as touching the Gods, demy-gods, or vertue, spoken by 40 fome worthy personage of great renowne, he that beleeveth such a speech and receive thit as an undoubted truth, wandereth in error and is corrupted in opinion: but he that ever and anon remembreth and setteth before his cies the charmes and illusions that Poetrie ordinarily useth in the invention of lying fables, and can effloones bleffe himfelfe and fay thus thereto,

O queint device, ô fle anderafriegin more changeable than footed Ounces skin: Why jestest thou and yet thy browes doeft knis? deceiving me, yet feem'st to teach me wit.

He I say, shall never take harme, nor admit into his understanding any evill impression, but reprehend and reproove himselse when he search Neptune, and standeth indread, least he shake 50 cleaue and open the earth, and so discoverhell: he will rebuke also himselse when he is offended and angrie with for Apollo the principal * man of all the Greekes, of whom Theta complaineth thus in the Poet Aeschaus, as touching Aehilles her sonne.

Himselfe did sing and say at good of me: bimselfe also at wedding present was: Yet for all this, himselse and none but he, bath slaine and done to death my sonne, also:

He will likewife represse the teares of Achilles now departed, and of Agamention being in hell, who in their defire to revive and for the love of this life; fittetch foorth their impotent and teeble hands. And if it chaunce at any time that he be troubled with passions, and surprised with their enchantments and forcerie, he will not sticke nor seare to say thus unto himselfe,

Make hast and speed, without delay, Recover soone the light of day; Beare well in minde what thou seest heere:

And all report to thy bed feere.

Homer spake this in mith and pleasantly; sitting indeed the discourse, wherein he describe the hell as being in regard of the fiction at ale fit for the eares of women and none els: These be the tables that Poets do seigne voluntarily. But more in number there are which they neither devicenor counterseit, but as they are perswaded and do beleeve themselves, so they would be are us in hand and infect us with the same untruthes, as namely when Homer writeth thus of Impater,

Two loss then of long steeping death, he did in balance put, One for Achilles hardy knyests, and one for Hector stout! But when he pis'd it sust in mids, behold, sor Hectors death Weigh'd downward unto hell beneath: Then Phochus sloot his breath.

To this siction Aeschylus the Poet hath aptly fitted one entire Tragedie, which he intituled Psichosasia, that is to say, the weighing of Soules or ghosts in balance. Wherein he devised to fund at these skales of Impiter, Theth of the one side, and Aurora of the other, praying each of them for their sonnes as they fight. But there is not a man who seeth not cleerely, that this it but a made tale and meete sable devised by Homer, either to content and delight the Reader, or to bring him into some great admiration and assonithment, Likewise in this place:

T'is Iupiter that moovesh warre: He is the cause that men do jarre. As also this of another Poet:

When God above some house will overskrow, He makes debate, twixt mortall men below.

These and such like speeches are delivered by Poëts, according to the very conceit and beliese which they have, whereby the errour and ignorance which themselves are in as touching the nature of the gods they derive and communicate unto us. Semblably, the strange wonders and marvels of Hell; The descriptions by themmade which they depaint unto us by seareful and terrible termes, representing unto us the fantastical apprehensions and imaginations of burning and staming rivers, of hideous places and horrible terments: there are not many men but wot well ynough that therein be tales and lies good store: no otherwise than in meates and viands, you shall sinde mixed otherwhiles hursfull poyson, or medicinable drugs. For neither Homer nor Pindarm, nor Sephoeles, have written thus of Hell, beleeving certainely that there 40 were any such things there:

From whence the dormans rivers dead of blacke and hady night, Cass up huge milts and clouds full darke, that overwhelme the light: Likewise.

The Ocean coast they failed still along, Fast by the clifs of Leucas rocke among. As also.

Here boyling waves of gulfe so deepe do swell, Where lies the way and downfall into hell.

And as many of them as bewailed and lamented for death as a most piteous and woful thing, or feared want of sepulture as a miserable and wretched case, untered their plaints and griefes in these and such like words:

For sake me not unburied so, Nor unbewaited when you go.

Semblably,

Semblably. And then the foule from body flew, and as to hell the went, She did her death, her loffeof strength and yout bfull yeeres lament. Likewise. Doe not me kill before my time, for why? to fee this light Is sweet : force me not under earth, where nothing is but night.

These are the voices I say of passionate persons, captivate before to error and false opinions. And therefore they touch us more neerely, and trouble us fo much the rather, when they finde us likewife poffessed of such passions and feeblenes of spirit, from whence they proceed. In which regard we ought to be prepared betimes, and provided alwaies before hand to encounter and withstand such illusions; having this sentence readily evermore resounding in our cares as it were from a trunke or pipe, That Poetrie is fabulous, and maketh smal reckoning of Truth. As for the truth indeed of these things, it is exceeding hard to be conceived & comprehended even by those who travell in no other businesse, but to search out the knowledge and understanding of the thing, as they themselves do confesse. And for this purpose these verses of Empedocles would be alwaies readic at hand, who faith that the depth of fuch things as thefe

Reading and hearing of

No eie of man is able to perceive : No eare to heare, nor first to conceive. Like as these also of X enophanes. Never was man nor ever will be, Able to found the veritie Of those things which of God I write,

Or of the world I do endite. And I affure you, The very words of Socrates in Place imply no leffe, who protesteth and bindeth it with an oath, that he cannot attaine to the knowledge of these matters. And this will be a good motive to induce young men to give lesse credit unto Poëts, as touching their 30 certaine knowledge in these points, wherein they perceive the Philosophers themselves so doubtfull and perplexed, yea and therewith fo much troubled.

Also the better shall we stay the mind of a yoong man & cause him to be more warie, if at his first entrance into the reading of Poëts, we describe Poetrie unto him: giving him to understand that it is an art of Imitation, & a science correspondent every way to the feat of painting; and not onely must be be acquainted with the hearing of that vulgar speech so common in every mans mouth, that Poësie is a speaking picture, and picture a dumbe Poësie : but also we ought to teach him, that when we behold a Lizard or an Ape wel painted, or the face of Ther fites lively drawen, we take pleasure therein & praise the same wonderfully; not for any beautie in the one or in the other, but because they are so naturally counterseited. For that which is soule of it selfe & ilfavo- 40 red in the owne nature, cannot be made faire & feemly: but the skil of refembling a thing wel, be the same saire or be it soule, is alwaies commended: wheras contratiwise, he that takes in hand to purtray an ilfavoured bodie, and makes thereof a faire & beautifull image, shall exhibite a fight neither feemely nor decent. Some painters you shall have to delight in painting of strange, foolish and absurd actions: as for example Timomachus represented in a table the picture of Medea, killing her owne children: Theen painted Orestes murthering his owne mother: Parrhafius described with his penfill, the counterfeit race and madnesse of Visses, and Cherephanes purtrayed the wanton dalliance, and dealing of men and women together unfeemely. With which arguments and fuch like, a yoong man is to be made acquainted, that he may learne thereby how the thing it felfe is not praise woorthie, whereof he feeth the expresse estimate, 50 but the art and cunning of the workeman who could fo artificially draw the same to the life. Semblably, for asimuch as Poësie representeth many times by way of imitation, filthie actions, leand affections, and vicious manners: it is the part of a yoong man to know thus much, That the thing which is admired therein and found to be fingular, he ought not either to receive as true, or proove as good, but to praise it so far foorth onely as it is besitting the person, or appropriate to the subject matter. For like as when we heare the grunting of a swine, the creaking of a cart wheele, the whistling noise of the winde, or the roaring of the sea, we take no pleasure therein, but are troubled and discontented: but contrariwise, if a merie fellow or jester can pretily counterfeit the fame, as one Parmeno could grunt like a fwine, and Theodorus creake like the faid wheeles, we are delighted therewith. Also, as we shun a diseased person, and a Lazar full of filthy ulcers, as an unpleafant and hideous spectacle to beholde: but when we looke upon Philacletes purtraied by Aristophon; and queene locasta by Silanian: namely, how they be described to pine away, and ready to yeeld up the ghost, we receive no small contentment thereby: even fo a young man when hee thall reade what the ridiculous jefter Ther fites, or the amorous and 10 wanton spoiler of maiden, Sifyphus, or the beaftly bawd Betrochus, is brought in by Poets to sav or doe; let him be advertised and instructed to praise the art and sufficiencie of the Poet, who knew how to paint the fame so lively and naturally: but withall to blame, reject, and detest the acts and conditions which are thus represented. For there is a great difference betweene resembling a thing well, and a thing that is fimply good: for when I fay Well, I meane aptly, decently and properly: and so acts filthic and dithonest, are fit and beforeing for lewd and unhonest persons. For the shoes of that lame creple Demonides, which he prayed to God might serve his feer that had stollen them from him, were in themselves misshapen and ilfavoured; howbeit, proper and fit for him: As for this speech, If lawes of right and equitie

> What man alive would not begin To do all wrong, a crowne to win? And this: Put on the face, I thee advise, Of him that is just and right wife : But fee no deeds thou do for let, Whereby thou maift some profit get. Alfo: Vnlesse I may may talent gaine As clere as gift, I am in paine. Likewise: How fhall I live or take repose, In case this talent 1 do lose? Nay sleepe I will and feare no hell, Nor torments there, but thinke all well: What wrong I do, what plots I fet,

In any case may broken be,

My silver talent for to get. Wicked words they be all, and most false; howbeit, befeeming such as Escocles and Ixion were, and becomming well an olde Viurer. If therefore wee would aduertife yoong men, that 40 Poets write thus, not as if they praised and allowed such speeches, but as they know full well that they be lewd and naughtie, fo they do attribute them unto as wicked and godlesse persons, they should never take harme by any evill impressions from Poets: but contrariwise, the prejudicate opinion infinuated first, of such & such a man, will presently breed a suspition both of word and deed to be bad, as spoken and done by a bad and vicious person. Such an example is that of Paris in Homer, who flying out of the battell, went presently to bed unto faire Helena. For seeing that the Poet reporteth of no man els, but only of this unchast adulterous Paris, that he lay with his wife in the day time: it is an evident proofe that he reputed and judged fuch incontinencie to be reprochfull, and therefore made report thereof to his blame and shame both. In these cafes also it would be well considered whether the Poët himselfe do not give some plaine demon-50 strations emplying thus much, that he misliketh such speeches, and is offended therewith, as Menander did in the Prologue of that Comedic, which he entituled Thais.

> Oladie Muse now belpe me to endite Of this fo bolde and unshamefaced queane, Tet beautifull: who also hath a shrite Perswafeve, and with words can earie cleane

Reading and hearing of

The wrongs that she unto her lovers all Doth offer; whom she shutteth out of dores,
And yet for gifts she still of them doth call,
And picks their purse, which is the cast of whores,
She none doth love, and yet she semblance makes

That are fre will, poore heart, for all their sakes.

And verily in this kinde, Homer among all other Poets doth excell, and useth fuch advertisements with best discretion: for it is ordinarie with him both to premise some reprehension and blame of evill speeches, and also to recommend the good. And for an instance heereof, in this wise he giveth commendation of a good speech,

And then anon, this speech right commendable He spake, which was both sweet and profitable.

Approching then, he stood unto him nere, And stated him soone with words that gentle were.

And tratea non-joine with new as that general terms. Semblably on the other fide, reprooving bad and lewd fpeeches, he in a manerdoth protest that himselfe misliketh of them, and therewith denounceth likewise, and doth intimate unto the readers thus much in effect. That they should make no use thereof, nor take regard, otherwise than of wicked things and dangerous examples: as namely when he purposed to describe the rude and grosse terms that Agamemon gave unto the Priest of Apollo, when he abused him 20 unreverently, he premised this before;

This nothing pleased Atreus some, K. Agamemnon hight;

But him he badly did intreat, and use with all despish.

By this word Badly, he meaneth rudely, proudly, didainfully, without regard of dutie or decencie. As for Achilles he attributeth unto him these rash and outragious speeches, Thou drunken fot and dogs face that thou art Thou courage hast no more then fearfull Hart.

But he inferred withall his owne judgement as touching those words in this maner,

Achilles then fir Peleus sonne, still boiling in his blood

Gave Agamemon words againe unfeemely and not good.

For it is not like that any thing could be well and decently spoken proceeding from such anger and bitter choler, he observet the same not in words onely but also in deeds. For thus he saith,

No fooner had he flock the word, but presently hement To worthy Hector much differace, whose body up he hent, He strips and spoiled it full soone, and then hard by the bed Of sir Patrochus he it laid, and groweling there it spred.

He nicht allo filly to the purpose pretie reprehensions after things be done, delivering his own sentence, as it were by way of a voice given, touching that which was either done or said a little before: As for example, after the narration of the adultery betweene Mars and Venus, he reported that the gods spake in this fort:

Lewd Acts do never better speed; Lo how the slow and lame

Can overtake him him who for strength and swiftnes hath the name!

And in another place, upon the audatious presumption and proud vaunting of Hector, thus he Thefe words he spake in braverie and swelling pride of heart, But Lady Luno was displeas d, and tooke them in ill part. Likewise as touching the arrow that Pandarus shot, faith,

No fooner Pallas faid the word, but foolish mindedman, He was perswaded, and therewith streight waies to shoote began.

And these be the sententious speeches, & opinions of Poets, by them expressly uttered, which 50 any man may soone find & easily discerne, if he will but take heed & give regard unto them. But yet over & besides these testimonies, they furnish us also with other instructions by their owne deeds. For thus it is reported of Emipides, that when upo a time some revited Ixion & reproched him by the termes of Godlesse, Wicked & Accursed: he answered, True indeed quoth he, and therefore I would not suffer him to be brought for the Stage, before I had set him fast upon the wheele, wheele, & broken both his armes & legs. True it is that this kinde of Doctrine in Homer is after a fort mute & not delivered in plaine & expresse termes: but if a man will conder more neerely, even those fables & fictions in him, which are most blamed & found fault withall, there may be found therein a profitable inflruction & covert speculation: And yet somethere be who wiest & writhe forcibly the faid fables another way by their Allegories, (for fo they call in these daies those speeches wherein one thing is spoken & another ment, whereas in times past they were termed Hypponaa, for the hidden meaning couched under them) whereby they would make us beloeve that the fiction as touching the adulteric of Mars & Venus fignifieth thus much, That when the Planet of Mars, is in conjunction with that of Venus in some Horoscopes and Nati-10 vities, fuch perfons then borne shall bee enclined to adulteries: but if the Sun do then arife, paffe, and overtake them, then fuch adulteries are in danger to be discovered and the parties to be taken in the very act. Now as touching Into how the embellitheth and adorned herfelie before Iupiter, as also the fiction and forcerie about the needle worke girdle and Tiffue which the borowed of Venus, they would have it to fignific a certaine purging and cleering of the aire, as it approcheth necre to the fire: as if the Poet himfelfe gave not the interpretation and exposition of fuch doubts: For in the tale of the adulterie of Venue, he meaneth nothing els, but to teach them that gave care thereto, how wanton musicke, lascivious songs, and speeches grounded upon evill arguments and conteining naughtie matters, corrupt our maners, induce us to a luxurious, loofe and effeminate life, and caufe men to be subject unto pleasures, delights, sen-20 fualitie and luft, and given over to the love of women: as also

To chaunge eft soones their beds of costly price, I heir rich array, hote baines, and ech device.

And therefore the fame Homer bringeth in Visifes, commanding the Musician who fung to the Harpe, in this wife Digreffe good fir from such leved fongs, and ballads vaine as these. Singrather of the Trojan horse: you shall us therein please.

Giving us thereby a good instruction, that Minstrels, Musicians and Poets should receive the matter and argument of their compositions from wise men, sober, sage and vertuous. And as touching that sible of sume, so the sum of the s

Thou shalt then know that wanton love and daliance in bed, Whereby thou earst hast me deceived, shall serve thee in small sted.

For the shew and representation of wicked deeds, if there be propounded withall the shame and loffe which befalleth unto them that have committed the fame, doth no hurt at all, but rather much good unto the hearers. As for Philosophers verily, they use examples taken out of historics, to admoniff and instruct the readers, even by such things as be at hand, and either are or 40 have beene really fo: but Poets do in deed the fame, and in effect, howbeit they devife and invent matter of their owne heads, they feigne fables I fay, fitting their purpose. Certes like as Melanthin faid, betweenebord and goodearnest, that the citie of Athens stood upright on foote and was preferred by meanes of the divition, discorde and trouble which was among oratours and Politicians; for that all the citizens leaned not altogither to a fide, nor bare levelly upon one and the fame wall, and so by reason of the variance which reigned among the States men, there was evermore some one counterpoise or other, weighing even against that which endamaged the common-weale: even so the contradictions that are found in the writings of Poets, which draw the affent and beleefe of the readers reciprocally to and fro, and leave matters ambiguous and doubtfull, area cause that they be not of so great moment and weight, as to en-50 damage or endaunger much. When as therefore we meet with fuch repugnant places among them, which being laid neere togither do implie evident contraricties, we ought to encline to the lafer fide and favor the better part, As namely in these verses,

The Gods in many things, my fonne, Have men decerved and them undone. But contrariwife, what faith the fonne againe?

Although it come by false meanes and unmeete.

Deceitfull lies and false language,

Bring forth no fruit, that will beare age.

Reply we ought and fay thus: We have heard you fing in another tune:

Furthermore to encounter these speeches which are delivered as touching riches;

All meanes and plots we may addresse,

To worke and compasse our foes distresse,

The joy we gaine by fraud and trecherie, offended with the Poët in this case; but rather thinke they be words either merily spoken, or only to represent the nature of some person, & with him only to be displeased. Moreover, against 20 these sictions in Homer, when he reporteth how the gods fall toge ther by the cares, and throw that they be at variance and debate: you may if you will by and by oppose that which he him-

                 Likewise:
           The Gods themselves are void of care:
           Sadnesse and sorrow mens lots they are.
   For these are the true and safe conceptions which we ought to have as touching the Gods:

      The Reader may alleage many opposite sentences of Sephaeles, and these among the rest:
              I fee no cause, but men in povertie,
              May be advauned to place of dignitie.

              And then with restlesse cares torment lamselfe,
                 And take bad cour ses the same to maintaine?
      And Menander verily in one place hath highly praised and extolled sensual lust and concupiscence, whereby he set them forward who are of an hot nature, and of themselves prone to voluptuousnes, namely, in these and such like amatorious words:
              What creatures soever do live and see
                 I he sun light joys that common treasure, Are all, have beene, and ever skall be

      Howbeit, in another the same Poet hath turned us about, and forcibly drawen us unto hone-ftie, repressing and bridling the insolent surie of a loose and luxurious life, saying in this wise:
              A filthie life though pleasant for the while,
              With hame at last, doth all delights defile.
      These sayings are in some fort contrarie to the former, but far better and more profitable every way. And therefore the fetting together and confideration of fuch contradictoric fentences, will bring foorth one of thefetwo effects: for either it will draw yoong men to the better way, or at leaftwife derogate the credit of the woorst.
     But if peradventure it come to paffethat the Poëts themselves do not solve and salve those strange and abfurd fayings, which they feeme to set abroad: it were not amisse to oppose against them, the contrarie fentences of other famous authors: and when wee have weighed and compared them in balance, to make proofe thereby which are the better. As for example, if haply Alexis the Poët hath prevailed with some by these verses of his;
              If men be wife above all they will chuse
              By all meanes their pleasures to compasse and use.

              As for the rest, I hold accessarie.
      We must call to minde and remember, that the fage Socrates was of another opinion and spake the contrarie: for he was woont to say that the wicked lived for to eate and drinke; but the vertuous didboth eat and drinke, to live. Semblably, to meete with this verse of the Poët who Fight with like lew dnes, and be thou as skrewd.

Bidding us in some fort to accommodate and frame our selves like to the lewd and wicked: we may be readic with that notable Apophthegme of Diogenes, who being asked how a man might be revenged best of his enemie, answered thus, If (quoth he) thou shew thy selfe a good and honest man. The wisedome also of the said Diogenes we must set against the Poet Sophoeles, who troubled the minds and consciences of many thousands, with distrust and dispaire, by writing these verses as touching the religion and confraternity in the Mysteries of Ceres:

How happie men and thrice happy are they Whose fortune it is, the secrets to see Of Mysteries so sacred : and streight way Downe into hell, forto descend with glee: For they alone in bliffe shall live for ay:

The rest in bale, must suffer paine alway. How now, quoth Diogenes, when he heard fuch verses read: Saist thou so indeed? And shall PARACIAN the notorious theefe be in better state after this life when he is once departed, only because he was entred and professed in the orders of this confraternitie, than good Epiminondas? As for Timothem, when upon a time in the audience of a full Theatre, he chaunted a Poeme which he had compiled in the honor of Diana, wherein he stilled her with the Attributes and Epithets, of Menas, Thyas, Phabas and Lyllas, which fignific, Furious, Enraged, Poffeffed, and starke Mad : Cinnesias presently cried presently aloud unto him , I would thou haddest a 20 daughter of thine owne with fuch qualities. The like elegant answere Bion is reported to have made unto Theognis. For when Theognis came out with these verses, Aman held downe with povertie can nothing do or fay: For why? his tongue wants libertie, and somewhat dothit stay.

Bion heating them, How commeth it then to passe quoth he, that thou thy selfe being but a beggarkeepell fuch a prating as thou doeft, and with thy vaine babling and garrulitie troublest

Moreover we must not in any wife omit and let passe the occasions which are ministred out 30 of the words and fentences either adjoyning, or intermingled with those speeches, for to reforme and correct the fame: But like as Phylicions are of opinion, that notwithstanding the greene Flies Cantharides be of themselves venemous and a deadly poison; yet their wings and feete are helpefull and holfome: yea and of vertue to frustrate and kill the malice of the said flies: even to in the Poemes and writings of Poets, if there be one Nowne or Verbe hanging to a sentence that we seare will do harme, which Nowne or Verbe may in some fort weaken the faid hurtfull force, we are to take hold thereof, and to fland upon the fignification of fuch words more at large, as some do in these verses,

This honour duc to wretched men we keepe Our haire to cut, and over them to weepe. As also in these,

We men, Alas most miferable, live In paine and griefe, this lot the gods do give.

For the Poet doth not simply affirme that the gods have predestinate all men simply to live in woe & forrow, but this he speaketh of foolish and witlesse folke, who being ordinarily lewd and naught, and therefore milerable and wretched for their wickednes, he is woont to call Jenais & di Tupes.

Another way there is belides, to turne the doubtfull and suspected sentences in poeticall writings to the better fense, which otherwise might be construed in the worse part: namely, by interpreting words to the fignification wherein they are ufually taken: wherein it were better to 50 exercise a yong man, than in the interpretations of obscure termes, which we call Glosses. And verily a point this is favouring of great learning, and full befides of delectation: as for example, To know how the word from in Poëts signifieth, is as much to say, as ill death or a bad end; for that the Macedonians use to call death Javos. Likewise the Acolians do terme victorie which is atchieved by long fuffering, continuall perseverance and abiding, requesti. Also among the Dryopians, those be named Tloral, who with other are called Damones, i. Saints or Heavenlie wights. Furthermore, it is not onely expedient, but necessarie also, if we would receive good, and not harme, by the reading of Poets; to know certeinly, how and in what fignification they take the proper names of gods, as also the appellative words of good and evill things. Likewise what they meane by the vocables we i, the foule; or wifer, i, farall destinie. Namely, whether these termes be taken by them in one sence, or have many fignifications? The same is to be said of many other words befides: for example fake, this Nowne 3 nos fomtimes fignifieth an addifice or dwelling house, as when Homer faith, Bizoves vivespov. To the house built with an highroofe. 10 otherwhiles it betokeneth goods and substance: as in this piece of a verse.

Editti por onos. My house is eaten. i. My goods are wasted and consumed.

Also this word giorss is taken in one place for life; as namely in these verses; dueviva oer Sear dix plui μυανος είναι πισειθύων βιότοιο μεγήρας. God Neptune with his haire fo blacke, enywing him long life, Defightfully his daies cut fhort, and ended all the firife.

But in another for goods and riches: to wit, Bione Stoi anor San. Meane while do others frend my goods.

Semblably the Verbe dates, you shall finde put for to fret, be discontented and ill apaied: as when the Poet writeth thus;

'Ως εφωθ' είθ' άλύεσ' άπεβίσατο, τείρετο

40

Which faid, fre feemed male-content,

And wounded so; away she went.

And yet it is used sometime, for to joy and vaunt: as namely in the same Poet;

n anders on Trov evixnous tov ancidu.

And do you brag and boaft fo much in deed, Poore Irus that you beat in beggers weed.

In like fort the Verbe Sodjew, fignifieth either to moove or stirre with great violence : as in Euripides. Κήτος Βοάζον εξάτλαντικής άλος.

A whale out of th' Atlanticke sea, we might descrie from land Most forcibly to swimme, and then to shut himselfe on land. or to fit downe and take repofe: as for example, when Sophocles faith thus, τίνας πόθ' είθεας τάς δεμοι Βοάζετε ι η τικίοις η λάθδισην έξες εμμθρόις.

My friends what meane you in this wife fo strangely for to fit, With branches dight about your heads, which suppliants doe be fit ?

40 Moreover, it is verie pretie and commendable, when a man meeteth with words of divers acceptions, to make use thereof accordingly, and to accommodate them to the present occasions and subject matters: like as the Grammarians teach us to doe in vocables that admit fundry senfes; as for example,

Youman well praise a little barke or barge, But fee with wares, a mightie hulke you charge.

Here the Verbe einer, fignifieth imagein, i, to praise: and yet now in this place (to praise) is as much to fay, as to refuse and reject : Like as in our common and daily speech wee use to say, rands in it is wel: or when we bid referred it: meaning by thefe terms, that we like not 50 of a thing, or will none of it, nor accept thereof. And herevpon it is that some say, Proferpina is called ment which is as much to fay as a goddeffe blamed and to be found fault with. This difference then, and diffinction in the fignifications of words, is principally to be observed in marters that be more ferious and of greater confequence, to wit, in the names of gods. To beginne therefore with them, let us advertise and seach young men, that Poets in using the names of gods, sometimes meane thereby their very nature and effence : otherwhiles they attribute the homonymie of the fame names, to the powers & vertues which the gods do give, and wherof they be the authours. And here there presenteth himselfe unto me the Poet archilechus, when in his praier he faith thus;

Kaŭ di avač noase, &c. O Vulcan king be gracious unto me, And heare my praices, thus kneeling on my knee Devously: Grant, I Jay, this my request As thou are wont, to whom thou love ft beft.

It is veric cleere and evident that he doth invocate the god Palean himselfe, and calleth him by his proper name. But when hee bewaileth his fifters husband, who perished and was drow- 10 ned in the fea, by which accident he wanted his due fepulture, he faith, that he could have borne this calamitie and misfortune the better,

If that his head and lovely limmes in pure white clothes iclad, As doth beseeme a faire dead corps, Vulcan confumed had.

By which word Vulcan, he meaneth fire, and not the god himlelfe. Againe, when Euripides in his oth useth these words.

By love I sweare and bloodie Mars him by,

Who beare great swar among the stars in sky.

Certaine it is, that he speaketh of the verie gods Iupiter and Mars: But when Sophocles

Full blind is Mars, faire Dames (I say) and nothing he doth see, But tike wilde bore he havocke makes and works al miserie.

You must understand that he speaketh of war: Like as in these verses of Homer:

Whose blood along Scamanders streame, so deeply died in red,

That blacke againe it is therewith, now Trenchant Mars hath shed.

It is meant the edge of the fword and other weapons made of braffe and fteele: which being fo, and confidering that there be many other wordes of double and divers fignifications, we ought to learne and beare in mind, that the very names of Dies and Zluis, which fignific Impiter, 30 in one place they attribute to the god himfelfe, in another to Fortune, and oftentimes to Deftiny and Fatall necessitie. For when they fay

Zeo ming idnder meden. o Iupiter who from Ida hill Do'streigne as King and worke thy will.

Ω Ζεί τις είναι ς κοί σε σορώπερος. O Inpiter who dare avow

That he can wifer be than thow? Plaine it is that they meane nothing else but the god Iupiter himselfe. But when they give 48 the Denomination, aids, to the causes whereupon all things depend, and do say in this wise:

Andmany a flour and valiant knight who fought in pitched field, Before due time there lost their lives and vitall breath didyeeld.

Dics d' ÉTELESETO BELIS.

i. This was the wit of mightie love Who wrought all this from heaven above.

Surely we must understand by love Farall destinie: For we must not imagine that the Poce thinketh God to devile and practite any evill against men: but he giveth us to understand by the way as touching the Farall necessitie of all humaine affaires, that Cities, Armies, and Generall Captaines are predestined to fortunate successe and victorie over their enemies, if 59 they be wife and governe their affections well. But contrariwife, if they be passionate and fall into errors and misdeineanors, growing to quarrels and debates one against another, as these did, of whom the Poet spake, it cannot be avoided but they shall commit many outrages, breed troubles and confusion, and at the last come to an unhappie end:

And Destime inevitable:

Badcounfels of imquitie

Bring forth fruits thereto answerable. Now whereas the Poet Hefodus bringeth in Prometheus, perswading his brother Epimetheus

To take no gifts in any wife Which Iupiter from heaven hath fent :

But them alwaies for to despise

And send them backe as discontent. He useth the name of Inpiter for the puissance of Fortune: for by the gifts of that god, meato neth the goods of Fortune, to wit, Riches, Mariages, States and Dignities, and generally all outward bleffings: the poffeffion whereof is unprofitable unto those that know not how to use them well. Esteeming therefore no better of Epimethem than of a lewd & foolish fellow, he supposeth that he ought to take heed, & beware of prosperitie whereby he was like to receive hurt and losse: yea and to come unto a mischiese in the end. Semblably, when the same Poet saith: Reproch no man while that you live

With povertie which gods do give.

He understandeth hereby the gift of the gods, a thing meere casuall and comming by Fortune: implying thus much, that those men are not to be blamed and accused, who by some misfortune are become poore: but rather, that povertie proceeding by occasion of sloth, idle-20 nes, eafe, delicate wantonneffe, walffull and foolish expences, is shame-woorthic and reprochable. For Poëts and others being not acquainted with the word Fortune, which as yet was not in use, and knowing full well, that the power of this variable and inconstant cause, raunging disorderly as it did without any certaine purpose and determinate ende, was mightie, and could not possibly be avoided by any humaine wit, reason and policie, they expressed the same by the names of the gods: much like as we in our daily speech and ordinary language, are woont commonly to give unto divers actions and affaires, to the conditions, natures and maners of fundry persons to speeches and orations; yea and (believe me) to men themselves, the termes of Heavenly and Divine. Well, a very good and expedient meane this is whereby we are to reforme and correct many fentences and verfes, which feeme at the first fight to carrie with them any 30 abfurditie and incongruity, as touching Inpiter: as namely thefe,

Two tunnes within the entrie stand Of love his house with lots both full: One hath successe and winning hand, The other loffes forrow-full.

As judge aloft fat Iupiter without regard of oth Or sovenant: and shewed signes of mischiefe to them both.

And then began the missbiefes all of Greekes and Trojans both, For Iupiter his pleasure wrought and with ech side was wroth.

Allthis we must interpret either of Fatall destinie or of Fortune, potent causes both, which neither are comprehensible within our understanding, nor yet evitable within the compasse of our power. But where we read of any thing attributed unto Iupiter, which is conformable to reason, hath semblance of truth, and is beseeming his person, there we are to thinke that the said name fignifieth the god himselfe: as for example,

Sir Hector then advanne'd him selfe, and all the ranks beside Of Greeks did brave, expecting who his chalenge would abide. Onely the some of Telamon, Ajax that woorthy knight, He did avoid : for Iupiter umo him had a fught. Alfo

And

Such great affaires of mortall men Aremanag'd ay by Iupiter: But smaller matters now and then Topety-gods he doth refer.

Furthermore, we ought to have adiligent ele to other words, which may be turned and transferred to many things, and are taken in divers fenfes by Poets. Of which fort is the name of Ageril. i. Vertue. For by reason that vertue not only causeth men to be wise, prudent, just, & honeft both in word and deed: but also purchaseth ordinarily unto them, honour, glorie, authoritie and reputation in the world: therfore they give the name of Vertue unto renowme, power, and might: like as the Olive fruit, they call by the name estate. i. Olive tree, and the Beech-maft they terme also oness aswell as the Beech tree. Our yong man then, as he readeth in a Poet,

Reading and hearing of

The gods before vertue have fet Labour, travell, and painfull swet. Or thus, The Greeks by vertue then downe bare Their squadron thicke and battell square. Likewise,

If die we must, most glorious is death, For vertue, when we found our vitall breath, presently ought to conceive thus much, That all is spoken of the best, most excellent, and divinest habitude in us, which we understand to be the verie rectitude and rule of reason and judgement, the heighth and perfection of our reasonable humaine nature, yea, and the disposition of the foule, accordant with it felfe. But when he readeth againe these other verses there, Vertue in men love causeth for to grow And fade: by him it doth both ebbe and flow. As also, let him not by and by fet him downe, and by occasion of these words have the rich in woonderfull great admiration, as if they could anon buy vertue for money, and with their wealth have it at command: let him not thinke, I fay, that it lieth in the power of Fortune, either to augment or to diminish vertue : but rather deeme thus, and make this construction, that the Poet under the name Vertue, fignifieth Worship, Authoritie, Power, Prosperitie, or some such matter. For so the word resons is sometimes taken by them in the native and proper signification, for a naughtic and wicked disposition of the minde, as when Hesiodus writeth thus, 30

Of wickednesse a man may evermore Have foison great and plenteous store.

But otherwile it is used for some other evill calamitie or infortunitie, as by Homer, Men quickly age and waxen olde, Er ruxotum, with hunger and cold, &c.

And much were he deceived, who should perswade himselfe that Poets take beatitude and blesfednesse, which in Greeke is called and purity, so precisely as Philosophers doe; who understand thereby, an absolute habitude, and entire possession of all good things, or rather an accompliflied perfection of this life, holding on a prosperous course according to nature : for many times Poets abuse this word, calling a man bleffed and happie, who is rich in world goods; and 40 giving the terme of felicitic and happinesse unto great power, fame and renowme. As for Homer, he useth verily these termes aright and properly in this verse, would reveal to the same of

Although much wealth I do holde and enjoy, Yet in my heart I take no bleffed joy. So doth Menander when he writeth thus, Of goods I have and money great flore, And all men call me rich therefore: But yet how rich foewer I feeme, and make on & succeeding a summer with his to Happie and blest none doth me deeme: A continuent of the Linguistical L unlesse a man, as I said before, take these termes as spoken metaphorically or by the figure REMIXEMOS. i. the abustion of them; otherwise than in their proper sense. And thus much may ferve as touching this point.

Now for this that remaineth behind, yoong men would be put in remembrance and admonished not once but oftentimes, that Poesie, having for her proper subject an argument to be expressed by imitation; howsoever she useth the ornaments & beautifull furniture of figurative speeches, in fetting out and describing those matters and actions which are presented moro her, yet nevertheleffe the doth not forgo the refemblance and likelihood of truth. For that imitation indeed delighteth the Reader fo long onely as it carieth fome thew of probabilitie. And to therefore that imitation which feemeth not altogether to fquare and depart from the rule of veritie, doth expresse the signes of vertues and vices both at once, entermingled one with another in actions. Such is the Poeme and composition written by Homer, which resteth not in the strange opinions and paradoxes of the Stoicks, who holde, That neither any evill at all can fort with vertue, ne yet one jot of goodnesse with vice: but he hath bidden farewell to such precise politions; namely, That a foolish and lewd person, in all his actions, when and wheresoever, doth offend and finne: and femblably, the wife and vertuous man, at all times and in all places, can not chuse but do every thing well. These are the principles which the Stoicks schooles refound withall. Howbeit, in the affaires of this world, and in our dayly life and converfation, as Euripdes faith,

> It cannot be in everie point, That good and bad should be disjoint: But in all actions me dayly fee, One with another medled will be.

But the Art of Poetrie fetting apart the truth in deede, useth most of all varietie and fundry formes of phrases. For, the diversimitations are they, that give to sables that vertue to moove affections & passions in the readers: these are they that worke strange events in them, even contrarie to their opinion and expectation: upon which ensueth the greatest woonder, and altonifhment, wherein lieth the chiefe grace, and from whence proceedeth the most delight and pleafure, whereas, contratiwife, that which is simple and uniforme, is not patheticall nor hath in 20 it any fiction. Heereupon it is that Poets bring not in the same persons alwaies winners, alwaies happy and doing wel: and that which more is, when they feigne that the gods themselves meddle in mens affaires, they describe them not without their passions, nor yet exempt from errors & faults, for feare, left that part of their Poefie which stirreth up the affection, & holdeth in suspense and admiration the mindes of men, should become idle and dull, for want of some danger and adverfarie as it were to excite and quicken it: which being fo, let us bring a yoong man to the reading of Poets works, not fore-stalled and possessed before with such an opinion as touching those great and magnificall names of ancient worthies, as if they had beene wife and just men, or vertuous Princes in the highest degree of perfection, and as a man would faie, the very Canon rule, and paterne of all vertue, uprightnes and integritie: Otherwise he should 40 receive great damage thereby, in case I say he were of this minde to approove and have in admiration all that they did or faid as fingular; and to be offended at nothing that he heareth from them: neither would be allow of him, who blameth and findeth fault with them when they either do or fay fuch things as thefe.

> O father Iove, ô Phoebus bright, ô Pallas maiden pure: That you would all bring this about and make in twaine secure, That not one Trojane might escape nor Greeke remaine aline But we two knights: That we (I (ay) and none but we belive May win the honor of this warre, and onely reape the joy Of victory, to race the wals and stately towres of Troy,

Likewise

Likewise

With concubine of Father mine she counseld me to lie, The old mans curse that I might have : persivaded so did I. And in another place,

O Iupiter whom men do father call, thou art a God most mischievous of all.

Let not a yoong man in any wife be accustomed to praise such speeches: neither let him secke any colourable pretenfes to cloke and excule wicked and infamous acts: he must not be studious and cunning in fuch inventions, to flew therein his fubtilitie and promptneffe of wir. But rather he is to thinke thus, that Poesse is the veric imitation of maners, conditions and lives, 10 yea and of men, such as are not altogither perfect, pure and irreprehensible, but in whom palfions, falle opinions and ignorance beare fome fway, yet fo, as many times by the dexteritie and goodnesse of nature they be reformed and disposed to better water. When a yoong man then is thus prepared, and his understanding so framed, that when things are well done and faid, his heart is mooved and affected therewith as by some heavenly instinct: and contrariwise not well pleased with lewed deeds or words, but highly offended thereat, certes, such instruction of his judgement will be a meanes that he shal both heare and read any Poemes without hurt and danger. But he that admirethal, & applieth himselse so, that he embraceth every thing, he I say, that commeth with a judgement devoted and enthralled to those magnificent and heroicke names, like unto those disciples who counterfeited to be crump shouldred and buncht backe like their 20 mafter Plate, or woulds needs flur, flammer and maffle as Aristotle did: furely fuch a one will take no greatheed, but soone apprehend and interteine many evill things. Moreover this young beginner of ours ought not to be affected after a timorous and superstitious manner, as they are who being in a temple feare and dread every thing, and are readie to worship and adore what foever they fee or heare: but boldly and confidently to pronounce and fay as occasionserveth, Thisis ill done, or not decently spoken: no lesse than to give his acclamation and confent to that which is well and feemely either faid or done. As for example, Achilles feeing the foldiors how they fell ficke daily in the campe, and not well appaid that the war was thus drawen out in length, especially to the hinderance of his owne honor, being a martiall man, of great prowesse and renowne in the field, assembled a counsell of war and called the 30 Greeks together. But, (as he was a man otherwife well feene in the skill of Phyfick) perceiving by the ninth day past, (which commonly is criticall, and doth determine of maladies one way or other by course of nature) that it was no ordinary disease, not proceeding from usuall causes, flood up to make a speech, not framing himselse to please and gratific the common people, but to give counfell unto the king himselfe in this maner.

Ithinke we must when all is done, o Agamemnon Leege, Returne againe without effect to Greece, and leave our feege.

This was well and wifely faid: these were modest and temperate words becomming his person:
But when the prophet or soothsaier said, that he seared much the wrath and indignation of the mightiest man and soveraigne commander of all the Greeks, he answered then never a wife or so-the word; for having swomen a great oth, that no man should be so hardy as to lay hand on the said prophet so long as he remained alive, he added moreover and said full unseemely,

No, if thou should It both meane and name

King Agamennon, I vow the same.

Shewing plainly by these words, what little account he made of his prince, and how he contemned sourceigne authoritie: nay he overpassed himselfe more yet, and proceeded farther in heat of choler, to lay hand upon his sword, yea and to draw it foorth with a full purpose to kill the king: which was done of him neither well for his owne honour, nor wisely for the good of the State. But repenting himselfe immediately

Into the skabbard then anon, he puts his doughty fword: Minerva gave him that advise, and he oberd her word.

Herein againe he did well and honeftly: for having not the power to extinguish and quench his choler quite, yet he delaied it well and repressed it, yea and brought it under the obeysance of reason, before it brake out into any excessive outrage, which had been remedilesse. Semblably Agamemnen himselfe, for that which he did and said in the assembly of Counsell, he was woorthy woorthy to be skorned and laughed at. But in the matter concerning the Damofell Chryseis, he shewed more gravitie and princely Majestie, than in like case Achilles did : for he, when the faire Brise was taken from him and led away:

Sat weeping in great agonic Retir dapart from companie.

But Agamemon himfelse in person conducting her as sarre as to the ship, delivering up and fending away to her owne sather; the woman whom a little before he said that he loved more decrely than his owne espoused wise, did nothing unfitting himselse or like a passionate lover. Againe, Phanix being cursed by his sather and betaken to all the hellish stends for lying with to his concubine, breaketh out into these words,

I minded once with fword of mine my fathers blood to fhead: But that fome god my rage repreft and put this in my head: How men would cry much frame on me, and namely Gracians all With one voice me a parrietde or Father killer call,

Which verses in Homer, Aristarchus was afraid to let stand; and therefore dashed them out. But verily, they serve in that place fitly for the purpose, namely, when Phanix instructeth Achilles, what a violent passion anger is, and how there is no outrage but men will dare and do in the heat of choler, when they will not be guided with reason, or directed by the counsell of those that would appease them. For he bringeth in Meleager also, who was angrie with his citizens, how beit afterwards pacified: In which example; as he wisely blameth and reprooveth such passions: so he prasseth and commendeth as a good and expedient thing, not to be led and carried away therewith, but to resist and conquer them, and to take up bettine and repent. True it is, that hitherto in these places alreadie cited, there is a manifest difference to be observed: but where there is some obscurity as touching the true sense and meaning of a sentence, we must teach a yoong man to stay himselse there and pause upon the point, that he may be able to distinguish in this manner: If 2 ausseau upon the first sight of Phisses, a meere stranger, falling into the same passion of love with him, as Calpso did, and seeking nothing but wanton pleasure, as one living daintily, and being now ripe and readie for marriage, utter soolishly these and such like words, and that before her waiting maids:

O that it weremy hap, so brave a Knight to wed who hath my hart: O that he would with me vouch safe for to remaine and not depart.

Her boldnesse and incontinencie is to be reprooved: but if by his speech and talke, she perceived that he was a man of wit and wise behaviour, and thereupon withed in her heart to be his wedded wise, and to dwell with him rather than with one of her owne countrie, who could skill of nothing else but to daunce or be a mariner, I cannot blame her, but thinke her praise woorthy. In like case, if when Penelope deviseth and talketh courteously with her woers, who sued unto her for marriage, and thereupon they court her againe and bestow upon her gay clothes, rich to be a mariner of the same and other goodly ornaments sit for a Lady Plifes her husband rejoice

That she was well content to take Their gifts, and did to them lovemake, As though she would be kinde againe, And yet her shewes were all bus vaine.

If I say he joyed, in that his wife received their courtefies and tokens, and so made a gaine of them, surely he surpassed the notorious bawd, playing his part in the Comedies, of whom there goeth this by-word:

Bawde Poliager happie man hee, That keepes at home in house a shee: A beaventy goate whose instuence, Brings in riches with affluence.

But if he did it to have them by that meanes under his hand, whiles they upon hope of obtayning their fuit, little thought of him how he watched them a strewd turne; then his joy and confident affurance was grounded well & upon good reason. Semblably in the counting that he made of those goods which the Phæacians had landed when they set him on shore; and having fo done, spred faile and departed backe againe: if being thus left folitarie alone and finding him felfe forlorne, he doubted of his estate and what should become of him, and yet his mind was so fet upon his goods that he seared,

Least part thereof they tooke away, whiles that on shore assesse he lay,

His avarice were lamentable, nay it were abominable, I affore you: But if as some do thinke and fay, being not fure whether he were in the Isle Ithaca or no, he supposed that the fafety of his gods and money, was a certaine proofe and demonstration of the Phæacians loyaltie and fidelitie (for never would they have transported him into a strange land but for lucre, nor when they left him and departed would have forborne his goods) he used herein no foolish argument, 10 and his providence in so doing is commendable. Some there be who finde fault with this vetic landing of him upon the shore, in case the Phazacians did it whiles he was assept in deed: and they fay that it appeareth by a certaine Chronicle or Hiltorie among the Tuskanes which they keepe by them, that Viffes was given by nature to be verie drowfie; which was the cause, that to many he was not affable, and men oftentimes might hardly speake with him. Now if this was no sleepe in very truth, but that being both ashamed to fend away the Phæacians who had conducted him over sea, without feasting them & giving them presents and rewards for their kindneffer and also in feare least if they were feene, there still upon the coast, whiles he entertained them to kindly, himselfe might be discovered by his enimies, he used this pretense of seigned fleepe to cover and hide the perplexitie wherein he was, or to shift off this difficultie wherein he 20 stood in this case, they allow and commend him for it. In giving therefore to young men such advertisements as these, we shall never suffer them to runne on still to the corruption of their manners, but rather imprint in them prefently a fervent zeale and hartie defire to chuse better things, namely, if we proceed directly to praise this and to dispraise that. And this would be done especially in Tragedies, those I meane, wherein fine words and affected speeches be oftentimes framed to cloke dishonest and villanous deeds. For that which Sophoeles faith in one place, is not alwaies true:

If that it be a naughtie deed, Of it good words cannot proceed.

For even himselfe is woont many times to palliat wicked conditions, yea, and naughtie acts 30 with pleasant specches and familiar apparant reasons, which carie a probabilitie of sufficient excuse. And even so plaieth Europides his companion, who shewed himselfe upon the same stage: for see you not, how he bringeth in Pheasa to begin with her husband Theseus, First, laying all the blame on him; as if for sooth the wrongs and abuses that he offered unto her, were the cause that she was enamoured upon Hippolytus? The like audacious and bold speech he putteth in Heleus mouth against queene Hecuba, in that Tragedie which is entituled Troades, objecting unto her, and saying, That she was rather to be punished, for bearing such a sonne as Alexander. Paris, who committed the adulterie with her. A yoong man then, ought not to accuss ome himselfest to thinke any such inventions as these to be prette, gallant and wittie, ne yet laugh at such subtile and fine devices; but to abhorre and detest as much, or rather more, wanton and filthie 40 words, than loose and dishonest deeds.

Moreover, it would be expedient, in all speeches to search the cause whereupon they do proceed; after the example of Cato when he was a little boy: For, do he would whatsoever his Master or Tutour bad; but ever and anon hee would be inquisitive and questioning with him the reason of his commandements. And yet we are not to believe and obey Poets, as we ought either Schoole masters or Law givers, unlesse the matter by them proposed have reason for the ground: and grounded then it thalbe thought upon reason, if it be good and honest for if it be wicked, it ought to seeme sooils and vaine. But many of these men there be, who are verie sharpe and curious in searching and demanding what Hessaus should meane in this verse, Whiles men are drinking, doe not fet The flagon over the wine goblet. as also what sense may be made of these verses in Homer: Another charios who mounted is, when from his owne he is alight, Assaft not bis spare and savelinmis, Ent truft thereto, and therewith fight.

but other fentences, iwis, of greater importance and danger, they admit foone, and give credit thereto, without further enquiry & examination: as for example, at these verses they slicke not,

The privitie to fathers vice Or mothers fault reprochable, Will him debase, who otherwise, Is hardie, stout, and commendable. no more than they doe at this,

V pon a man, if fortune frowne, His heart therewith must be cast downe.

And yetfuch fayings as thele, come nere unto us, and touch the quicke, troubling our maner and behaviour in this life, imprinting in us perverfe judgements, base and unmanly opinions, unlesse we acquaint our selves to contradict ech of them in every point, after this maner. And wherefore ought he to beare an abject minde, who is crossed with adverse fortune? Why rather should not he make head againe, and wrestle with her, bearing himselfe so much the more alost, and never endure to be troden downe and depressed by her? What reason is there, that my heart should be done, for that my father was vicious and soolish, in case I be a wise and honest man my selse? Is there greater cause that he ignorance and impersection of my father should keeper me downe and discourage me, that I dare not looke up; than mine owne knowledge and valour make me take heart and put my selse forth? He that will thus encounter, withstand, and not give way to every speech, turning side, as it were, to every pusse of wind, but rather effeceme that sentence of Heraelinus to be well and truely spoken,

A foolish and witlesse man is he, With every word who stricken will be.

Such a one, I say, thalbeable to put by and repell many fayings of Poets, that are neither true nor profitable. And thus much as touching those observations which may serve a yoong mans turne, that he may reade and heare Poets fafe without any danger.

But forasmuch as it falleth out, that as in Vines many times, the grapes lie hidden among the leaves and branches, and cannot be seene by reason that they are covered and shadowed there-30 with: fo alfo in poeticall verfes, under fables and fictions there be covertly couched many profitable and hollome leffons, which a yong man cannot efpie by himfelfe, and therefore he miffeth that commoditie and fruit which is to be reaped out thereof. Howbeit, we must not suffer this, nor let him turne away, and give over the ought not (I fay) to wander afide, but flicke close and fast to those matters especially, which leade unto vertue, and make any thing for the framing or reforming of maners. In which regard, I shall not do amisse, if I treat also of this matterbriefly; making, as it were, a first draught onely, and touching summarily the principall points; leaving long discourses, by way of narration, confirmation, and a multitude of examples, to those that write of purpose for more shew and ostentation. First and formost therefore, when a yoong man knoweth throughly the persons of men and women, their natures also and 40 maners both good and bad, let him then regard and confider well the fayings and doings which the Poet doth attribute aptly unto either of them. As for example, Achilles faith unto Agamemnon these words, although he speaketh them in choler, For never shall I honour have,

When populous Troy, that city brave,
The Greeks shall force, as they do vow.
But Thersites reviling the selfestame Agamemnon, useth these termes;
Anush brassen vessells bou hast now in many a goodly tent,
Of captive women teke like chosse, in beauty excellent,
In thy pavilion: whom we Greeks, as to our Soveraigne,
Do give, so soone as any towne by martiall force we gaine.
Againe Abrilles in another place hath this humble speech,
Is suprice will be so good, as to sussil our joy,
And grant that we one day may win the stately city Troy.
But Thersites commeth out with this proud word,

Whom

Reading and hearing of Whom either I, or in my flead,

Some Greeke shall bound as captive lead. Semblably in another place, when in the review of the armie, Agamemnon passing along the bands, rebuked and taunted Diomedes, he answered not againe, nor gave him one croffe word:

For why he feared in modestie The checks of his dread Majestie.

But Sthenelus, of whom no man made any reckoning, was so bolde as to reply and say,

Sir Agamemnon Atreus fonne, for beare thus for to lie, Tou can, if that you lift, with me report a trueth: for why? Pronounce I dare, and it avow, we better warriours be

In these dayes than our fathers were, by many a degree.

The difference which is in these personages, if it be well marked, will teach a yoong man thus much: That to be modest, temperate, void of pride, and humble, is a most civil and excellent vertue: and contrariwife it will advertise him to take heed of pride and overweening; to beware also of boalting and vaunting much of himselfe, as a detestable vice. And heere in this place, expedient it is and profitable to observe the action of Agamemnon: He passed by Sthenelus, and would not flay to speake unto him: As for Vlyfes, who found himselfe grieved, him he neglected not, but shaped him an answere : For as Homer writeth,

No sooner he perceived him offended for to be,

But presently he spake againe, and thus replied he. For, as it is a base and servile thing, and not be seeming the majestie of a Prince to answere everie one, and by way of Apologie to justifie a thing done or faid; so to despise and distaine all men, is meere pride and extreame follie. As for Diomedes, he did paffing well to hold his peace during the time of the battell, when he was rebuked and reviled by the king, but after the fight was ended, he spake his minde freely and boldly in this wife;

You are the first of all the Greeks, who in reprochfull wise Have charged me for my falle heart, and fearefull cowardife.

Good also it is, to see the difference betweene a wise man in deed and a vaine soothsayer, who loved to be seene, and to heare himselse speake among the multitude. For Calchas without all respect of chusing his time and a fit opportunitie, bathed not in publike place, and before all 30 the people, to challenge king Agamemnon, imputing directly unto him, and to no other, the cause of the pestilence which reigned in the campe. But Nesson, contrariwise, intending to make a motion as touching the reconciliation and pacifying of Achilles, and to speake directlic unto that point, because hee would not seeme to blame and accuse the king in the audience of the people; namely, that he had passed himselse in choler, and done amisse, adviseth him in this maner, faying:

To supper bid the ancient peeres : this doth your person fit : And when they are together met, in order as they fit, Let themopine, Heare their advise, and looke who speaketh best,

His counsell take I reede, and then therein see that yourest.

And after supper, he sent forth the Embassadours accordingly. This was the onely way to correct a fault, and amend that was amiffe: whereas the other had bene a very injurious acculation, and a contumelious reproofe to his no fmall difgrace. Furthermore, there would be noted and considered the diversitie that is in fundry nations, and that after this maner: The Trojans give the charge in battell to their enemies with great shouts, out-cries, and exceeding violence: whereas the Greeks

The onset give with all silence,

To leaders having reverence. For foldiours to dread and feare their captaines and commaunders, at what time as they be readie to joyne battaile with the enimie, is a figne both of valour and also of obedience and milita- 30 rie Discipline. Which is the reason that Plato would inure us to be afraid of rebukes, reproofes and filthy acts, more than of any travels and dangers. Cato likewise was woont to say, That he loved those better who blushed and looked red, than the pale faced. As for promises, there is a proper worke also in them, whereby a man may discerne whether they be wise or foolish. For Dolon promifeth in this maner 7 he

The campe of Greeks I enter will and passe on still outright Vntill to Agamemnons (hip, I come there for to fight.

Contrariwife Diomedes promifeth nothing of himselfe, onely this he saith: That he should feare the leffe, if he were fent with some other to beare him companie. Whereby you may see that Prudence, Diferetion and Forecast be civile vertues befeeming the Greeks; but audacious raffines is naught; and fit for Barbarians. The one therefore we must embrace and imitate, the other reject and cast behindeus. Moreover it were a speculation not unprofitable to marke the affections that befell unto the Trojans and to Heller at what time as he was ready to enter into combat and fingle fight with Ajax. Aefchylus being upon a time in place to behold the combats to at the 13thmian games, it fell out to that one of the champions was hurt and wounded in the very face, whereupon the people that looked on, fet up a great crie and shouted aloud: See, quoth he, what use and exercise is I the Beholders crie out, but the man himselse that is hurt, faith never a word. In like maner, when Homer the Poet faith, that Ajax was no fooner feene in his bright compleat harnish, and armed at all pieces, but the Greekes rejoiced: whereas who would not woonder to fee this difference? The partie himfelfe who was in danger, felt his hart onely to leape, as if he had beene (I affure you) to wreftle for the best game, or to run a race for the prize: but they that faw him, trembled and shaked all their bodie over, for feare of the 20 perill wherein their prince was, and for kind affection that they bare unto him. It is woorth the noting also what ods and difference there is betweene the most resolute or valiant Captaine, and the greatest coward: For it is said of Thersites that Achilles of all that were in the Host And also Vlysses he hated most.

whereas Ajax as he alwaies loved Achilles, so he giveth an honorable testimonic thereof, when he speaketh unto Hector in this wife,

In single fight with me alone what woorthy knight we have In Grecian host, thou maift not fee besides Achilles brave: Achilles he, the Paragon of Proweffe whom we count

Whose Lions hart undaunted yet all others doth surmount.

This is a fingular commendation of Achilles particularly: but that which followeth afterwards, is aptly spoken to the praise of all in generall:

Wot well that many of us there be in Campe that dare and can Make head, and maintaine fight with thee in combat man to man.

Marke, how he praiseth not himselfe, to be the man alone or the most valourous of all other, but is content to be raunged with many more as sufficient men to make their part good against him. Thus much may ferve as touching the diversitie of persons, unlesse we will adde this 40 moreover, That of Trojans we read there were many taken prisoners alive by their enimies, but of the Greeks not one: as also that divers of them became humble suppliants to their enimies and fell downe at their feete; namely Adrastus, the sonnes of Antimachus and Lycaon: yea and Hettor himselfe befought Achilles to vouchsafe him buriall: whereas, there was not one of them that did the like: As if thus much were implied thereby, that it is the maner of Barbarians in fight, to make supplication, to submit, to kneele and lie prostrate before the enimie: but of Grecians, either to win the victorie by maine fight, or to die for it.

Moreover, like as in pasturage and feeding, the Bee setleth upon flowres: the goate searcheth after greene leaves and brouseth young buds: the Swine searcheth for roots, and other bealts for the feed & fruit; Even so in reading Poems, one gathereth the flowre of the Hiltory: 50 another cleaveth to the elegancie of phrase and furniture of words, as Aristophanes was wont to fay of Euripides.

Histoone foround doth please my mind, In file to (mooth content I finde.

Others there be who affect morall fentences aprly fitted to the reformation of maners. Those therefore with whom now we have to deale, and to whom we direct our speech, we are to admonith, that it were a shame and unwoorthy thing, if either he who setteth his minde upon fables should marke well the witty narrations, and fingular fine inventions therein: or he that delighteth in eloquence should note diligently the pure and elegant phrase, the artificiall rhetorick alfo, as he readeth: whiles he, that would feeme to affect honor, to studie honestie, and to take Poets in hand not for delight, pleasure and pastime, but for the infight of learning, and for the treasure of knowledge, readeth and heareth carelessely and without fruits, those sentences which are penned and delivered by them to the recommendation of fortitude, temperance and juflice: For as concerning valor and vertue you shall finde these verses,

What is befall n fir Diomede, that we forget to fight? How is it that our harts be done? where is our Martiall might? Come neere, stand close unto my side, great shame it were for us, If Hector now should board our ships and force our naviethms.

For to see a most wise and prudent capitaine who was in damager to perish, and to be overthrowen together with the whole armie, not to be affraid of death, but to feare reproch and thamefull difgrace, the fame no doubt will cause a yoong man to be woonderfully affectionate to vertue and prowesse.

For wisedome and justice these verses serve:

Minerva then tooke great delight To fee the man wife and upright.

Such a featence as this, will give occasion to a yoong scholler thus to reason and discourse: The Poet here hath devifed, that the goddeffe joyed not in a rich man, in one that was faire, well favoured and personable, or mighty in bodily strength: but in him that was prudent and just withall. And in another place where the fame goddeffe faith, that the will not neglect nor forfake Vliffes and leave him destitute:

For toong he hath and wit at will:

The Poet sheweth plainely: That there is nothing in us but vertue onely, that is divine and loved of the gods; if this be true her I then the poets of the gods; if this be true her I then the poets. beloved of the gods: if this be true that Like will to like, and Naturally everie thing delighteth in the Semblable. Now for a fmuch as it feemeth to be a great matter and rare perfections, as in truth it is no leffe, to be able to mafter and bridle anger: certes a greater vertue it is and a gift more fingular to prevent and wifely to forecast, that we fall not into choler, nor fuffer our selves to be surprised therewith: And therefore the readers of Poëts ought to be advertised in these points, not coldly but in good earnest: as namely, how Achilles, a man by nature nothing mecke, milde and patient, giveth warning unto Priamus to be quiet, and not to provoke him, in these wordes:

Take heed old father I thee reed, how thou my choler moove: I minded am thy sonne to yeeld: For why? from Iove above Amessenger bathwarn'dme so : Beware Gray-beard, Ifay, Least that my tent will not thee save, but foorthwith I thee flay : Although in humble wife thou come, with suppliants habit dight, And so I do transgresse I oves will and breake the lawes of right.

Who also after he had washed the corps of Hetter, and wound it within Funerall clothes, bestowed the same with his owne hands in the chariot, before that Priamse his father should see it, so misused as it was,

For feare least when he saw his forme, fo mangled and beraid In oriefe of heart old father be, Should not him felfe be state But with hot words Achilles moove in him to fheath his firord Without regard of Iupiter, his hefts, his will and word.

For when a man is apt and prone to anger, as being of nature hot, rough and cholericke, to know himselfe so given, and therewith to prevent, decline and avoid all occasions of yre, and by to the guidance of reason to hold of, in such fort, that even as it were against his will lie shall not fall into any passionate sits, is a point of great wiledome and singular providence. After the fame manner ought he shar is given to wine; to be armed against drunkennesse: he also that is by nature amorous, thould thus withfrand wanton love: Like as Agefilans, who would not abide to be kiffed of a beautifull yoong boy comming toward him: and Cyrus, who durft not fo much as fet his eie upon faire Panthea. Whereas contrariwife, those that be ill nourthred and badly brought up, seeke all meanes and occasions to kindle and enflame their foolish affections, mimiltring matter thereto, as fewell unto fire: casting themselves headlong and that wilfully into those vices, whereunto they are most prone and ready to fall by nature. But Plystes not onely brideled and represed his ownscholer when he was chased, but also perceiving by some words 20 of Telemachin his fonne, that he was angric and hatefully bent against lewd persons, he laboured to appeale and mittigate his moode: he deale with him before hand, willing and commanding him to be quiet, to forbeare and have parience.

My some, if that by worder deed In mine owne house they me abuse, Bite in thine anger, I thee reed, Seethouindure, and patience use: Nay if they draw me by the foot, And out of doores me drag anone, Or their (har pe arrowes at me shoot, See all, fay nought, what ever is done.

For like as men use not to bridle their horses when they be running in a race, but before they begin their course; even so they that hardly can digest indignities, and upon occasion offered are quickly angrie, ought first to be præoccupate with reason: and being thus prepared beforehand, to bring them to the combat.

Over and besides, a yoong man must not negligently passe over the bare words as hee readeth. And yet I speake not this, as though I would have him play upon them, as Cleanthes did, who making femblance to interpret and expound words, would otherwhiles cavill and make fport. For where as we reade in Homer, Σεύ πατες Ίσηθεν με Νέων. & Σεθ ανα Δωσωναίε.

He would have us to reade these two last words in one, by way of vew, thus, Est anadologueus, as if for footh, the aire which by exhalation is elevated, and doth rife from the earth, should therefore be called a vastus fur dies. Chrysippus likewise many times comes in with his bald reasons, without all grace: and this he doeth not in jeft and meriment, but he would feeme to devife reasons fubtilly; and fo forceth divers words impertinently: as namely, when he wrestern these words, Euguora Keguistus, to this sense, as if deguora should signific one that was eager and quicke in disputation or argument, furpaffing others in force of eloquence. It were better for us to leave these nice subtilities of words and syllables unto Grammarians for to be scanned, and to consider more neerely other observations, which, as they yeeld greater profit, so they cary with them more probabilitie and likelihood of structh; and namely to picke some good out of these verses,

Most crosse unto my minde it is. For taught I am proefferwis. Full well he knew, to every wight

To shew himselfe a curteous knight. For hereby he declareth evidently, that valour and fortitude is gotten by teaching; as also, he is of opinion, That to be milde, affable and kinde to every man, is a gracious vertue, proceeding from science and reason: whereupon he exhorteth us, not to be carelesse of our selves, but to learne good and honest things, by giving care unto our teachers: for that cowardise, follie, and perverse incivilitie, be the defects of learning, and are meere ignorance indeed. Hereto accordeth very well, that which the fame Poct Homer faith of Iupiter and N. eptune:

Beholde one father both they had, and countrey one them bread: Bur Iupiter was former borne, and the day of the day of the day and had she wifer head.

He declareth hereby that wifedome is a most divine and princely qualitie; wherein he plates ceth the fovereigne and highest excellencie of Inpirer, as refeeming all other good parts to accompanie that fovereigne and heavenly vertue. We are likewife to acquaint a yoong man to heare, and that with no heavie and dull care, but attentively and with a vigilant minde, thefe oy and the services

Right wifehe is, and wot you well, A lie for no good will he tell.

Andrew State (1984) Antilochus, reputed aye for wife you are to blame My fleeds to hurt, mine honour eke thus for to flaine with flame.

You, a woorthy knight, to speake fo foolishly!

I would have faid you had, in wit, past all men verily.

These sentences import thus much; That wise men will never speake untrueths: neither will they in battell behave themselves as cowards, and use deceit in fight, ne yet charge unjust imputations upon others without reason. Also when the Poet faith, that he through his folly suffered himselfe to be induced & perswaded to breake the truce and league, he sheweth plainly, That he thinketh a wife man will in no wife commit unrighteoufneffe. The like may of a young man be taught, as touching continencie and chastitie, especially, if he consider well these verses.

K. Prœtus wife, Dame Antea, him lov'd and woed foone For to embrace her secretly, and lie with her anone: But never would he yeeld thereto. Belleryphon was wife, And in his heart he never let such thoughts for to arise.

As also these, Dame Clytemnestro first was chaste, and wanton tricks rejected All while she was by reason led, and wisdomes lore directed.

In these places we see, that the Poet attributeth the cause of continency and pudicitie unto wisedome. Furtherward in those exhortations whereby capitaines use to encourage their souldiers to fight, when the Poet eftfoones inferreth these and such like speeches,

Fy, fy for shame ô Lycians, you are now light of foote, To runne away thus as you do, iwis it will not boote. Alfo:

A conflict sharpe is toward, Sirs, wherefore let every one Set shame and just revenge in fight,

By which words the Poet seemeth to ascribe fortitude vnto shamefastnesse and modeltie: else all, I doubt, is gone. For that, those who are bashfull and ashamed to commit filthinesse, are able likewise not onely to overcome voluptuous pleasures; but also to undergoe all daungerous adventures. By occa- 50 fion whereof Timotheus also in his Poeme entituled Perfa was mooved not unaptly to encourage the Greekes to fight, faying thus:

Have honest shame in reverence and honour her, I you advise. She helpeth Promeffe, and from hence the victorie doth oft arife.

ABschylus also reputeth it a point of wisedome, not to be vaine-glorious nor desirous to be feene of the multitude, ne yet to be lifted up with the puffes of popular praife, when he describeth Amphiaraus in this wife:

He feeketh not to feeme the very best, But for to be the best in word and deed: He fowed hath within his woorthy breft, In furrow deepe, all good and vertuous feed, Which reeld both leafe & fruit in feafon due; I meane sage counsel join'd with honor true.

For the part it is of a wife man and of good conceit, to stand upon his owne botome, that is to fay, to rest in himselfe, and to thinke highly of his owne resolutions and courses as the verie best. Thus you see how all good things being reduced unto prudence, there is no kinde of vertue but it commeth to a man afterwards, and is acquired by learning and discipline.

Moreover, like as Bees have this propertie by nature to finde and fucke the mildest and best honie, out of the sharpest and most eager flowers; yea and from among the roughest and most prickly thornes: even so children and yoong men if they be well nourtured and orderly inured in the reading of Poemes, will learne after a fort to draw alwaies fome holefome and profitable doctrine or other, even out of those places which moove suspition of lewd and absurd lense. At 20 the first fight, Agamemnon may seeme suspected of avarice and briberie, in that he exempted

That unto Troy that flately towne, he might not with him go To (erve in armes: but stay at home, andrest there far from wo: Where he might live in solace much, enjoying all his owne: For Iupiter in measure great

Howbeit, as Ariftotle faith, he did very well in preferring a good mare before a man no better than he was: For I affure you a coward & hartleffe man, flowing in abundance of riches, wallowing in pleasures and delight, and thereby made effeminate, is not in prise comparable either to a dog or an affe. Semblaby, it may feeme that Thet is did exceeding badly to incite her fonne to pleafures, and to put him in minde of the fleshly delights of Venus: But even there, the continencie of Achilles is woorthie to be confidered: who notwithstanding that he had beene enamoured of Brifeis, and faw that she was returned againe unto him, yea and knew that he had not long to live, but that his end was neere; yet neither made he hafte to enjoy his pleafures while he might, nor as many men use to do, bewailed the death of his friend, sitting idlely the 40 while, doing nothing at all and neglecting the duties of his calling: but as in forrow and griefe of hearthe forbare his delights and pleasures, so in action and conduct of his regiment, he shewed himselfe a martiall and valorous man. In like manner Archilochus is not commended for this, that being to mourne and lament for the loffe of his brother in law who married his fifter, and was perifhed in the fea, he would feeme to conquer his forow with drinking wine & making good cheere: yet nevertheleffe he alleageth a cause of his doing so, which carrieth some apparence of reason in these words:

> For neither can my plaints and teares restore his life and heale: N eyet my mirth and pleasant sports will harme him ever a deale.

And if he were of this minde, and had reason to thinke, that in following his delights, meri-50 ments, pastimes and bankets, he could not empaire the state of his brother departed; how should our present condition be the worse and our affaires go backward, by the studie and practife of Philosophie, by managing the government of publike weale, by frequenting the comon hall and courts of pleas, by going downe to the Academie and schooles of learning, or by sollowing Agriculture and husbandrie?

practife Cleanthes and Antisthenes were woont to use are not amisse. For one of them upon a time when the Athenians in full-Theatre tooke offense and made a great stifte at this verse:
           Tis' aixedy et un roïon zewedhour sonis.

           A filthiething, is foule and filthie fill:
           Thinkest, or thinke it not, That desh not skill.
As for Cleanthes when he read these verses as touching riches:
           cincis re d'ai au ocquar els vores mode
                    da miram pagu
           Among good frends for to bestow and spend upon your selfe
           Your lickly body to preferve ; thus use your worldly pelfe.
He altered them in this manner, and wrote thus:
           πέρκαις το άβναι, οδιμάτ' εις νός ες πεσόν
                     Ja miyas onreinas
            That you may it to harlots give, and pampring much your selfe:

Semblaby Zeno reading these verses of Sophocles, men from the woorse to the better. Whereas therefore we shall meete with these verses, τι Β' έςὶ το (ηλαιτόν αθφαίποις, ότι

            TO EOU MEETUNG HIS O BENETUL TEST
            The thing that men are for to wish and most defire is this,

            That when they aime at their profit
            The arrow may be sure to but.
For to reach into those things which a man ought not to desire, yea and to obtaine and have the fame is pitifull and lamentable, and in no wife to be wished for. Likewise, when we read in Homer thus,
            Thy part of weale and woe thou must o Agamemnon have,
            For Athens did not thee beget, alwaies to winor fave.
We'verily are thus to fay rather,

 Againe, when we meet with this verse,
            Alas what mischiefe sent to men,
               is this from gods above,
            That they fould see what thing is good,

Sent from gods above? nay rather, it is a brutish, unreasonable, yea, a wofull and lamentable thing, that a man seeing that which is better, should for all that be caried away and transported to the worse, by reason of intemperance, slouth, and effeminate softmesse of the minde.

Also, if we light upon this sentence,

Behaviour t'is and good carriage, That do perswade, and not language.

Not so iwis, but maners and words together are perswasive: on rather the maners by meanes of speech, like as the horse is ruled by the bit and bridle, and as the Pilot guideth the ship by the rudder or helme. For surely vertue is furnished with no instrument or meanes so gracious with men and so familiar, as speech is.

Moreover, where you encounter these verses;

For wanton love, how stands his minde?

To male more or to female kinde?

Answer.

Both hands are right, with him, where beauty ü,

Neither of twaine to him can come amis.

Nay rather thus he should have answered:

Where vertue is seated, and continence,

Both hands are like, there is no difference.

20 And to speake truely and more plainly, in equall balance poised he is indeed, inclining neither the one way nor the other: Whereas contrariwise, he that with pleasure and beautic swaieth to and fro, is altogether left handed, inconstant, and incontinent.

Read you at any time this verse?

Φίθος το θελατοί οι σώφεροι βερτών.

Religion true, and right godlinesse

Make wife men too fear efull alwaies, more or leffe.

In no wife admit thereof, but fay thus:

Θάρτος τὰ Śτία το ιστούρερο βερτών. Religion true, and right godlinesse,

Make wife men bolde, and hardy, more or leffe.

For in trueth, feare and despaire, by the meanes of religion, ariseth in the hearts of none but of fooles, unthankfull and senselessees, who have in suspicion and do dread that divine power which is the first cause of all good things, as hurtfull unto them. Thus much concerning correction of sentences.

There is besides an amplification of that which we read, whereby a sentence may be stretched farther than the bare wordes import. And thus Chrysppus hath rightly taught us how to transfer and apply that which was spoken of one onely thing, to many of the like kinde, and so to make a profitable use thereof: for after this manner when He souls saith,

An oxe or cow a man shall never loose,

If neighbour his be not malicious.

40 He meaneth by oxe or cow, his dog likewise and affe, yea, and all things else that may perish. Semblably, whereas Europiaes saith thus,

A slave indeed, whom may we justly call? Even him of death who thinketh not all.

We must understand that he meant and spake, aswell of labour, assistion and sicknesse, as of death. And verily, as physicians sinding the vertue and operations of a medicine applyed and sitted to one maladie, by the knowledge thereof can skill how to accommodate the same to all others of the like nature, and use it accordingly; even so, when we meete with a sentence that is common, and whereof the profit may serve to many purposes, we ought not to oversee and so neglect the manifold use thereof, and leave it as appropriate to one onely matter: but to handle the same so, that it may be applyed to all of like fort: and herein we must inure and exercise yoong men, to see and know readily this communion, and with a quicke conceit to transferre that which they finde apt and proper in many, and by examples to be practised and made prompt therein, so as they be able to marke at the first hearing the semblable: To the ende that when they come to read in Menander this verse,

A happie man we may him call, Who hath much wealth, and wit withall.

They may verie well thinke that in naming wealth, he meant and included Honor, authoritie and eloquence. Also, that the imputation which VIffes charged upon Achilles, fitting idlely in the Iland Serres, among the yoong maidens and damofels, in these words,

You fir, whose father was a knight, the best that ever drew His fivord, of all the Greekes in fight and many acaptaine sew: Sit you here carding like a wench and finning wooll on rocke, Thereby the glorious light to quench of your most noble stocke? may be aptly faid unto any loofe liver and voluptuous wanton, unto a covetous and wretched miser, unto an idle luske, an untaught or ignorant lozell. As for example, in lieu of this verse in the forefaid imputation,

Eulvers deis & murgos esplusion reguis

What, what good fir? are you become a spinster now for need, Whole father was of all the Greekes a knight of doughtiest deed.

A man may read and not unfitly thus, mires deise,&c. Canyou carrouse so lustily and tosse the pot so round, Whose father knew to shake a speare and stourly stand his ground? Or after this manner, zulden deise &c. Your courage serves to hazard all at casting of three dies Your fathers heart was tried in war and martiall jeopardies. Either thus, ортизоконей авіян, вс. You cunning are to play at quoites the game, Whereas your fire, by proweffe wan much fame.

Or in this wife, Kumadiers deisu, &c. Are you become indeed a Tavernour, Whole father was a woorthy governour?

Or laftly thus, דנאסץ אטספונ מפונדם, פנכ. In hundred ten, you can full well call for at such a day,

Your father tens and hundreds knew to range in battell ray. And in one word, so well as you are descended there is no goodnes nor great thing in you wor-40 thy the noble parentage. Moreover, where you happen upon these verses,

What tell you me of Pluto and his chievance, For such a god as he with all his puissance. Iworship not : since that the lewdest wreach In all the world, to wealth may quickly reach.

A man may fay as much of glory, of outward beauty, of the rich mantels of a captaine generall, of a Bishops miter, and the facred coronet of a priest, which we see the wickedest wretches in the world may attaine unto. Againe, whereas the words of another verle import thus much onely: That children gotten of cowardife,

Be foule and those whom men de spise. The same verily do imply also, that Intemperance, Superstition, Envie, and all other vices and maladies of the minde, bring foorth no better of spring. Now whereas Homer faide excellent well in one place:

Paris a coward thou art for footh, For all thy face so faire and smooth.

And

(For by these termes and epithits, he sheweth covertly that a man deserveth blame and reproch, who is endued with no better grace and gift than beautie) we may well and fitly apply this reprehension to such like things: namely, to plucke downe their peacocks plumes, who vaunt and glorific themselves for matters of no moment and value: teaching yoong men thereby, that fuch praises as these, be no better than contumelies and reproches: Asfor example, when a man is faluted in this manner: O most excellent for riches, for keeping a bountifull table, for to many fervitours: right excellent for fingular good teames of draught oxen, caples and mules, for stables of steeds and greathorses: yea or thus moreover to the rest: O surpassing orator and of woonderfull eloquence: for to speake a truth, a man is to aime at excellencie and preferrence before others in good and honest things, that in the chiefe and principall he may be the highest and formost as also in great matters, the greatest: for the reputation that groweth from smal and base things is dishonorable, illiberall, vile, & of no worth. And verily this example last alleaged, putteth us straightwaies in minde, to consider better the reprehensions and praises which offer themselves especially in the Poemes of Homer: For certes, they give us expresly to understand one notable instruction, to wit, Not highly to esteeme the gifts either of body or of fortune. For first and formest (in those titles which they give one to another in reciprocall greetings) when 20 they meet and shake hands, the maner is not to falute by the name of Beautifull, Rich or Strong, but they use such commendations as these,

Vlyffcs ô most noble knight, from Iupiter first descended, Lacrtes sonne, for wisedome, and much wis, yet most commended.

O Hector fonne of Priamus king, Equall to love in wifedome and cunning. Likewife, Achilles of Peleus the most redoubted sonne, Chiefe glory of the worthy Greekes, their light and Shining sunne. And againe, Patroclus ô fonne of Menætius, Most lovely in my hart and gracious.

Semblably when they are disposed to revile and taunt, they twit not one another with any defects and imperfections of the bodie, but touch them exprelly with the vices of the mind, after this maner.

Thou drunken sot, as shamelesse as, the dogs that use to barke Thou coward base as hartlesse as, the stags that run in parke. And thus.

Thouwrangling Ajax of Barrotters chiefe Divising nought but evill and mischiefe. Semblably, Idomeneus in frappling prompt, what mean'st thouthus to prate? This babling little thee becomes, such clattering men do hate. As alfo.

O Ajax fie for (hame: how farre out of the way Speake you, so bold and malapart? you brag too much I say.

To conclude, Vlyfes revileth not Ther fites, with these termes: Thou halting and lame squire, 50 thou bald pate thou coptank, thou that art camell backt, or crump shouldred: but rather reprocheth him with his vaine babling and undifcreet language. But rather on the contrarie fide, the mother of Vulcane when the speaketh unto her sonne lovingly and in great kindnesse of hart, beginneth first with his lamenesse in this maner

Come his her my some come to me come sweet hart My poore lumping creeple, come crokelege as thou art.

Reading and hearing of

By this it may appeare plainly that Homer devideth those, who thinke it a shame to be halt, blind, or otherwise impotent. He is of opinion, that nothing is blame worthy which is not dishonest: nor any thing dishonest and shamefull, which came not by our owne selves, but proceeded from fortune. And therefore these two great and singular commodities, they are sure to finde, who be exercised in reading and hearing of Poets: the one tending to moderation and modestic: in that they learne to reproch no man odiously, bitterly and foolishly with his fortune: the other unto magnanimitie; for that they be taught themselves to make use of their owne fortune: not to be cast downe and troubled, for any adverse calamitie that may happen; but meekly and patiently to abide the frumpes, scosses, reprochfull termes that are given them, yea, and the laughters that arise thereupon. And verily evermore this sentence of Philemon 10 ought to be ready at hand and resound in their eares:

Nothing there is more pleafant and musicall Then him to abide who doth thee mis-call.

Howbeit, if any of these mockers, deserve to be rebused and taunted againe, vantage would be taken of the vices and impersections of their minde, and those are to be objected against them; for so Adrastus in a tragedie when Alemann provoked with these words,

Alc. Asister thou hast (Itell thee true) who in husbands bloud her hands did embrue.

Adr. But thou thy felfe, (Imust tell plaine) thy mother that bare thee, hast cruelly slaine.

For like as they who whip and foourge garments, touch not the bodie at all: even fo they that upbraid a man with infortunitie, or reproch him for fome default or blemish in his parentage, doe like vaine sooles beat those things that are without, but never come neere the quicke, nor touch the soule, ne yet any thing which truly deserveth correction, blame or biting.

Over and befide, as wee shewed and taught before, how to impeach and derogate the credite of those leand sentences and dangerous speeches, which otherwhiles wee meet with in Poeticall books namely, by opposing against the same, the good and grave sawes of worthy persons, renowmed as well for their learning as politicke government: even so, if we finde any civill, honest, and profitable matter in Poetrie, we ought (as it were) to nourish, confirme and strengthen the same, by demonstrations and testimonics. Philosophicall: and evermore to resource that we ascribe the first invention of such sentences to sage Philosophers: For a just, requisite and commodious thing it is, that their credite should be in that maner fortified and authorized: namely, when the Poems which are pronounced upon the Stage in a Theatre, or sung to the harp, or taught unto children in schooles, do accord with the sententious counsels of Pythagoria, the instructions of Plato, and the precepts of Chilon: when I say the rules of Bian, shall tend to the same end and effect as do those lessons that children are to read and learne. And therefore we are to teach and instruct them thus much, not slightly and by the way, but cannelly and of purpose, that these places of Poets

Minde thou love sports, and thinke no scorne To joine young folke in marriage bed.

Likewife;

For Iupiter difpleased is with thee,

If that in fight thou unmarched bee.
nothing at all differ from this notable fentence, I was never i. Know thy felfe: but carie the verie fame fenfe and meaning.

Alfo these verses

Like fooles, they do not know, inth, That halfe than whole much better is:

Evill counsels hurt no man somuch, Oh.

are all one in effect with the opinions and discourses of Plate in his dialogue Gorgius, and in his books of Common weale; to wit, that more dangerous it is to doe wrong that to suffer injurie; and and more damage commeth by giving than by receiving an abuse. Also to this verse of Aeschylus

Be of good cheere: Exective paine Cannot endure nor long remaine: When wofull bale is at the higheft, Then bleffed boot (be fure) is nigheft.

we must say, that they be the very same with that divulged sentence so often repeated by Epicurus, and so highly admired by his followers, namely, That as great paines are not durable, so long griefs are tolerable. And as the former member of this sentence was evidently expressed by AcTo Schylus, so the other is a consequent thereof, and implied therein. For if a griefe that is sore and vehement, endureth not a surely that which continueth, can not be violent or intolerable.

Semblably this fentence of Thespis the Poet in verse

Thou feeft how love all other gods for this doth fare excell, Because that hes he doth abhorre, and pride of heart expell. He is not wont to laugh and scorne, to frumpe he doth dislature: He onely can not skill of lusts o and pleasures which be vaine.

is varied by Plato in prose, when he saith that the divine power is seated farre from pleasure and paine. As for these verses of Barehylides,

We holde it true, and ever will maintaine That glory found and vertue doth endure. Great wealth and flore we take to be but vaine, And may befall to vile men and impure.

As also these of Europides to the like sense;

Sage temperance I holde, we ought to honour most in heart;

For with good menit doth remaine, and never will depart.

As also these,

When honour and worldly wealth you have, To furnish your selves with vertue, take care, Without her striches you get and save,

Though bleffed you feeme, unhappy you are. Containe they not an evident proofe and demonstration of that which the Philosophers teach as touching riches and externall goods; which without vertue profit not those at all who are possessed of them? And verily thus to reduce, and fitly to accommodate the sentences of Poets 40 unto the precepts and principles delivered by Philosophers, will soone diffever Poetrie from fables, and plucke from it the masque wherewith it is disguised; it will give, I say, unto them an effeetuall power, that being profitably spoken, they may be thought serious and perswasive: yea, and belides, will make an overture and way unto the minde of a yoong ladde, that it may encline the rather to Philosophicall reasons and discourses: namely, when he having gotten some smarch and tasse alreadic thereof, and being not voide altogether of hearing good things, he shall not come altogether without judgement; replenished onely with foolish conceits and opinions which he hath evermore heard from his mothers and nurses mouth, yea, and otherwhiles (beleeve me) from his father, tutour and schoole-master: who will not sticke in his hearing to repute for bleffed and happie, yea, and with great reverence to give the worthip to 50 those who are rich: but as for death, paine and labour, to stand in seare and horror thereof: and contrariwife, to make no reckoning and account of vertue, but to despite the same, and thinke it as good as nothing, without earthly riches and authoritie. Certes, when yoong men shal come thus rawly and untrained, to heare the divisions, reasons & arguments of Philosophers, flat contrary to such opinions, they will at first be much assonied, troubled & disquieted in their minds: and no more able to admit of the fame, and to reduce fuch doctrine, than they, who having a long time benepent in, and kept in darke, can abide the glittering raies of the Sun shine: unlesse they were acquainted before by little & little with some falle and bastard light, not altogether so lively and cleere, as it: And even so, I say, yoong men must be accustomed beforehand, yea, and from the very first day, to the light of the trueth, entermingled somewhat with sables among, that they may the better endure the full light and fight of the cleere trueth, without any paine and offence at all. For when they have either heard or read before in Poemes these sen-

To conclude, in regard hereof, as also for other reasons before alleaged, A yoong man had neede to bewell guided and directed in reading of Poets, to the end that he may be fent to the studie of Philosophie not forestalled with sinister surmiles; but rather fufficiently instructed before and prepared, yea and made friendly and familiar thereto by the meanes of Poetrie.

HEARING.

The Summarie.

Y goodright, this prefent discourse was rangednext unto the former twaine. For Togodaright, this prejent discourse was ranged next unto the sormer twant. The second sensibly or any thing to reason, we ought to have heard men who are able to deliver sherr minds with judgement, to the ende, that by their aide and helpe we may be bester framed and fitted to the way of wersue: reguifie it is that after the imbibition of good nourture inchildhood, and some libertie and license given to travel in the the writings of Poets, according to the rules above declared. Young menthat are fludents should advance forward, and mount up into higher schooles. Now, for that in the time when this Author, Plutarch, lived, besides many good bookes, there were a great number of professions in the liberall Sciences, and namely in those rites into 50 which Burbarisme crept afterwards: he proposeth and setteth downethose precepts now which they are to follow and observe, that goe to heare publike lettures, orations and disputations, thereby to know how to behave themselves there; which training haply may reach to al that which we shal heare spoken elsewhere; and is materiall to make us more learned and better mannered. In the first place therefore he sheweth that at what time as we grow to yeeres of discretion, we should have a feeling of our ignorance, to the ende that we may be desirous to learne, and afterwards heare willingly. For to encrease our affection, he toucheth those dangers into which they fall, who will needs be teachers, before they be taught themsclves: adjoyning hereto those vices and inconveniences, which a young man is to take heed of in hearing and above all others, to beware of envie : as also on the other side what he ought to studie. Now, for that impossible it is, that teachers should be perfect and fully accomplished in all things, he proceedes h to declare with what minde and spirit we should take knowledge, and consider of their imperfections; giving withall an advertisement how to avoide another extremitie, to wit, an excessive admiration of him that speaketh, namely, to leave the principall substance of doctrine: the which will be so much more accepted, in case it be commended and adorned with eloquence. He commeth afterwards to treat of those problemes and questions which may be propounded in companies and mectings: also of the pleasure that we ought to take when we are told the truth: in such fort, that as we are 10 not to envy them for their excellencie, who speake any thing to raise and set us aloft : so, on the contrary side we ought to carie with us thither, a spirit favourable, gracious, well prepared, hating flatterie, loring reprehensions, patient, voide of that rusticall bashfulnes which we seein over blunt and dull natures, neither presumptuous nor yet discouraged, but keeping a goodmeasure and meane betweene vame curiositie and that supine soth and idlenes, which is in the most part of those that he heavers. To conclude, he would have him that hath diligently heard a certaine time, and with discretion, to exercise himselfe in devising and inventing some thing of his owne, in such sort that he may put the same foorth fo, as the outward part may discover well what goodnes there lyeth inclosed within.

His little treatife (my friend Nicander) which being gathered and compiled by flarts, as my leyfure would ferve Astouching the maner of Hearing, I lately put in writing, and fend here unto you, To the end that you being delivered now from the subjection of Maisters, who were woont to command you, and having put on your virile robe and growen to mans estate, may know how to heare him that giveth you good counsell. For this licentious casement and deliverie from all government, which fome yoong men for default of good nourture and education do untruely terme Libertie, setteth over them more rough Lords and harder Masters by farre, than were those teachers, tutors and governours, under whom they were awed in their childhood, to wit, their owne irregular lufts and unordinate appetites, which now be(as it were) dischained & let loose. For like as a woman (to use the words of Herodot w) no sooner doth of her smocke or inner vesture, but therewithall the casteth off all shamefastnes and modestie; even so, some young men there be, who together with the garments of infancie and childhood, lay by all grace, shame and feare: fo that being once divested of that habit and apparell which became them fowell, and gave them a modelt and sober countenance, they are straightwaies full of stubbornesse and disobedience. Asfor 40 your selfe, who have oftentimes heard, that To follow God, and to obey Reason is all one, you ought to thinke, that the wifer fort and fuch as have wit indeed, repute not the passage and change from chidhood to mans effate, an absolute deliverance and freedome from commandement and subjection, but an exchange onely of the commander; for that their life in steed either of a mercenarie hireling or fome mafter bought with a peece of money, who was woone to governe it in their nonage and minoritie, taketh then a divine and heavenly guide to conduct it, even Reason: unto which they that yeeld themselves obeisant, are to be reputed onely free and at libertie. For they alone live as they would, who have learned to will that which they should: whereas if our actions and affections both be difordinate and not ruled by reason, the libertie of our free-will is small, slender and feeble, yea and intermingled for the most part with 50 much repentance. Like as therefore among new Burgovises (who lately are enrolled Free-Denifens to enjoy the Franchifes and priviledges of some citie) they that were meete aliens before and strangers new come from far and remote parts, finde themselves grieved at the first with many things that are done, year and complaine thereof: but fuch as had beene inhabitants there. fometime before they were made citizens, who partly by education were inured, and partly by cultome and converfing, familiarly acquainted with the lawes and cultomes of the place, never thinke much, but can brooke well ynough, and undergo with parience all charges and impolitions laid upon them; So it behooveth that a yoong man should a long time have been e bred up, and (as it were) halfe nourfed in Philosophie, accustomed (Isay) he ought to have beene from the beginning with intermingling all that he learneth or heareth in his tender yeeres, with Philosophicall reasons, that being thus made tractable, gentle and familiar before hand, he might now betake himselfe wholy and in good earnest to Philosophie; which alone is able to array and adotne yoong men with those robes and ornaments, of reason which are manlike indeed and everie way perfect. Moreover, I suppose you will be well pleased and content, to give eare unto that which Theophrasus hath written of hearing; which of all the five senses given us by nature, presenteth both the most and also the greatest passions unto the minde. For there is no object of the eye, nothing that we taste or rouch that causeth such such safes, so violent troubles or sudden frights, as those which enter and pearce into the soule, by the meanes of some noises; so sould not reason than such affections; for many places there be and pasts of the bodie that make way and give entrance unto vices for to passe unto the soule; but the only handle (as I may so say) wherewith vertue may take holde of yong men are their eares: provided alwaies, that they were kept cleane and near at the first from all flatterie, and defended against corrupt and leawd speeches, that they touch them not. Good reason therefore had Xenocrates, to give order that children should have certaine auriclets or bolfters deviled to hang about their cares for their defence, rather than fencers and fword-plaiers: for that these are in danger onely to have their eares spoiled with knocks or cuts by weapons: but the other, to have their maners corrupted and marred with naughtie speeches. 20 Neither was it any part of Xenocrates his meaning, to deprive them altogether of hearing, and to commend deafeneffe: but to admonish and exhort them, so long to forbeate the hearing of evill words, and to take heed, untill other good fayings, enterteined and nourithed there, in long continuance of time by Philosophie, had seized the place, and were well setled in that part which is most easie to be mooved and perswaded by speech : where being once lodged, they might as good sentinels and guards preferve and defend the same. Bias verily, that auncient Sage, being commanded by king Amasis, to send unto him the best and woorst piece of a beast killed for factifice, plucked foorth the tongue onely, and fent it him; giving him thus much thereby to understand, That speech is the cause both of most good, and also of greatest harme. Many there be also, who ordinarily when they kiffe little children, both touch their cares withall, 30 and also bid them do the like: infinuating thus much covertly, by way of mirth and sport, That they are to love those who profit them and doe them good by their cares. For this is certaine and evident, that a yoong man deprived and debarred of hearing, being able to tafte and conceive reason, will not onely become barren altogether of fruit, and put out not so much as any buds and flowers at all, which may give fome hope of verme: but also contrariwise, will soone turne to vice, and fend foorth of his corrupt minde many wilde and favage shoots, like as a ground neglected and untilled, beareth nothing but briers, brambles and hurtfull weeds. For the motions and inclinations unto pleafures, and the finisher conceits and suspitions of paines and travels (which are no strangers to us iwis, entring in directly from without foorth by themfelves, or els let in by evill suggestions, but inbred with us, and the natural sources of infinite 40 vices and maladies) if a man fuffer to run on end with the raines at large, whither by nature they would go, and not cut them off by fage remonstrances, or divert them another way, and thereby reforme the default of nature; furely there were not upon the face of the earth any wildebeaft. but would be more tame and gentle than man. Forasmuch as therefore the sence of hearing bringeth unto young men so great profit, and no leffe perill with it, I suppose it were well done, if a man would eftfoones both devife with himfelle, and also discourse with others, as touching the order and maner of hearing. For a finuch as we doe fee most men in this point to offend and erre, in that they exercise themselves in speaking before they were used to heare: supposing that good speech requireth akinde of discipline, meditation and practise ere it be learned : as for hearing, though men use it without any art, it makes no matter how, yet they may receive 50 profit thereby as they thinke. And verily, albeit at Tennis play they that practife the feat thereof, learne to take the ball as it commeth, and also to strike and send it from them againe, both at once. Yet in the use of speech it is otherwise: for to receive it well, goeth before the interance and deliverie thereof: like as conception and retention of the feed, doeth præceed birth of the infant. It is faid, That the egges laid by fowles, called Wind-egges, as they proceed of imperfect and falle conceptions, fo they are the rudiments and beginnings of fuch fruits, as never will quicken and have life; even so, The speeches that young men let fall, such I meane, as never knew how to heare, nor were wont to receive profit by hearing, are nothing els indeed but yery winde: and as the Poet faith,

Words vaine, obsture, and foolish every one,
Which under clouds soone vanish and be cone.

Certes if they would powre out any liquor out of one veffell into another, they are wont to encline and turne downe the mouth of the one, fo, as the faid liquor may passe into the receptorie without shedding any part thereof, least in stead of an infusion indeed there be an effusion onely and spilling of the same: and yet thesemen cannot learne to be attentive and give good ware unto others, to as nothing do escape them, which is well and profitably delivered. But here To is the greatest folly and most ridiculous, that if they meet with one, who can relate the order of afcast or great dinner, discourse from point to point of a solemne shew or pompe, tella tale of forme dreame, or make report of a quarrell and brablement betweene him and another, they harken with great filence, bid him fay on, and will not miffe every circumstance: Let another man draw them apart, to teach them fome good and profitable lefton, to exhort them to their dutie, to admonish and tell them of a fault, to reproove them wherein they did amisse, or to appeale their moode when they be in choler, they can not abide and indure him: for either the will fer in handto argue and refute him by arguments contending and contesting against that which hath beene faid, (if they be able to to doe:) or if they finde themfelves too weake, they flinke away, and run thither, where they may heare fome other vaine and foolish discourses, desirous to fill 20 their eares (like naughtic and rotten veffels) with any thing rather then that, which is good and necessarie. They that would keepe and order horses well, teach them to have a good mouth, to reine light, and to obey the bit: even fo, they that bring up children as they ought, make them obsequent and obeisant to reason, by teaching them to heare much and speake little. For Spintharus praifing Epaminondus upon a time, gave out thus much of him, That he could hardly meet with another man who knew more than hee, and spake lesse. And it is commonly said, that nature herfelfe hath given to each us but one tongue and two eares, because we ought to heare more than we speake. Now as Silence and Taciturnitie is everiewhere and at all times a fingular and fure ornament of a yoong man; fo especially, if when hee heareth another man to speake he interrupt and trouble him not, nor baie and barke (as it were) at every worde: 30 but although he do not very well like of his speech, yet hath patience and sorbeareth, giving him leave to make an end; and when he hath finished his speech, setteth not upon him presently, nor beginneth out of hand to confute him, but fuffereth him to paule a while, and as Aefchines faith, giveth him fome time to breath and bethinke himselfe to see, if haply he thinke is good to adde any more to that which hath beene delivered already, or change for ewhat, or els retract and unfay fomething: Whereas, they that by and by cut a man off, with contradictions, and neither heare, nor are well heard themselves, but are ever replying upon other, whiles they speake, observe no decorum nor grace arall, but shew a very undecent and unseemely behavior. But he that is accustomed to heare patiently, and with a modest and sober countenance, better conceivethand reteineth the good things uttered, and withall hath more leafure to marke, ob-40 ferve and different that which is either unprofitable or false: He sheweth himselfe besides, to be a lover of the trueth, and is not taken for a litigious quareller, a rath wrangler, or a bitter brawler. And therefore, somethere be, who not unaptly say, That we ought no leffe, but rather more, to void out of the minds of yoong men that prefumption and foolish opinion which they have of their owne selves, than to rid and exclude the winde and aire out of leather bagges or bladders wherewith they are puft and blowen up, if we meane to infuse and put any good thing into them: for otherwise, if they be still full of that swelling winde of arrogancie and overweening of themselves, they will never receive and admit any goodnesse.

Moteover, envie accompanied with a maligne eie and ill will is good in no action what so ever where it is present: but as it is an impediment and hinderance to all honest causes; so it is to the woorst counsellor and affistant that he can have who would be an auditor, making all those things that be profitable and for his benefit, to seeme odious, unpleasant, harsh to the care and hardly admitted; sor that the nature of envious persons is, to take more pleasure in any thing else than in that which is well spoken. And verily, who so ever repineth and is vexed at the learnt to see others rich, beautifull or in authoritie, is onely envious: for greeved he is at the welfare of others: but he that taketh discontentment in heating a wise and sententious speech, is offended with the good of his owne selfe: for like as the light is a benefit to them that see; even so is speech unto the heaters if they will embrace and entertaine the same: As for those kinds of enfects vie which arife in regard of other things, there be some naughtie passions and vitious conditions of the minde belides, that breed and ingender them : but that maner of envie which is conceived against them that speake excellently well, springeth from a certeine & important desire of vaine glorie, and unjust ambition, which will not fuffer him that is fo indisposed to give eare and attend unto the words spoken, but troubleth, disquieteth; and distracteth the minde and understanding : both to consider at one instant his owne state and sufficiencie, whether it beins rior to the conceit and eloquence of the speaker: and also to regard and looke upon the countenance of other hearers, whether they take contentment and are in admiration of himidaa maketh the speech: yea and withall, if happly he be praised, the same minde is woonderfully galled and amazed, angrie and ready to fall out with all that be preferr, in cafe they approove 10 his speech with applause. Herewith it letteth slip also and rejecteth the matter and good fayings that were delivered already; for that the remembrance thereof is unfaverie and unplease fant: and full he is disquieted and wotteth not what to do, hearing out the rest with feare and trembling, left haply they should be better than the former, never so desirous that the speakers should hasten to an end and have done, as when they discourse and speake best. Now when the Sermon is ended, and the auditoric diffolved: what doth this envious spirit then? not ruminate; be you fure, nor confider of the reasons and matter delivered; but he stirreth the affections and opinions straightwaies, and gathereth voices (as it were in a scrutinic) of the audience. If he meet with any that give out good words to the praise of the Preachet, them hee avoideth and fleeth from, as if he were in a furious fit of madnesse: hapneth he upon such as finde fault, and be 20 ready to misconstrue and pervert the words that were spoken, to the woorst sense: these are they whom hee lovethalife, to them he runneth, and with them hee forteth and keepeth companie: But fay that he finde none of that disposition, so as he can not wrest any words to a wrong conflruction, then hefalleth to make comparisons, and to set against him, others younger than he; who of the same theame have discoursed better, with more plausible utterance and greater force of eloquence: he never ceafeth nor giveth over corrupting, milinterpreting, and differacing the whole speech, untill he have made the same altogether unprofitable and without any edification ar all to his owne selfe. It behooved therefore, that he who defireth to heare, take truce (for the time) with ambition 3 to the end that hee may give care with patience and mildneffe unto him that maketh an oration or fermon, and cary himselfe no otherwise than if he were admitted to 20 fome facred and feltival banker, or an invited guest to the first fruits of a solemne facrifice; praifing his eloquence when he hath spoken well and sufficiently to the point in any matter, accepting favourably, and in best part, his good will, to deliver and communicate to others, fuch things as he knew, and to perfinade his hearers with those reasons and motives which had indusced and perswaded himselse. Neither must our auditours make this reckoning and conclusion, That whatfoever hathbeene fingularly well delivered by the speaker, ought to be ascribed to chance and fortune, as if he had let fall his words at aventure: but impute the fame to his diligence, labour and art: yea, and he ought to imitate the same with a kinde of zeale and admira: tion. But whereas he hath faulted and done amisse, it is the part of an hearer to bend his minde, and confider well and circumfpectly, what might the cause and occasion be of such errour: For 40 like as (according to Xenophon) good houtholders know how to make profit and use, aswellof their enemies as their friends, even fo they that be vigilant and attentive heaters, take good, not onely by them that speake well, but by those also that misse and faile of their purpose: for barren, triviall and stale invention; improper, vaine and unfignificant words; forced and fooliffs figutes; abrupt, fond, and unfeemly breakings foorth with joy to some praise, and such like impertinences or defects, which often times befall unto them that speake in publike place; are sooner espied by us that are hearers, than observed by themselves who are the speakers. And therefore we are to transferre the inquilition and correction of any fuch fault, from them to our felves, by examining whether we also may not fault likewise, before we be aware? For there is nothing in the world more easie, than for a man to blame and reprehend his neighbour: but such a repre- 50 hension verily is vaine and unprofitable, unlesse it have a reference to correct and amend the like errours in himselfe. In which regard every one ought to be ready in this case, according to the advertisement of Plato, to say unto himselfe, Am not I also such an one? or doe not I the femblable otherwhiles? For even as we see our owne eies shining within the ball or apple of our neighbours cie, fo we ought by the forme & maner of other mens orations to take the patterne and representation of our owne; to the end that we be not too forward and bolde in despising others, but may more carefully take heed to our felves when wee likewise come to speake. To this purpose allow would doe very well, to make a kinde of conference and comparison in this maner; Namely 100 retire our felves apart when we have heard one make an oration, and to take in hand forme points, which weethlinke had not beene well and fufficiently handled, and then to affay either to supply that which was defective in some, or to correct what was amiffe in others: or els to varie the fame matter in other wordes, or ar leastwife to discourse altogether the teof, with new reasons and arguments; like as Plate himselfe did upon the oration of Lysias, For, I affure you anothered matterities, but very easie to contradict the oration and reason by another pronounced 5 mary to fet abetter by it , that is a piece of workeright hard and difficult ... Much like, as when a certaine Lacedemonian heard, that Philip king of Macedon had demolished To and rafed the city Whathun, Hade he fo ? quoth he, But he is notable to fet up fuch another. Nowwhen as wellhall fee that intreating of the fame subject and argument, there is no great difference betweene our owner doings and other mens before us, and that we have not farte excelled them, we shall be reclaimed much from the contempt of others, and quickly represe and flay our owne prefumptuous pride and felfeslove, feeing it thus checked by this triall and comparison. And verily, to admire other mensionings, as it is a thing adverse and opposite to defpifing, foir is a figne of a milder nature, and more enclined to indifferencie and equitie. But even herein also there would be no leffe heedtaken (if not mote) than in the contempt beforefaid : for as they which are for prefumptuous, bolde, and given to much to dispraise and despite others, receive leffe good and maller profit by hearing; to the fimple and harmeleffe fort, adso dicted overmuch to others, and having them in admiration, are more subject to take harme and hurt thereby: verifying this sentence of Heraelitus,

ederall be hear's, or feet b dones and organism As for the praises therefore, of him that speaketh, we ought favorable and of course without great affectation to passethem out of our mouthes: in giving credite unto their reasons and arguments we are to be more wisin and circums spect: and as southing the phrase, utterance, and action of those that exercise no make speeches; we must both see and heare the same with a single hart and a kind affection: As for the utilitie and truth of those matters which are delivered. we flould examine and weigh the fame exactly & with more severitie of judgement. Thus we 30 who be hearens thall avoid the suspitions of evil will and hatred & they againe that are speakers shall do usno karme. For oftentimes it falleth out that upon a special faustine and good liking unto those that preach unto us we takelesse heed to our selves and by our credulitie admit & embraces from their lips many false & erroneous opinions. The Lacedamonian rulers & Lords of the Counfel of effate, upon a time liking wel of the good advile and opinion of a person who was an ill liver, caused the same to be delivered openly by another of approoved life and good reputation: wherein they did very wifely & abprudent politicians, to accustome the people for to affect the behavior and honest carriage of their counsellots, rather than to respect their words onely. But in Philosophicat is otherwise: For we must last afide the reputation of the man who hath in publike place spoken his minde; and examine the matter apart by it selfe : For that, like 40 as in warre(we fay) there be many falle alarmes: fo also in an auditorie there passe as many vanities: The goodly grey beard and hoatic had of the speaker, his solenme getture and compoling of his countenance, his grave cichrowes, his glorious words in behalfe of himfelfe: but above all the acclamations, the applante and clapping of hands, the leaping and shouting of the standers by and those that are present in place, are enough other whiles to trouble and aftonish the spirits of a yoong heardr, who is not well acquainted with such matters, and carie him away perforce as it were with a streame: Over and besides, there is in the very style and speech it selfe a secret powerable to beguild aid deceive a young novice; namely, if it funne round away importh and pleafant; and if withall there be a certeine affected gravitie, and artificiall porrand boftine fle, to for our and graces the matter. And even as they that play upon the go pipe, be it cornet, recorder or life, fault many times in mulicite, and are not perceived by the hearers a foarbrave and elegant nongue; a dopious and gallant oration, dazeleth the wits of the hearer, forshe can not judge foundly of the matter in hand. Melant being demaunded upon a time, what he thought of a Tragadic of Diegener: I could not fee it (quoth he) for fo many words, where with it was choaked up. Burthe Orations & declamations for the most part of these Spohisters, who make show of their eloquence, hor onely have their sentences covered (as it were) with vailes and curtaines of words, but that which more is, they themselves do dulce their voice by the meanes of (I wot not what) devised notes for founds, exquisite and musical accents accents in their pronuntiation, so as they ravish the wits of the hearers, and transport them befide themselves: leading and carying them which way they lift; and thus for a certeine little vaine pleasure that they give, receive againe applause and glorie much more vaine: Insomuch, as that befalleth properly unto them which by report Diony fine answered upon a time : who seemed to promise unto a samous minstrell for his oxcellent play in an open Theatre, to reward him with great gifts, gave him in the end just nothing, but faid he had recompensed him sufficiently already: For looke (quoth he) how much pleasure I have received from thee by thy fong and minftrelfy, so much contentment and joy thou hast had from me by hoping for some great reward. And verily fuch recompense as this have those Sophisters and great Orators at their hearers hands: For admired they are fo long as they fit in their chaire, and give delight unto 19 their auditorie: No fooner is their speech ended, but gone is the pleasure of the one, and the gloric of the other. Thus the Auditours spend their time, and the speakers employ their whole life in vaine. For this cause, it behooveth a young hearer to sequester and set aside the ranke superfluitie of words and to feeke after the fruit it felfe: and heerein not to imitate women, that plait and make garlands of flowres, but to follow the Bees: For those women laying for, and choosing faire flowres and odoriferous herbes, with, plat and compose them so, as they make thereof a peece of worke (I must needs say) pleasantto the senses, but fruitlesse altogether, and not lasting above one day: whereas the Bees flying oftentimes over & over the medowes full of Violets, Roses and Crowtoes, light at length upon Thyme, an herbe of a most strong sent, and quicke tafte and there fettle,

The yellow home for to make, and when they have gathered from them fome profitable juice or liquor to ferve their turne, they flie away unto their proper worke and businesse: Semblably ought an auditour who is studious of skill and knowledge, and hath his minde and understanding free from passions, to let paffe, affected, flourishing and superfluous words givea, and such matters also as be fit for the Stage and Theatre, reputing them to be food meet for drone Bees (I meane Sophisters) and nothing good for honie: and rather with diligence and attentive heed to found the very depth and profound intention of the speaker, for to draw that which is good & profitable: remebring eftsoons, that he is not come thither as to a Theatre, either to see sports & pastimes, or to heare 30 anuficke and Poeticall fables, but into a schoole & auditorie, for to learne how to amend and reforme his life by the rule of reason. And therefore he must enter into his owne heart and examine himselse when he is alone, how he was mooved and affected with the Lecture or Sermon that he heard; confider (Ifay) and reason he ought with himselse whether he find any turbulent paffions of his minde thereby dulced and appealed; whether any griefe or heavinesse that trouble him be mitigated and affwaged; whether his courage and confidence of heart be more resolute and better confirmed; and in one word, whether he seele any instinct unto vertue and honestie, to be more kindled and enslained. When we rise out of the Barbars chaire, we thinke it meete presently to consult with a mirrour or looking glasse; we stroke our head to see whether he hath polled and notted it well; we confider and petule our beard and every haire whether 40 we have the right cut, & be trimmed as we ought a thame it were then, to depart from a schole or a lecture, and not immediately to retire apart and view our mindewell, whether it have laide away any foolish thought that troubled it: whether it be cased of superfluous and wandring thoughts, that clogged it: and be thereby more lightforme and pleafant. For neither a Baine and Striph, as Ariffon faith, nor a fermon doth any good, if the one do not feoure the skin, and the other clenfe the heart. A poblicate organication of the silver

A yoong man therefore is to take joy and delight if he have made profit by a lecture, or be better edified by hearing a fermon. And yet I write not this, as if this pleafure should be the finall end that he proposeth to himselfe when he goeth to such a lecture or fermon, neither would I have him thinke that he should depart out of the Philosophers schoole, with a merie 50 note finging jocundly, or with a frethand cheerefull countenance; ne yet to use meanes to be perfumed with sweete odors and ointments, whereas he hath more need of Embracations, Fomentations and Cataplasmes: but to take it well and be thankfull, if haply by some sharpe words and cutting speeches, any man hathycleansed and purified his heart full of cloudie mists and palpable darkenes, like as mendrive Bee-hives and rid away Bees with smoke. For albeit, he that preacheth unto others ought not to be altogether carelesse and negligent in his stile, but that it may carrie with it forme pleasure, delectation and grace, aswel as probabilitie and reason : yet a voong man when he commeth to heare should not stand so much thereupon, but have least regard thereto, especially at the first: marrie afterwards (I will not say) but he may well ynough have an eie unto it alfo. For like as those that drinke, after they have once quenched their thirst, have lev fure to peruse the cups & turne them about every way, to view and consider the worke engraven or imprinted upon them; even fo, when a yong student or auditor is well replenished and furnished with doctrine, after he hath breathed and panfed a while, may be permitted to consider farther of the speech, namely, what elegant and copious phrases it hath, 'As for him, who at the verie beginning attendeth not nor cleaveth unto the matter and fubftance, but hunteth after the language onely, defiring that it should be pure Atticke, fine and smooth: I can 10 liken such a one to him, who being empoisoned will not drinke any Antidote or counterpoison, unlesse the pot or cup wherein it is, be made of the Colian earth in Attica: or who in the cold of winter will not weare a garment, except it were made of the wooll that came from the Attike Theepes backe; but had rather fit still idle doing nothing and stirring not, with some thin mantell and overworne gaberdine cast over him, fuch as be the orations of Lyfins his penning. The errours committed in this kinde, have beene the cause why there is found so little wit and understanding, and contrariwise so much tongue and bibble-babble, such vaine chattring about words in yoong men throughout the Schooles: who never observe the life, the deeds, the carriage and demeanor in State government of a Philosopher, but give all praise and commendation to his fine termes and elegant words, onely fetting out his eloquence, action and readic 20 deliverie of his oration, but will not in any wife learne or enquire whether the matter fo uttered be profitable or unprofitable, necessarie or vaine and superfluous.

Next to these precepts, how we should heare a Philosopher to discourse at large and with a continued speech, there followethin good consequence a rule and advertisement as touching thort questions and problemes. A man that commeth as a bidden guest unto a great supper, ought to be content with that which is fet before him upon the table, and neither to call for any viands elfe, nor to finde fault with those that are present: He also that is invited to a Philosophicall feaft or banket (as I may fay) of discourses, in case they be matters and questions certaine and chosen long before for to be handled, ought to do nothing else but heare with patience and filence him that speaketh: for they that distract and hale him away to other theames, interpo-30 fing interrogations and demaunds, or otherwife moove doubts or make oppositions as he speaketh, are troublesome and unportunate hearers, such as be unsociable and accord not with an auditorie; who besides that they receive no profit themselves, disturbe both the speaker and the speech also. But in case the partie that standeth ad oppositum, doe of himselfe will and pray his auditors to aske him questions and to propose what they will; then they ought to propound fuch demaunds as be either necessarie or profitable. Viffes verily in Homer was mocked by the wooers of his wife, because

> He sald for shieves of bread to eat, And not for swords or candrons near.

For it was reputed a figne of magnanimity to demaund, aswel as to give things of great price 40 and value. Much more then might a man deride and laugh at the auditor, who will moove unto a Master or Doctour of the Chaire; trifling, frivolous and fruitlesse questions, as otherwhiles fome of these yoong men do : who taking pleasure to vaunt themselves, and to thew what great schollers they are in Logicke or the Mathematikes, are woont to put foorth questions as touching the fections of things indefinite: also, what be litterall motions or Diametricall? Vnto whom a man may verie well answere as Philotimus the Phisitian did unto one that had a suppuration in his chift, and by reason of an inward ulcer of his lungs was in a consumption, who comming to him for counfell, defired that he would give him a incdicine for a little whit-flow growing about the roote of his naile: but Philotiman perceiving by his colour and shortnes of winde in what case he was; My good friend (quoth he) you have no such need of a cure for your 50 whit-flow, you may hold your peace well enough at this time for any danger there: Even fo, it may be faid unto one of these young men; There is no time now to thinke or dispute upon fuch questions, but rather by what meanes you may be freed from presumptuous overweening of your felfe, from pride and arrogance, from wanton love and foolish toics: that you may be fetled in a found state of life, devoide of vanitie. Moreover, this young man is to have a good cie and regard unto the fufficiencie of the speaker, whether it be by naturall inclination, or gotten by experience and practife, and accordingly to frame and direct his questions in those points wherein he is most excellent: and in no wife to force him who is well read and stu58 died in Morall Philosophie, to answer unto Physical or Mathematicall questions: or him that is better scene in Natural Philosophy to draw unto Logick, for to give his judgment of Hypothetical propositions & to resolve them: or to move the knots & make solution of false Syllogisms, Elenches fophisticall and such fallacies. For like as one that would goe about to cleave wood with a key, or unlocke a doore with an axe, feemeth not fo much to doe hurt unto those instruments, as to deprive himselfe of the proper use and commoditie as well of the one as the other; Even so, they that require of a Speaker that which he is not apt unto by nature, or wherein he is not well practifed, & will not reape, gather & take that which willingly commeth from him, and wherewith he is able to furnish them, are not only hurt therein, but incurre the name and blame of a pievith, froward and malicious nature. Furthermore this heed would be taken, not to over- 10 lay him with many questions, nor oftentimes to urge him therewith. For this bewraiethone, that in fome fort loveth to heare himfelfe speake and would be seene: whereas, when another doth propose a question to give attentive care, and that with mildnes and patience, is a signe of a studious person, and one that knoweth well how to behave himselfe in companie, and can abide that others should learne aswell as he: unlesse perhaps some private and particular occurrent do urge the contrarie, or some passion do hinder, which had neede to be stated and represfed or else some maladie and imperfection which requireth remedie. For peradventure as Heraclism faith, it were not good for one to hide and conceale his owne ignorance, but to let it appecre and beknowen, and fo to cure it. But fay, that some fit of choler, some assault of scrupulous superstition, or some violent quarell and jarre with one houshold and kinssolke, or some 20 furious passion proceeding from wanton lust,

Which doth the fecret heart strings move,

That earst were never stir'd with love, trouble our understanding, and put it out of tune, we ought not for the avoiding of a reproofe, to flie for refuge to other matters, and interrupt the discourse begun, but be desirous to heare of fuch things, even in open places of exercises; and after the exercise or lecture done, to take the Philosophers or Readers aside, and conferre with them, to be further enformed: not as many doe, who are well enough contented to heare Philosophers speake of others, and have them therefore in great admiration: but if it chance that a Philosopher leave other men, and turne his speech to them apart, to tell them freely and boldly what he thinketh, admonishing and put-30 ting them in minde of such things as do concerne them, then they are in a chase, then they say he speakes besides the text and more then needs. For of this opinion are these men, That wee are to heare Philosophers in Schooles for pastime, as plaiers of Tragedies in a Theatre upon the Stage: As for other matters out of the Schoole, they holde them no better men than themfelves: and to fay a trueth, good reason have they so to deeme of Sophisters, who are no sooner out of their chaires, or come downe from off the pulpit, and when their books, and pettie introductions are laid out of their hands, but in other ferious actions and parts of this life to be difcourfed of, a man shall finde them as raw as other, and nothing better skilled than the vulgar fort. But to come unto those Philosophers indeed, who worthily are so to be called and effecmed, ignorant are such persons above reheated, that their words (be they spoken in earnest or 40 in game) their becks, their nods, their countenance, whether it be composed to smiling or to frowning, but principally their words directed privately to every one a part, be all fignificant, and cary some fruit commodious to those that with patience will give them leave to speake, and are willing and used to hearken unto them.

As concerning the praises which we are to attribute unto them for their eloquence and well fpeaking, there would in this dutie fome wife caution & meane be used : for that in this case, neither overmuch nor too little is commendable & honest. And verily that scholar, who seemeth not to be moved or touched with any thing that he heareth, is a heavie and unsupportable auditour, full of a fecret prefumptuous opinion of himselfe, conceited inwardly of his owne sufficiencie, of an inbred felfe-love and aptneffe to speake much of his owne doings, shewing evident- 50 ly that he thinketh he can speake better than that which hath beene delivered: Inregard whereof, he never stirs brow any way decently, he uttereth not a word to testific that he heareth willingly and with contentment: but by a certaine forced filence, affected gravitie, and counterfeit countenance, would purchase and winne unto himselse the reputation of a stated man, of a profound and deepe clerke: and is as sparie of his praises, as of his purse and money in it, imagining that they bid him loffe, who would have him part with any one jot thereof, as if he robbed himselfe of so much as he imparted to another. For many there be who misconster & interpret in ill sense one sentence of Pythagoras, when he faith, That he had gotten this fruit by the studie of Philosophie, namely, to have nothing in admiration. And these men are of this opinion, that because they are not to admire, praise, and honor others, therefore they must despise and dispraise them, and by the disdaine and contempt of others they thinke themselves to seeme grave and venerable. For reason Philosophicall, although it rejecteth that woonder and admiration which proceedeth of doubt or ignorance, for that the knoweth the cause of everie thing, and is able to discourse thereof; yet for all that it condemneth not courtesie, magnanimitie and humanitie. For certes unto fuch as truely and certainly are good, a right great honor it is to honour those that are worthie of honor: also for a man to adorne another is an excellent ornament proceeding from a superabundance (as it were) of glorie and honor which is in himfelfe, voide of all envie and malice. Whereas those that be niggards in praising of another, feeme to be poore & bare themselves that way, & bewray how hungrie they be after their owner praises. Now on the contrarie side, he who without all judgement & discretion at everie word and fyllable(in a maner) is readie to rife up & give acclamation, offendeth afmuch another way, being a man of levitie and inconstancie, oftentimes displeaseth, even them that be the speakers, but alwaies is offensive and troublesome to other affistants about him: causing them to rise up eftfoons & lift up themfelves against their wils, drawing them perforce to do as they see him do. and even for verie shame and modestie, to set up some cries and acclamations with him for companie. Nowafter that he hath reaped no fruit nor edification by the oration that he hath 20 heard, for that he had so troubled and disquieted the auditorie by his unseasonable praises, he returneth from thence with one of these three additions to his stile: namely, either a Mocker, a Flatterer, or a Blockhead, who understood not what was faid. A judge I must needs fay, when he fitteth upon the feat of Iustice to heare and determine causes, ought to give eare unto both parties without hatred or favour, voide of all affection, and respective onely to right and equitie. But in the auditories where learned men are met together, there is neither law nor oath hindereth us, but that we may heare him with favour and benevolence, who doth speake and discourse unto us. And even our ancients in old time were woont to place and fet Mercurie in their temples neere unto the Graces, giving us thereby to know that above all things, a speech publikely delivered, requireth a gracious and friendly audience: for they never thought that the 20 speaker would be such an outcast, or so farre short and unsufficient; but if he were not able either to fay fornewhat of his owne invention praise worthy, or to report from auncients that which is memorable, or to deliver the subject matter of his speech together with his drift and intention, so as it deserved applause: yet at leastwife, his eloquation and disposition of everie part might be commendable: for according to the old proverb,

Of Hearing.

With Calibrap-thistles rough and keen, with pricky Rest harrow. Close Scions faire and white are seen with foft walflowres to grow.

For if some to shew their wit, have taken upon them the praise of vomiting, others of fever, and 40 some iwis of a pot or caudron, and yet have not failed of favor and approbation: how can it otherwise be, but that the oration compassed by a grave personage, who in some sort is reputed, or at least wife called a Philosopher, should minister unto benevolent, gracious and courteous Auditours some respit and opportunitie of time for to praise and commend the same? Al those that are in the flowre and prime of their age, faith Plato, one way or other, do affect and moove him that is enamoured on them: infomuch as if they be white of colour, he calleth them the children of the gods: if blacke of hew, he termes them manly and magnanimous: be one hawke-nofed, such he nameth Roiall and of a kingly race: is he camoife or flat nofed, him he will have to be gentle, pleasant and gracious: and to conclude, looketh one pale & yellow, then to cover and mollifie in some fort that ill colour, he useth to call him Hony-face: and every one 50 of these defects, he loveth and embraceth as severall beauties: For in love is no lacke, and of this nature it is to claspe and cleave to every thing that it can reach or meet withall, in maner of Ivy;much more then wil he that is a studious scholar & a diligent hearer, find alwaies one thing or other, for which he may seeme worthily to praise any one that mounteth up into the chaire for to declaime or discourse. For even Plato himselfe, who in the oration of Lyssas commended not the invention; and as for the disposition thereof, utterly found fault therewith as disorderly and confused: yet he praised his stile and eloquution, & gave this attribute unto it, that every word was perspicuous and lightsome, and withall ran round, as if they all had beene artificiallie wrought with the Turners instrument. A man that were so disposed, may seeme in reason to reproove in Archylocus the argument and subject matter: in Parmenides the composition of his verfes: in Phocylides, the meane and homely matter: the loquacity of Euripides, and the inequalitie or uneven stile of Sophoeles: After which fort, you shall have among Oracours and Rhetoricians, one who cannot expresse the naturall disposition of a man, another who hath no power in resembling passions & affections, and another agains who faileth in graceland yet ech one of them commendable enough for some particular and especiall gift, either to moove or to delight. In which regard, the hearers also, may find sufficient matter & pleasure enough to gratific and content if they lift, those that speake and make orations to them. For some of them is fufficeth although we do not testific our good liking of them by lively and open voice, to give 10 them a favourable regard of the eie, to frew them a milde and gentle vifage, a cheerefull looke, an amiable disposition of the countenance, without any signe of sadnes and heavinesse. And verily, these things are growen now to be so common and ordinary, that we can affoord them evento those who speake but so so and to no purpose at all; insomuch, as every auditoric can skill thereof: Butto fit still modestly in his place without any token of disdaine; to beare the body upright, leaning neither one way nor other; to fixe the eie wiftly upon him that fpeaketh; to show a forward gellure, as if one gave great attention and marked every word seriously; to set and dispose the countenance plaine, pure and simple, without any signification at all, not onely of contempt or discontentment, but also of all other cares and thoughts whatsoever, be evident tokens of approbation, and tend all thereto. For, as in every thing els, beautic and fauour is 20 composed and framed (as it were) of many numbers meeting and concurring in one, and all together at the fame time, and that by a certaine fymmetrie, confonance and harmonie: but that which is foule and ill fauoured, is bred immediatly by the least thing in the world, that either is wanting, or added and put to abfurdly, otherwife than it should; even so we may notably obferve in this action of hearing, not onely the knitting and bending of the browes, or the heavie cheere of the visage, a crooked aspect and wandring cast of the eye, a writhing away or turning about of the bodie, an undecent change of the thighes croffe one over another: but a very nod of the head, or winke of the eye alone, the whifpering or rounding one of another in the care, a bare fmile, gapings, and drowfie yawnings, as if a man were ready to drop afleepe: finally, the hanging downe of the head, and whatfoever gestures of that fort, wee are countable for as fault 30 woorthy, and they would be carefully taken need of. Howbeit, there be some of this opinion, that the speaker indeed ought to looke unto himselfe and his behaviour when hee is aloft; but the hearers beneath need not. They would (Ifay) have him who is to make a speech in publike place, to come well prepared, and with diligent præmeditation of that which he ought to fay: but as for the hearers, they have no more to doe but to take their places, without any forethinking of the matter, without any care and regard at all of duetie and demeanour after they be fet, as if they were come to a very supper, and nothing els, there to take their repast or ease themfelices, whiles others take paine and travell. And yet a guest that goeth to suppe with another, hath fomething to doe and observe when he sits at the table, if hee would be thought civilland mancrly: how much more then, in all reason, is an auditour bound so to do, who is to heare an-40 other speake. For he is partaker with him of his speech, yea, and by right, a coadjutour of him: he ought not then, to examine rigouroully his faults escaped; hee is not to fift narrowly, and weigh in severe ballance ech word of his, and every gesture; whiles hee himselse (exempt from centure and controlment, and without feare of being espied and searched into) committeth many enormities, unseemly parts, and incongruities in hearing. For like as at Tennis play, he that receiveth the ball, ought in the stirring and motion of his bodie to accommodate himfelfe handfomely and in order to his fellow that finit it; even fo betweene the speaker and the hearer, if both of them observe their duetie and decencie, there would be a mutuall and reciprocall proportion. Now in yeelding praises unto the Reader or Speaker, we must not inconsiderately, the all maner of termes and acclamations without difference. For Epicurus himfelfe is 50 not well liked, but odious, when he faith, That upon the reading of any letters missive from his friends unto him, they that were about him did fet up exceffive outcries and applauses, with troublesome clapping of their hands. And verily those who bring in now adayes into the auditorie uncoth and strange noises by way of acclamation; they also who have brought up these termes, O heavenly and divine speech; The voice of God & not of man, uttered by his mouth; and, Who is able to come neere unto him? as though it were not sufficient, simply thus to say; O well faid, Wifely spoken, or, Truely delivered; which were the testimonies and signes of praise which Plato, Socrates, and Hyperides used in old time) such men, I say, doe highly offend, and passe the bounds of decencie exceeding much: nay, they doe traduce and abuse the speakers themselves, as though they did hunt after, and lay for such excessive and proud commendations. Those also be odious and unpleasant, who as if they were in some judiciall Court, depose and give formall testimonie as touching the honour of the speakers, and binde the same with an oth: neither be they in leffe fault, who without regard of the qualitie of persons, doe accomodate unto them their titles of praise beside all decorum: As for example, when they be ready to crie aloud unto a Philosopher, O quicke and wittie saying! and unto an olde man, O what a brave and jolly speech is this! transferring and applying unto Philosophers those words 10 and termes that ordinarily are used or attributed to plaiers, or such as exercise and shew themfelves in feholalticall declamations and to a ferious and fober oration, giving a praise more befeeming a light and wanton courtifan: which is as much, as if upon the head of a victorious champion, they (hould fet a garland of lillies or rofes, and not of the lawrell or wilde olive tree. Euripides verily, the Poet, when one overlieard him as he prompted and endited unto the actors or persons in the Charus, a certaine song set to musicall harmonie, and therewith laughed heartilie whiles he instructed them in finging the same; If thou wert not (quoth hee) some blackith and senselesse dolt, thou wouldest never laugh when I sung a heavy mixt-Lydian tune, or a note to a dumpe or dolefull dittie. Semblably, a grave Philosopher, and a man exercised in managing State affaires, might very well in mine advise, cut off, and represse the delicate insolency 20 of fome auditour, over wantonly disposed to mirth and jolity, by faying thus unto him; Thou feemest unto me a brainfick fellow, & untaught for otherwise whiles I am teaching, preaching, and reprooving vices, discoursing and reading of policie and the administration of Common weale, of the nature of the gods, or the ductic of a Magistrate, thou wouldest neither daunce thus and fing as thou doeft. For confider with me intrueth, what a diforder is this, That when a Philolopher is in the Schoole at his lecture reading, they within should keepe a crying and howling, and make such noises, as they that be without can not tell whether it be some piper, harper, or danneer that they thus do praise, such a cosused brute they make within. Moreover, we ought not to hearethe reprehensions, rebukes, and corrections of Philosophers, rechlesly without fense of griefe and displeasure, nor yet unmanly: for they that can so well abide to be reprooved 30 or blamed by a Philosopher, and make nothing adoe at it, infomuch as when they be found fault withall, they fall a laughing, or can finde in their hearts to praise those that do reprehend them, much like unto these flattering Parasites, who are content to extoll and commend their good mafters that give them their meat and drinke, notwithstanding they be reviled and taunted by them: thefe fellowes (I fay) of all others, be most rash, audacious and bolde, shewing thereby their shamelesse impudencie, which is no good nor true argument of courage and fortitude. As for a pretie scoffe pleasantly delivered, and in mirth, without any wrong meant, or touch of credit, if a manknow how to take it well, and be not moved thereby to choler and displeasure, but laughit out, it doth argue no base minde, nor want of wit and understanding, but is a liberall and gentleman-like qualitie, favouring much of the ingenuous maner of the Lacedæmonians. 40 But to heare a sharpe checke that toucheth the very quicke, and a reprehension to reforme maners, delivered in cutting and tart words, much like unto an egar and biting medicine, and therwith not to be cast downe, and shrinke together for feare, nor to run all into a sweat, or be ready to recle and stagger with a dizinesse in the head, for very shame that hath set the heart on fire, but to feeme inflexible and nothing thereat moved, fmiling in fome fort, and drily fcoffing after a diffembling maner, is a notable figne of a most diffolute and illiberall nature, past all grace, and that basheth for nothing, being so long wonted and inured to evill doing; in such fort, as the heart and conscience is hardened and overgrowen with a certaine brawne and thicke skinne, which will not receive the marke or wale of any lash, be it never so smart. And as there be many fuch, so you shall meet with other youthes of another nature meere contrary unto them; who if 50 they happen but once to be checked and to heare ill, are foone gone, and will not turne againe, but quit the Philosophie schooles for ever. These being endued by nature with the good rudiments and beginnings of vertue tending unto felicity another day, to wit, Shamefaltneffe and Abathment, loofe the benefit thereof, in that by reason of their overmuch delicacy and esseminate minds, they can not abide reproofs, nor with generofitie endure correctious, but turne away their itching eares, to heare rather the pleasant and smooth tales of some flatterers or sophillers, which yeeld them no fruit nor profit at all in the end. For as hee, who after incision made, or the fear of difmembring performed by the Chyrurgian, runneth away from him, and will not tary to have his wound bound up or feared, fulfaineth all the paine of the cure, but miffeth the good that might enfue thereof: even fo he, who unto that fpeech of the Philosopher which hath wounded and launced his follie and untowardnesse, will not give leasure to heale the same up, and bring it to a persect & confirmed skin againe, goeth his waies with the painfull bit and dolorous sting, but wanteth all the helpe and benefit of Philosophie. For not onely the hurt that Telephus received, as Euripides saith,

By skales of rust boshease and remedie found, Fil'd from the speare, that first didmake the wound.

but also the pricke inflicted upon a towardly young man by Philosophie, is healed by the fame words that did the hurt. And therefore when hee findeth himselfe checked and blamed, 10 feele he must and suffer some smart, abide (I say) he ought to be bitten, but not to be crushed and confounded therewith, not to be discouraged and dismaide for ever. Thus he is to thinke of himselfe being now inducted in Philosophie, as if he were a novice newly instituted and profeffed in some religious orders and facred mysteries: namely, that after he hath patiently endured a while the first expiatoric purifications and troubles, he may hope at the end thereof to fee and finde some sweete and goodly fruit of consolation, after this present disquietnesse and agonie. Say also, that he were wrongfully and without cause thus shubbed and rebuked by the Philosopher, yet he shall do well to have patience and sit out the end. And after the speech finished, he may addresse an Apologie unto him and justific himselse, praying him to reserve this libertie of speech and vehemency of reproofe which he now used, for to represse and redresse 20 fome other fault, which he shall indeed have committed. Moreover, like as in Grammar, the learning to spel letters and to reade: in Musicke also to play upon the Lute or Harpe; yea and in bodily exercise, the seat of wrestling and other activities, at the beginning be painefull, cumberfome, and exceeding hard, but after that one be well entred and have made fome progresse therein, by little and little continuall use and custome (much after the manner of conversing and acquaintance among men) maketh maistrie, engendreth further knowledge, and then everie thing that was stronge and difficult before, prooveth familiar and casie ynough both to say and doe: Even so, it fareth in Philosophie, whereat the first there seemeth no doubt to be some strangenesse, obscuritie, and I wot not what barrennesse, aswell in the termes and words, as in the matters therein contained: Howbeit, for all that a yoong man must not for want of heart 30 be aftonied at the first entrance into it, nor yet for faintnesse be discouraged and give over: but make proofe and triall of every thing, perfevere and continue in diligence, defirous ever to paffe on still and proceed further, and as it were, to draw well before, waiting and attending the time which may make the knowledge thereof familiar by use and custome, the onely meanes which causeth everie thing that is of itselfe good and honest, to be also sweete and pleasant in the ende. And verily this familiaritie will come on apace, bringing with it a great cleerneffe and light of learning: it doth ingenerate also an ardent love and affection to vertue, without which love, a man were most wretched or timorous, if he should apply himselse to follow another course of life, having once given over for want of heart the studie of Philosophie. But peradventure it may fall out fo, that young men not well experienced, may find at the beginning fuch 40 difficulties in some matters that hardly or unneth at all they shall be able to comprehend them. Howbeit, they are themselves partly the cause that they doe incurre this obscuritie and ignorance: who being of divers and contrarie natures, yet fall into one and the felfefame inconvenience. For some upon a certaine respectuous reverence which they bare unto their Reader and Doctour, or because they would seeme to spare him, are afraid to aske questions, and to be confirmed and resolved in doubts arising from the doctrine which he delivereth: and so give signes by nodding their heads that they approove all, as if they understood everie thing verie well. Others againe by reason of a certaine importune ambition and vaine emulation of others, for to show the quicknesse and promptitude of their wit, and their readie capacitie, giving out that they fully understand that which they never conceived, by that meanes attaine to nothing. And 50 thus it commeth to passe, that those bashfull ones, who for modestie and shamefastnes are silent and dare not aske that whereof they are ignorant, after they be departed out of the auditorie, are in heavinesse and doubtfull perplexitie, untill at last they be driven of necessitie with greater shame to trouble those who have once already delivered their doctrine, to runne (I say) unto them backe againe and moove questions anew. And as for these ambitious, bold and presumptuous persons they be forced to palliat, cover and disguise their ignorance and blindnes which abideth with them for ever. Therefore casting behinde us and rejecting all such stupiditie and vanitie; let us take paines and endevour howfoever we do, to learne and throughly to comprehend, all profitable discourses that shall be taught unto us: and for to effect this, let us be content gently to be are the scoffes and derissons of others, that thinke themselves quicker of content gently to be are the scording to the example of Cleanther and Xenerates, who being somewhat more grosse and dull of capacitie than others their school-fellowes, ran not therefore away from schoole, nor were any whit discouraged, but the first that scoffed and made sport with themselves, saying, shey were like unto narrow mouthed vessels and brasen tables, for that they hardly conceived any thing that was taught them, but they retained and kept the same sate and surely when they had it once for not onely as Phospides saith, but also to suffer himselse to be mocked oftentimes and to endure much reproch, to abide broad jests and skurrile skoffes: expelling ignorance with all his might and maine; yea, and conquering the same.

Moreover, we must be carefull to avoide one fault more, which many commit on the contraite side; who for that they be somewhat slow of apprehension and idle withall, are verie troublesome unto their teachers, and importune them overmuch: when they be apart by themselves, they will not take any paines not labour to understand that which they have heard; but they put their masters to new travell, who reade unto them: asking and enquiring of them ever and anon concerning one and the same thing, resembling herein yoong callow birds which are not yet fethered and fledg'd, but alwaies gaping toward the bill of the damme, and so by their good wils would have nothing given them, but that which hash beene chewed and prepared already. Now there be others yet, who destrous beyond all reason to be counted quicke of wit and attentive hearers, wearietheir masters even as they are reading unto the, with much prittle prattle, interrupting them everies foot in their lectures, demanding of tiem one thing or other that is needlesse and impertinent, calling for proofs and demonstrations of things where no need is a Thus they much paines for little takes.

And of fort way long journeies make.

According as Sophocles faid, making much worke, not onely for themselves, but also for others a 30 For staying their teacher thus as they doe everie foote with their vaine and superfluous questions, as if they were walking together upon the way, they hinder the course of the lecture, being fo often interrupted and broken off. These fellowes then according to the faying of Hierom, in this doing are much like to cowardly & dastardly curre dogs, which, when they be at home within house, will bite the hides and skinnes of wilde beafts, and lie tugging at their shagged haire: but they dare not touch them abroad in the field. Furthermore, I would give those others, who are but foft spirited and flow withill, this counsell that retaining the principall points of everie matter, they supplie the rest apart by themselves, exercising their memorie, and as it were leading it by the hand to all that dependent thereto: to the end that when they have conceived in their spirit the words of others, as it were the elementarie beginning and the verie seede, they 40 might nourith and augment the fame: For that the minde and understanding of man is not of the nature of a vessell that requireth to be filled up: but it hath neede onely of some match (if I may to fay), to kindle and let it on fire (like as the matter standeth ever in need of the efficient cause) which may ingender in it a certaine inventive motion, and an affection to finde out the truth. Wellthen, like as if a man going to his neighbour for to fetch fire, and finding there goodsfore, and the same burning light in the chimney, should sit him downe by it and warme himselfe continually thereat, and never make care to take some of it home with him, you would take him to be unwife : even folle, that commeth to another for to learne, and thinketh not that he ought to kindle his owne fire within and make light in his owne minde, but taketh pleafure in hearing onely, and therefitteth by his mafter still, and joyeth onely in this contentment : he 50 may well get himselfe a kind of opinion by the words of another, like a fresh and red colour by fitting by the fire fide: but as for the mosse or rust of his minde within, he shall never skoure it out, nor disperse the darkenes by the light of Philosophic.

Now if there be neede yet of one precept more to archieve the dutie of a good auditour, it is this, That we ought to remember effloones that which now I have to fay: namely, That we exercise our wit and understanding by our felves, to invent something of our owne, as well as to comprehend that which we heate of others: to the end that we may acquire within our selves a certaine habitude, not sophisticall nor historicall, that is to say, apparant onely, and able to

OF MORALL VERTVE.

The Summarie.

Efore he entreshinto the discourse of vertues and vices, he treatest of Morall vertue in generall: propounding in the first place the diversitie of opinions of Philosophers as touching this point: the which he discuffesh and examineth: Wherein after that he had begun to dispute concerning the composition of the soule, he adjoineth his owne opinion touching that propertie, which Morall vertue hath particularly by it selfe, as also wherein it differeth from contemplative Philosophie. Then having 20 defined the Mediocritic of this vertue, and declared the difference betweene Continence and Temper ance, he speaketh of the impression of reason in the soulc. And by this meanes addresset himselfe against the Stoicks, of disputeth cocerning the affections of the soule prooving the inequalitie therein, with such a resutation of the contrarie objections, that after he had taught how the reasonlesse part of the foule, ought to be mannaged, he discoveresh by divers similarudes and reasons, the absurdities of the faid Stoicke Philosophers, who insteed of well governing and ruling the soule of man, have as much as liethin them extinguished and abolished the same.

OF MORALL VERTVE.

Y purpose is to treate of that vertue, which is both called and also reputed Morall, and namely wherein it differeth especially from vertue contemplative : as having for the subject matter thereof the paffions of the minde, and for the forme, Reafon : Likewise of what nature and substance it is; as also, how it doth subsist and hath the Being to wit, whether that part of the foule which is capable of the faid vertue be endued and adourned with reason as appropriate and peculiar unto it; or, whether it borrow it from other parts, & fo 40 receiving it, be like unto things mingled, and adhering to the better: or rather, for that being under the government and rule of another, it be faid to participate the power and puissance of that which commendeth it? For that vertue also may subsist and have an effentiall being, withour any subject matter and mixture at all, I suppose it is very evident and apparent. But first and formost, I hold it very expedient, briefly to run through the opinions of other Philosophers, not fo much by way of an Historical narration and so an end, as, that when they be once thewed and laid abroad, our opinion may both appeare more plainly, and also be held more furely.

Menedemus then, who was borne in the citie Eretria, abolifhed all pluralitie and difference of vertues, supposing that there was but one onely vertue, and the same knowed by sundry names: 50 For he faid, that it was but one and the fame thing, which men called Temperance, Fortitude, and Iustice: like as if one should say, A Reasonable creature and a man, he meaneth the felse fame thing. As for Ariston the Chian, he was of opinion likewife, that in fubstance there was no more but one vertue, the which he termed by the name of Health: mary, in fome divers respects, there were many vertues, and those different one from another: as namely for example, if a man should call our eie-fight, when it beholdeth white things Leucothea: when it feeth black Melanthie: and so likewise in other matters. For vertue, (quoth he) which concerneth and confidereth what we ought either to do or not to do, beareth the name of Prudence: when it ruleth and ordereth our luft or concupifcence, limiting out a certaine measure, and lawfull proportion of time unto pleasures, it is called Temperance: if it intermedle with the commerce, contracts and negotiation betweene man and man, then it is named Inflice: like as (to make it more plaine) a knife is the fame still, although it cut, now one thing, and then another: and the fire notwithstanding it worketh upon fundry matters, yet it remaineth alwaies of one and the fame nature. It feemeth alfo, that Zeno the Citiean, inclined in some fort to this opinion, who in defining Prudence, faith, that when it doth distribute to every man his owne, it ought to be called Iustice when it is occupied in objects either to be chosen or avoided, then it is Temperance; and in bearing or fuffring, it should be named Fortitude. Now, they that defend and mainteine this opinion of Zeno, affirme, that by Prudence he understandeth Science or Knowledge. But Chry/yppus, who was of this minde, that ech vertue had a peculiar qualitie, and according to it, ought to be defined and fet downe, wift not how (ere he was aware) he brought into Philosophie, and as Plate faith, raised a swarme of vertues never knowne before, and wherewith the schooles had not beene acquainted. For like as of Valiant he derived Valour, of Iust Inflice, of Clement Clemencie: fo also of Gracious, he comes in with Gratiositie, of Good, Goodnes, of Great, Greatneffe, of Honest, Honestie, and all other such like Dexterities, assabilities and courtefies, he termed by the name of vertues, and so pestered Philosophie with new, ftrange and abfurd words, more iwis than was needfull.

Now these Philosophers agree jointly all in this, that they set downevertue to be a certeine disposition and power of the principall part of the soule, acquired by reason: or rather, that it is reason it selfe: and this they suppose as a truth confessed, certaine, firme and irrefragable, They hold also, that the part of the foule, subject to passions, sensuall, brutish and unreasonable, different not from reason by any effentiall difference, or by nature: but they imagine, that the very part and fubstance of the soule which they call understanding, reason, and the principal part, being wholy turned and changed, as well in fodaine passions, as alterations by habitude and disposition, becommeth either vice or vertue, and in it folse hath no brutishnesse at all : but is named onely unreasonable, according as the motion of the appetite and lust is so powerfull, that it becommeth mistresse, and by that meanes she is driven and caried forcibly to some dis-30 honest and abfurd course, contrary to the judgement of reason: For they would have that very motion or passion it selfe to be reason, howbeit depraved and naught, as taking her force and strength from false and perverse judgement. Howbeit, all these (as it may seeme) were ignorant of this one point; namely, that ech one of us (to speake truly) is double and compound: And as for one of these duplicaties, they never throughly saw; that onely which is of the twaine more evident, to wit, the mixture or composition of the soule and body they acknowledge. And yet, that there is befides a certeine duplicitie in the foule it felfe, which confifteth of two divers and different natures: and namely, that the brutish and reasonles part, in maner of another bodie is combined and knit into reason by a certeine naturall linke of necessitie: It seemeth that Pythagoras himselfe was not ignorant: And this we may undoubtedly gather and conjecture by his 40 great diligence which he emploied in that Mulicke and Harmonie which he inferred for the dulcing, taining & appealing of the foule: as knowing ful wel, that all the parts thereof were not obedient and subject to instruction, learning and discipline, me yet such as might by reason be altered and trained from vice to vertue: but required some other kinde of perswasive power cooperative with it, for to frame the same and make it gentle and tractable: for otherwise it would be hardly or never conquered by Philosophie, and brought within the compasse of obedience; fo obstinate and rebellious it is. And Plato verily was of this opinion (which he profesfed openly, and held as a firme and vindoubted trueth) that the foule of this univerfall world, is not simple, uniforme, and uncompounded, but mixed (as it were) of a certaine power of *Identitie and of Diverfity. For after one fort, it is governed and turned about continually in an *1. The fame.

50 uniforme maner, by meanes of one and the fame order, which is powerfull and prædominant over all: and after another fort againe, it is divided into circles, sphoeres, and motions, wandering and contrary in maner to the other: whereupon dependeth the beginning of diversitie in generation of all things in the earth. Semblably (quoth he) the foule of man, being a part and portion of that univerfall foule of the world, composed likewise of proportions and numbers answerable to the other, is not simple and of one nature or affection, but one part thereof is more spirituall, intelligible and reasonable, which ought of right and according to nature have the foveraigntie and command in man: the other is brutish, sensuall, erronious, and disorderly of it selfe, requiring the direction and guidance of another. Now, this is subdivided againe into other two parts; whereof the one is alwaies called Corporall or Vegetative; the other Thy. mocides, as one would fay, Iracible and Concupifcible; which one while doeth adhere and flicke close to the foresaid groffe and corporall portion: and otherwhiles to the more pure and spirituall part, which is the Discourse of reason; unto which according as it doth frame and apply it felfe, it giveth strength and vigor thereto. Now the difference between the one and the other, may be known principally by the fight and relistance that often times is betweene understanding and reason on the one side, and the concupiscence and wrathfull part on the other; which theweth that these other faculties are often disobedient and repugnant to the best part, And verily, Aristotle used these principles and grounds especially above all others at the first, 10 as appeareth by his writings: but afterwards, he attributed the irafeible part unto the conceptfaible, confounding them both together in one, as if ire were a concupifcence or defire of revenge. Howbeit, this he alwaies held to the very end, That the brutish and sensual part, which is subject unto passions, was wholly and ever distinct from the intellectuall part, which is the fame that reason: not that it is fully deprined of reason, as is that corporall and groffe part of the foule, to wit, whereby we have fenfe onely common with beafts, and whereby we are nourithed as plants. But whereas, this being furd and deafe, and altogether uncapable of reason, doth after a fort proceed and fpring from the flesh, and alwaies cleave unto the bodie: the other senfuall partwhich is fo subject unto passions, although it be in it selfedestitute of reason, as a thing proper unto it: yetnevertheleffe apt and fit it is to heare and obey the understanding and dil- 20 courfing part of the minde; infomuch as it will turne vnto it, suffer it selfe to be ranged and ordered according to the rules and precepts thereof; unleffe it be utterly fpoiled and corrupted, either by blinde and foolish pleasure, or els by a loose and intemperate course of life. As for them that make a wonder at this, and do not conceive how that part being in some fort brutish and unreasonable, may yet be obedient unto reason, they seeme unto me as if they did not well comprehend the might and power of reason: namely, how great it is, and forcible, or how farre forth it may pearce and paffe in command, guidance and direction; nor by way of rough, churlith, violent, and irregular courses, but by faire and formall meanes, which are able to doe more by gentle inducements and perfuafions, than all the necessarie constraints and inforcements in the world. That this is so, it appeareth by the breath, spirits, sincwes, bones, and other parts of 30 the body, which be altogether void of reason: howbeit, so soone as there ariseth any motion of the will, which shaketh (as it were) thereines of reason never so little, all of them keepe their order, they agree together, and yeeld obedience. As for example, if the minde and will be dispofed to run, the feet are quickly stretched out and ready for a course; the hands likewise settle to their businesse, it there be a motion of the minde either to throw, or take holde of any thing. And verily, the Poet Homer most excellently expresses the fympathic and conformitie of this brutish part of the soule unto reason, in these verses;

Thus wept the chafte Penclope, and drench't her lovely face With dreary teares, which from her eyes rantrickling downe apace For tender heart, bewailing fore the losse of husband deere, Vlysses hight, who was in place let by her side full neere. And he himfelfe in foule, no leffe, didpitie for to fee His best beloved thus to weepe: but wife and craftie be Kept in his teares: for why? his eves within the lids were fet As stiffe as yron and sturdy horne, one drop would they not shed.

In such obedience to the judgement of reason he had his breath, spirits, his blood and his teares. An evident proofe hereof is to be seene in those, whose stell doth rise upon the first sight of saire and beautifull persons: for no sooner doth reason or law forbid to come neere and touch them, but presently the same salleth, lieth downe, and is quiet againe without any stirring or panting panting at all. A thing verie ordinarie and most commonly petceived in those, who be enamored upon faire women, not knowing at first who they were . For so soone as they perceive afterwards, that they be their owne fifters or daughters, their luft prefently cooleth, by meanes of reason that toucheth it and interposeth it selfe betweene: so that the bodie keepeth all the members thereof decently in order, and obedient to the judgement of the faid reason. Moreover, it falleth our oftentimes, that we cate with a good stomacke and great pleasure certaine meates and viands, before we know what they are: but after we understand and perceive once that wee have taken either that which was uncleane or unlawfull and forbidden : not onely in our judgement and understanding we finde trouble and offence thereby; but also our bodily faculties a-10 greeing to our opinion are difmaied thereat: fo that anon, there enfue vomits, ficke quawines, and overturnings of the stomake, which disquiet all the whole frame. And were it not, that I greatly feared to be thought of purpose, to gather and infert in my discourse such pleasant and youthfull inducements, I could inferre in this place Pfalteries, Lattes, Harpes, Pipes, Flutes, and other like muficall instruments, how they are devised by Art, for to accord and frame with humane paffions: for notwithstanding they be altogether without life, yet they cease not to apply themselves unto us, and the judgement of our minds, lamenting, singing, and wantonly disporting together with us, resembling both the turbulent passions, and also the milde affections and dispositions of those that play upon them. And yet verily it is reported also of Zeno himselfe, that he went one day to the Theatre for to heare the Musician Anabew, who sung unto the 20 Harpe: faying unto his scholers, Let us goe Sirs and learne what harmonic and musicke the entrailes of beafts, their finewes and bones: Let us fee (I fay) what resonance and inclodie bare wood may yeeld, being disposed by numbers, proportions and order. But leaving these examples, I would gladly demaund and aske of them, if when they fee dogs, horfes, and birds, which we nourish and keepe in our houses, brought to that passe by use, feeding and teaching, that they learne to render sensible words, to performe certaine motions, gestures, and divers seates, both pleafant and profitable unto us; and likewife, when they read in Homer, how Achilles encouraged to battell both horseand man; they doe marvell still and make doubt, whether that part and facultie in us, whereby we are angrie, do luft, joy or grieve, be of that nature that it can well obey reason, and be so affected and disposed thereby that it may give assent thereto: consi-30 dering especially, that it is not seated or lodged without, nor separated from us, ne yet framed by any thing which is not in us: no nor shapen by forcible meanes and constraint, to wit, by mold, stroke of hammer, or any fuch thing: but as it is fitted and forged by nature, so it keepeth to her, is conversant with her, and finally perfited and accomplished by custome and continuance. Which is the reason that verie properly Manners be called in Greeke by the name is to give us to understand, that they are nothing else (to speake plainely and after a groffe manner) but a certaine qualitie imprinted by long continuance of time, in that part of the foule which of it felfe is unreasonable: and is named 1906, for that the said reasonlesse part framed by reason, taketh this qualitie or difference (call it whether you will) by the meanes of long time and cuftom which they terme iffer. For reason is not willing to roote out quite all passions (which were nei-40 ther possible nor expedient) but onely it doth limit them within certaine bounds, and setteth downe a kinde of order: and thus after a fortcaufeth Morall vertues not to be impaffibilities, but rather mediocrities and regularities, or moderations of our affections: and this it doth by the meanes of prudence and wifedome, which reduceth the power of this fenfuall and patheticall part, unto a civill and honest habitude. For these things (they say) are in the soule of man, to wit, a naturall puiffance or facultie, a paffion or motion, and also an habitude. Now the faid facultie or power is the verie beginning, and (as a man would fay) the matter of paffions, to wit, the power or aptneffe to be angrie, to be ashamed, or to be confident and bold. The passion is the actuall mooving of the faid power: namely, anger it felfe, shame, confidence or boldnes. The habitude is a fettled and confirmed strength established in the sensual or unreasonable 50 part by continual use and custome: which if the passions be ill governed by reason, becommeth to be a vice: and contrariwife, a vertue; in case the same be well ordered and directed thereby. Moreover, forasmuch as Philosophers do not hold and affirme, that everie vertue is a mediocritie nor call it Morall: to the end therefore that we may the better declare and shew the difference, we had need to fetch the beginning of this discourse farther off.

Of all things then that be in the world, some have their effence and being of themselves abfolutely and simply: others respectively and in relation to us. Absolutely have their being the earth, the heaven, the stars, and the sea: Respectively and in regard of us, Good, evill, profitable, hurtfull, pleasant, and displeasant. Now it being so, that reason doth contemplate and behold, the one fort aswell as the other: the former ranke of those things which are simply and abfolutely so, pertaine unto science and speculation, as their proper objects: the second kinde of those things which are understood by reference and regard unto us, pertaine properly unto confultation and action. And as the vertue of the former fort is called Sapience: fo the vertue of the other is named Prudence. For a difference there is betweene Prudence and Sapience: in this, that Prudence confifteth in a certaine relation & application of the contemplative facultie of the foule unto Action, and unto the regiment of the fenfuall part according to reason: by which occasion, Prudence had need of the affistance of Fortune: whereas Sapience hath nothing to do with it, no more than it hath need of confultation, for to attaine and reach unto the 10 ende it aymethat. For that indeed it concerneth such things as be ever one and alwaies of the fame fort. And like as the Geometrician never confulteth as touching a triangle, to wit, whether it hath three angles equall to twaine that be right, or no? Because he knoweth affuredly that it hath (for all confultations are concerning things that varie and alter fometime after one fort, and otherwhiles after another, and never medleth with those that be firme, stable, and immutable) even fo, the understanding and contemplative facultie of the minde, exercising her functions in those first and principall things which be permanent, and have evermore the fame nature, not capable of chaunge and mutation, is sequestred and exempt altogether from confultation. But Prudence which descendeth to things full of varietie, error, trouble, and confusion, must of necessitie estsoones intermedle with casualties, and use deliberation in things 20 more doubtfull and uncertaine: yea and after it hath confulted to proceed unto action, calling and drawing unto it the reasonseise part also to be affishant and present, as drawen into the judgement of things to be executed. For need those actions have of a certaine instinct and motion to fet them forward, which this Morall habitude doth make in each passion, and the same in-Hinch requireth likewise the affistance of reason to limit it that it may be moderate, to the ende that it neither exceed the meane, nor come short and be defective: for that it cannot be chosen but this bruith and paffible part hath motions in it; fome overvehement, quicke and fudden, others as flow againe, and more flacke than is meet. Which is the reason that our actions cannot be good but after one manner: whereas, they may be evill after divers forts: like as a man cannot hit the marke but one way: marie he may miffe fundrie waies, either by overshooting 30 or comming thort. The part and dutie then, of that active facultie of reason according to nature, is to cut off and take away all those excessive or defective passions, and to reduce them unto a mediocritie. For whereas the faid inftinct or motion, either by infirmitie, effeminate delicacie, feare, or flothfulneffe, doth faile and come thort of dutie and the end required, there active reason is present ready to rouse, excite, and stirre up the same. Againe on the other side, when it runneth on end beyond all measure, after a diffolute and diforderly manner, there reason is prest, to abridge that which is too much, and to represse and stay the same: thus ruling and restraining these patheticall motions, it breedeth in man these Morall vertues whereof we speake, imprinting them in that reasonlesse part of the mind: and no other they are than a meane betweene excesse and defect. Neither must we thinke, That all vertues do consist in a 40 mediocritie: for Sapience or Wisedome, which stand in no need at all of the brutish and unreasonable part, and consist onely in the pure and sincere intelligence and discourse of underflanding, and not subject to all passions, is the verie height and excellencie of reason, perfect and absolute of itselfe: a full and accomplished power (I say) wherein is engendred that most divine, heavenly and happie knowledge. But Morall vertue which favoureth formewhat of the earth, by reason of the necessities of our bodie, and in which regard it standeth in neede of the inftrumentall ministerie of the patheticall part, for to worke and performe her operations, being in no wife the corruption or abolition of the fenfuall and unreasonable part of the soule, but rather the order, moderation and embelishment thereof, is the extremitie and height of excellence, in respect of the facultie and qualitie: but considering the quantitie is rather a medio- 50 critic, taking away the excesse on the one side and the defect on the other.

But now, forasmuch as this terme of Meane or Mediocritic may be understood diverse waies, we are to fet downe what kinde of meane this Morall vertue is. First and formost therefore whereas there is one meane compounded of two simple extremes, as a russet or brownecolour betweene white and blacke: also that which conteineth and is conteined, must need she the middest betweene the thing that doth conteine and is conteined, as for example, the number of 8. is just betweene 12. and 4. like as that, which taketh no part at all of either extreame, as namely those things which we call Adiaphora, Indifferent, and do partake neither good nor ill : In none of these fignifications or senses can this vertue be called a meane or mediocritie. For furely it may not be in any wife a composition or mixture of two vices which be both worfer neither doth it comprehend the leffe and defective : or is comprehended of that which is overmuch above decencie, and exceffive, ne yet is it altogether void of passions and perturbations, subject to excesse and defect, to more and lesse than is meet. But this morall vertue of ours, as it is in deed, fo also it is called a Meane, especially in respect of that mediocritic which is observed in the Harmonic and accord of founds. For like as in Musicke there is a note or found called the Meane, for that it is the middes betweene the treble and base, which 10 in Greeke be called Hypate and Nete, and lieth just betwixt the height and loudnesse of the one, and the lownesse or basenesse of the other: Even so, morall vertue being a motion and facultie about the unreasonable part of the soule, tempereth the remission and intention, and in one word taketh away the excesse and defect of the passions, reducing ech of them to a certeine Mediocritie and moderation that falleth not on any fide.

Now, to begin with Fortitude, they fay it is the meane between Cowardife & rash Audacitie, of which twaine the one is a defect, the other an excesse of the yrefull passion. Liberalitie, betweene Nigardife & Prodigalitie: Clemencie & Mildneffe, betweene senselesse Indolence and Crueltie: Iuftice, the meane of giving more or leffe than due, in contracts and affaires betweene men:like as Temperance, a mediocritie betweene the blockish stupiditie of the minde mooyed 20 with no touch of pleasure, & an unbrideled loosenes whereby it is abandoned to all sensualitie. Wherein especially & most cleerly is given us to understand & see the difference between the brutish & the reasonable part of the soule: & thereby evident it is that wandring passions be one thing, & reason another: for otherwise we should not discerne Continency from Temperance, nor Incontinencie from Intemperance, in pleasure and lusts, if that facultie of the mind whereby we judge, and that whereby we covet and defire were all one and the fame: but now, Temperance is when reason is able to manage, handle and governe the sensual and passionate part (as if it were a beaft brought up by hand and made tame and gentle, fo as it will be readie to obey it in all defires and lufts, yea and willing to receive the bit) whereas Continencie is when reason doth rule and command concupifence as being the stronger, and leadeth it, but not without go fome paines and trouble thereof, for that it is not willing to thew obedience, but striveth, flingeth out fidelong, & goeth croffed, infomuch as it hathenough to do for to mafter it with stripes of the cudgell, and with hard bits of the bridle to hold it in and restreine it, whiles it refifterhall that ever it may, and putterh reason to much agonic, trouble and travaile: which Plato doth lively represent unto us by a proper similitude, saying, that there be two draught beasts which draw the chariot of our foules, whereof the woorst doth both winse and strive against the otherwhiles glad to let him flacke and give him the head for feare, as symonides faith, Least that his purple reines full soone in the out of his hands should slip anone.

Thus your fee what the reason is, why they do not youch safe Continencie, the name of a prefeet verrue in itselfe butthinke it to be leffe than vertue. For there is not in it a certeine mediocritic arising from the Symphonic and accord of the worst with the better: neither is the excesse of passion cut away, ne yet doth the appetite yeeld it selfe obedient and agreeable to reason: but doth trouble and vexe, and is troubled and vexed reciprocally, being kept downe perforce and by constraint; like as in a seditions state, both parties at discord, intending mischiefe and warre one against another, dwell together within the precinct of one wall: insomuch as the foule of a continent person for the fight and variance betweene reason and appetite, may apply be compared as Sophocles faith unto a city, other fellow in the fame yoke, and also troubleth the cochman or charioter, who hath the conduct of them; putting him to his shifts that he is faint alwaies to pull in and hold his head hard,

Which at one time is full of incense sweete Resounding mirth with loud triumphant song, And yet the fame doth yeeld in every fireete All signes of griefe, with plaints and grones among.

And hereppon it is also that they hold Incotinencie to be lesse than Vice: mary, Intemperance shey will have to be a full & compleat vice indeed: For that in it as the affection is ill, so the reafon also is corrupt & deprayed: and as by the one it is incited & led to the appetite of filthinesse & dishonestie, so by the other through perverse judgement it is induced to give consent unto dishonest lusts, and withall groweth to be senselesse & hath no feeling at all of sinnes and faults which it comitteth: whereas Incontinencie reteineth still a right and found judgement by meanes of reason: Howbeit through the vehement and violent passion which is stronger than reason, it is caried away against the owne judgement. Moreover, in these respects, it differeth from Intemperance: For that the reason of the incontinent person is overmatched with pasfion : but of the other, it doth not fo much as enter combat therewith, He, albeit he contradict, gainsay, and strives a while, yet in the end yeeldeth unto lusts and followeth them; but the Intemperate man is led thereby, and at the first giveth consent, and approoveth thereof. Againe, the Intemperate person is well content, and taketh joy in having sinned: whereas the other is presently greeved thereat. Againe, he runneth willingly and of his owne accord to commit 10 finne and vilanie; but the incontinent man, maugre and full against his minde doth abandon honestie. And as there is this diffinct difference plainly scene in their deeds and actions, so there is no lesse to be observed in their words and speeches. For the fayings ordinarily of the Intemperate person be these and such like,

What mirth in life, what pleasure, what delight, Without content in Sports of Venus bright? Were those joies past, and I for them unmeet, Ring out my knell, bring foorth my winding sheet. Another faith,

To eat, to drinke, to wench, are principall All pleasures else, I Accessories call.

As if with all his hart and foule he were wholly given to a voluptuous life, yea and overwhelmed therewith. And no leffe than those, he also who hath these words in his mouth,

Now suffer me to perish by and by

It pleaseth nay is booteth me to dy. speaketh as one whose appetite and judgement both were out of order and diseased. But the speeches of Incontinent persons be in another key and farre different: For one faith,

My mind is good and thit her doth fway,

My nature bad, and puts it away. Another, have fent tomen on earth this miferie Alas, alas, To fee, how Gods above To know their Good, and that which they should love yet wanting grace, to do the contrarie!

Now plucks, now hales, of deadly yee a fire: but furely, hold my reason can no more: Than anchor slanke stay (hip from being split, when grounded tu on Janas neere to the shore. He nameth unproperly and without good gracethe flanck of an anchor refting lightly upon 40 the loofe fand, to fignific the feeble hold that reason hath which is not resolute and firmely feated but through the weakneffe and delicacie of the foule, rejecteth and forfaketh judgement: And not much unlike heereunto, is this comparison also that another maketh in a contrarie Much like a flip which fastened is to land

With cordage strong whereof we may be bold, vrintor ange prong, were coj we may ve ovom The windes do blow, and yet she dot h with stand And checke them all, her cables take such hold: And checke them all, her cables take fuch hold:

He termeth the judgement of reason, when it resistest a dishonest act; by the name of Cable and Cordage; which notwithstanding afterwards may be broken by the violence of some 50 passion (as it were) with the continual gales of ablustring winde. For to say a very trueth, the intemperate person is by his lusts and desires caried with full saile to his pleasures, hee giveth himselfe thereto, and thither directeth his whole course: but the incontinent person tendeth thither also: howbeit (as a man would say) crookedly and not directly, as one desirous and endevouting to withdraw himselfe, and to repell the passion that draweth and moveth him to it, yet in the end he alfo flideth and falleth into some foule and dishonest act : Like as Timon by way of biting, scoffe, traduced and reproved Anaxarchus in this wife, Here

Here shew's it felfe the dogged force of Anaxarchus fell, So flubburne and fo perminent, when once he tooke apitch; And yet as wife as he would feeme, a wretch (I bear I folke tell) He judged was : for that to vice and pleasures overmich By nature prone he was : a thing that Sages most do skun; Which brought him backe out of the way and made him dote anon.

For neither is a wife Sage properly called continent, but temperate: nor a foole incontinent, but intemperate: because the one taketh pleasure and delight in good and honest things; and the other is not offended nor displeased with soule and dishonest actions. And therefore into continencie refembleth properly a minde (as I may to fay) Sophisticall, which hath some use of reason; but the same so weake, that it is not able to personer and continue sirme in that which it hath once knowen and judged to be right. Thus you may fee the differences betweene Intemperance and Incontinence: As for Continencie & Temperance, they differ also in certeine respects correspondent in some proportion unto those on the contrary side. For remorfe, forrow, displeasure and indignation, doe not as yet abandon and quit continence: whereas in the minde of a temperate person, all lieth plaine and even on every side; nothing there but quietnesse and integritie; in such fort, as who soever seeth the great obeisance and the marvellous tranquillitie whereby the reasonlesse part is united & incorporate together with the reasonable, might well fay,

And then anon the winds were downe, a calme ensued straightway: No waves were seene, some power divine

en Carrell State of the namely, when reason had once extinguished the excessive, furious, and raging motions of the lusts and defires. And yet these affections and passions which of necessity nature bath need of, the same hath reason made so agreeable, so obeisant, so friendly and cooperative, yea, and ready to fecond all good intentions and purpofes ready to be executed; that they neither run before it, nor come dragging behinde; ne yet behave themselves disorderly, no, nor shew the least disdisobedience: so as ech appetite is ruled by reason, and willingly accompanieth it,

Like as the sucking foale doth go And run with dam, both to and fro.

The which confirmeth the faying of Xenocrates, touching those who earnestly studie Philosophie, and practife it: For they onely (quoth he) doe that willingly, which others doe perforce and for dread of the law: who for beare indeed to fatisfie their pleafures, and turne backe, as if they were scared from them for feare of being bitten of some curst maltive or threwd cat, regarding nothing els but danger that may enfue thereupon. Now, that there is in the foule a fense and perceivance of that strength, firmity, and resolution to encounter finfull lusts and defires, as if it had a power to strive and make head againe, it is very plaine and evident: howbeit, some there be, who holde and maintaine, That Paffion is nothing different from Reason: neither (by 40 their faying) is there in the mind a diffention or fedition (as it were) of two divers faculties: but al the trouble that we feele, is no more but an alteration or change of one & the felfe fame thing to wit, reason both waies; which we our selves are not able to perceive, for that for sooth it changeth fuddenly and with fuch celeritie: never confidereth all the while, that the fame faculty of the minde is framed by nature to concupifcence and repentance both: to be angric and to feare : enclined to commit some soule and dishonest fact, by the allurement of pleasure, and contrariwise restrained from the same for feare of paine. As for lust, feare, and all such like passions, they are no other (fay they) but perverse opinions and corrupt judgements not arising and engendred in any one part of the fouleby it felfe, but foread over that which is the chiefe and principall, to wit, reason and understanding whereof they be the inclinations, assensions, mo-50 tions, and in one word, certaine operations, which in the turning of an hand be apt to change and paffe from one to another : much fike into the fudden braids, starts and runnings to and fro of little children, which how violent foever they be and vehement, yet by reason of their weaknesse are but slippery, unstedfast and unconstant.

But these affertions and oppositions of theirs, are checked and refuted by apparant evidence and common lenfe: For what man is he that ever felt in himfelfe a change of his luft and concupifcence into judgement: and contrariwife an alteration of his judgement into luft: neither doth the wanton lover cease to love when he doth reason with himselfe and conclude, That such love is to be repressed, and that he ought to strive and fight against it: neither doth he then give over reasoning and judging, when being overcome through weaknesse, he yeeldeth himselse prisoner and thrall to lust: but like as when by advertisement of reason he doth relist in some fort a passion arising, yet the same doth till tempthim: so likewise when he is conquered and overcome therewith, by the light of the same reason at that verie instant, he seeth and knoweth that he finneth and doth amisse: so, that neither by those perturbations is reason lost and abolifield; nor yet by reason is he freed and delivered from them; but whiles he is toffed thus to and fro, he remaineth a neuter in the mids, or rather participating in common of them both. As for those who are of opinion, that one while the principall part of our foule is lust and concupiscence: and then anon that it doth resist & stand against the same: are much like unto them, 10 who imagine & fay, that the hunter & the wild beaft be not twaine, but one bodie, chaunging it felfe, one while into the forme of an hunter, and another time, taking the shape of a favage beast: For both they in a manifest and apparant matter should seeme to be blind and see nothing : and also these beare witnesse and depose against their ownesense, considering that they finde and feele in themselves really not a mutation or chaunge of one onely thing, but a sensible strife and fight of two things together within them. But heere they come upon us againe and object in this wife. How commeth it to passe then (say they) that the power and facultie in man which doth deliberate and consult is not likewise double (being oftentimes distracted, carried, and drawen to contrarie opinions, as it is, namely, touching that which is profitable and expedient) but is one still and the same? True, we must confesse, that divided it seemeth to be: But this com- 20 parison doth not hold, neither is the event and effect alike: for that part of our soule wherein prudence and reason is seated, fighteth not with it selfe, but using the helpe of one and the same facultie, it handleth diversarguments, or rather being but one power of discoursing it is emploied in fundry subjects and matters different: which is the reason that there is no dolor and griefe at one end of those reasonings and discourses which are without passion; neither are they that confult forced (as it were) to hold one of those contrarie parts against their minde and judgement; unlesse peradventure it so fall out, that some affection lie close to one part or other, as if a man should fecretly and under hand lay somewhat besides in one of the balances or skales, against reason for to weigh it downe. A thing (I affire you) that many times falleth out: and then it is not reason that is possed against reason; but either ambition, emulation, favour, jea- 20 lousie, feare, or some secret passion, making semblance as if in shew of speeches, two reasons were at varience and differed one from another. As may appeare by these verses in Homer:

They thought it shame the combate to reject, and yet for feare they durst not it accept.

Likewise in another Poët:

To suffer death is dolorous though with renownest meete: Death to avoide is cowardise: but yet our life is sweete.

And verily in determining of controversies betweene man and man in their contracts and suits of law, these passions comming betweene, are they, that make the longest delaies, & be the greatest enimies of expedition and dispatch : like as in the counsels of kings and princes, they that speake in favour of one partie and for to win grace, doe not upon any reason of two sentences encline to the one, but they accomodate themselves to their affectio, even against the regard of utility & profit. And this is the cause that in those States which be called Aristocraties, that is to fay, governed by a Senate or Counsel of the greatest men: the Magistrates who six in judgemet, will not fuffer Oratours & Advocates at the Barre to moove affections in all their Pleas: for in Truth, let not the discourse of reason be impeached and hindered by some passion, it will of it felfetend directly to that which is good and just. But in case there do arise a passion betweene, 50 to croffe the fame, then you shal see pleasure and displeasure to raise a combat and dissension, to encounter that which by confultation would have been judged and determined. For otherwife, how commeth it to passe that in Philosophicall discourses and disputations, a man shall never see it otherwise, but that without any dolor and griefe, some are turned and drawen oftentimes by others into their opinions, and subscribe thereto willingly? Nay even Aristotle himselse, Democrisus also and Chrysippus have beene knowen to retract and recant some points, which before time they held, and that without any trouble of mind, without griefe and remorfe, but rather with pleasure and contentment of heart : because in that speculative or contemplative part of the foule, which is given to knowledge and learning onely, there raigne no paffions to make refiltance, infomuch as the brutish partbeing quiet and at repose, loveth not curioully to entermedle in these and such like matters : By which meanes it hapneth, that the reafon hath no fooner a fight of trueth, but willingly it enclineth thereto, and doth reject untruth and fallitie: for that there lieth in it and in no other partelle, that power and facultie to believe and give affent one way, as also to be perswaded for to alter opinion and goe another way. Whereas contrariwife, the counfels and deliberations of worldly affaires, judgements also, and arbitriments, being for the most partfull of passions, make the way somewhat difficult for reato fon to passe, and put her to much trouble. For in these cases, the sensual and unreasonable part of the foule is ready to flay and flop her course; yea and to fright her from going forward, meeting her either with the object of pleafure; or elfe cafting in her way flumbling blocks of feare, of paine, of lifts and defires. And verily the deciding and judgement of this diffutation lieth in the fenfe, which feeleth aswell the one as the other, and is touched with them both: For fay that the one doth furmount and hath the victorie, it doth not therefore defeit utterly and deftroy the other; but drawen it is thereto perforce, and making refultance the while. As for example, the wanton and amorous person when he checketh and reprooveth himselfe therefore, useth the discourse of reason against the said passion of his; yet so, as having them both, actually subfifting together in the foule: much like as if with his hand he repressed and kept downe the one 20 part, enflamed with an hot fit of paffion, and yet feeling within himfelfe both parts, and those actually in combat one against the other. Contrariwise, in those consultations, disputes, and inquisitions which are not passionate, and wherein these motions of the brutish part have nothing to do, such I meane as those be especially of the contemplative part of the soule: if they be equall and to continue, there enfueth no determinat judgement and refolution: but a doubt remaineth, as if it were a certaine paule or flay of the understanding, not able to proceed farther, but abiding in suspense betweene two contrarie opinions. Now if it chance to encline unto one of them, it is because the mightier hath overweighed the other & annulled it, yet so, as it is not displeased or discontent, no nor contesteth obstinately afterwards against the received opinion. To be short, & to conclude all in one generall word; where it seemeth that one discourse 30 and reason is contrarie unto another; it argueth not by and by a conceit of two divers subjects. but one alone in fundrie apprehensions and imaginations. Howbeit, whensoever the brutish and fenfuall part is in a conflict with reason, and the same such that it can neither vanquish, nor be vanquished without some sense of grievance; then incontinently this battell divideth the foule in twaine, fo as the warre is evident and fenfible. And not onely by this fight a man may know how the fource and beginning of these passions differeth from that sountaine of reason: but no leffe also by the consequence that followeth thereupon. For seeing that possible it is for a man to love one childe that is ingenuous and towardly disposed to vertue: as also affect another as well, who is ill given and diffolute: confidering also that one may use anger unjustly against his owne children or parents: and another contratiwise justly in the desence of children 40 or parents against enemies and tyrants. Like as in the one there is perceived a manifest combat and refistance of passion against reason; so in the other, there may be seene as evident a yeelding and obeifance thereof, fuffering it felfe to be directed thereby, yea and willingly running and offering her affiltance and helping hand. To illustrate this by a familiar example, it hapneth otherwhiles, that an honest man espouseth a wife according to the lawes, with this intention onely to cheriffi and keepe her tenderly, yea and to companie with her duly, and according to the lawes of chaftitie and honestie: howbeit afterwards in tract of time, and by long continuance and conversing together, which hath bred in his heart the affection of love, he perceiveth by discourse of reason, and findeth in himselfe that he loveth her more decrely and entirely, than he purposed at the first. Semblably, yoong scholars having met with gentle and 50 kinde masters, at the beginning, follow and affect them in a kinde of zeale, for the benefit onely that they reape by them. Howbeit afterwards in processe of time, they fall to love them; and so in stead of familiar and daily disciples, they become their lovers, and are so called. The same is usually to be seene in the behaviour and carriage of men toward good magistrates in cities, neighbours also, kinsfolke and allies: For they begin acquaintance one with another, after a civill fort onely, by way of dutie or necessitie and use: but afterwards by little and little cre they beaware, they grow into an affectionate love of them, namely, when reason doth concurre, perfivading & drawing unto it that part of the mind which is the feat of passions and affections. As for that Poet who loever he was, that first wrate this sentence,

Two forts there be of bashfulnes, the one we cannot blame, The other troubleth many an hower, and doth decay the same.

Doth he not plainely shew that he hath found in himselfe by experience oftentimes, that even this affection by meanes of lingting delay, and putting off from time to time, hath put him by the benefit of good opportunities, and hindred the execution of many brave affaires? Vitto these proofes and allegations precedent, the Stoikes being forced to yeeld, in regard they be so to cleere and evident: yet forto make some way of evasion and escape, they call shame, bashfulneffe; pleasure, joy; and seare, warinesse or circumspection. And I assure you, no man could justly finde fault with these disguisements of odious things with honest termes: if so be they would attribute unto these passions the said names when they be raunged under the rule of reafon, and give them their owne hatefull termes indeed, when they strive with reason and violently make refistance. But when convinced by the teares which they shed, by trembling and quaking of their joints, yea by chaunge of colour going and comming; in flead of naming Dolour and Feare directly, come in with (I wot not what) pretied eviled termes of Morfures, Contractions or Conturbations: also when they would cloke and extenuate the imperfection of other paffions, by calling luft a promptitude or forwardnes to a thing: it feemeth, that by a flourish of $_{20}$ fine words, they devise shifts, evasions, and justifications, not philosophicall but sophisticall, And yet verily they themselves againe do terme those joies, those promptitudes of the will, and warie circumspections by the name of Empathies, i. good affections and not of Apathies, that is to fay, Impassibilities: wherein they use the words aright and as they ought. For then is it truly called Eupathie, i. a good affection, when reason doth not utterly abolish the passion, but guideth and ordereth the same well in such as be discreet and temperate. But what befalleth unto vicious and diffolute persons? Surely, when they have set downe in their judgement and resolution, to love father and mother as tenderly as one lover may another, yet they are not able to performe fo much. Mary fay, that they determine to affect a courtifan or a flatterer, presently they can finde in their hearts to love such most decrely. Moreover, if it were so, that passion and judge- 30 ment were both one, it could not otherwise be, so some as one had determined that he ought to love or hate, but that prefently love or hate would follow thereupon, But now it falleth our clean contrarie; for that the passion as it accordeth well with some judgements and obeieth; so it repugneth with others, and is obstinate and disobedient: whereupon it is, that themselves enforced thereto by the truth of the thing, do affirme and pronounce that every judgement is not a passion, but that onely, which stirreth up and mooveth a strong and vehement appetite to a thing; confessing thereby, no doubt, that one thing it is in us which judgeth, and another thing that Inffereth, that is to fay, which receiveth passions: like as that which moveth, and that which is mooved be divers. Certes, even Chrysippus himselfe, defining in many places what is Patience and what is Continency, doth avouch, That they be habitudes, apt and fit to obey and fol- 40 low the choise of reason: whereby he sheweth evidently that by the force of truth, he was driven to confesse and avow, That there is one thing in us which doth obey and yeeld, and another which being obeied, is yeelded unto, and not obeied, is refifted.

Furthermore, as touching the Stoicks, who hold, That all finnes and faults be equall, neither will this place, nor the time now ferve to argue againft them, whether in other points they swerve from the trueth: howbeit, thus much by the way I dare be bolde to say, That in most things they will be found to repugner easion, even against apparent and manifest evidence. For according to their opinion, every passion or perturbation is a fault, and whosever grieve, feare or lust, do sinne: but in those passions great difference, there is seene, according to more or lefte: for who would ever be so grosse, as to say, that Dolons seare was equal to the searce of Ajax? who as Ho- so mer writeth.

As he went out of field did turne and looke behinde full oft: With knee before knee decently, and lo retired loft.

or compare the forrow of King Alexander, who would needs have killed himselfe for the death of Clysm, to that of Plato for the death of Socrates? For dolours and griefs encrease exceedingly when they grow upon occasion of that which hapneth besides all reason; like as any accident, which falleth out beyond our expectation, is more grievous, and breedeth greater anguith than that whereof areason may be rendered, and which a man might suspect to follow. As for example, if he who ever expected to fee his fonne advanced to honour, and living in great reputation among men, should heare say that he were in prison, and put to all maner of torture, as Parmeno was advertised of his sonne Philotas. And who will eversay, that the anger of Nicocreon against Anaxarchus, was to be compared with that of Magas against Philemon, which arose upon the same occasion, for that they both were spightfully reviled by them in reprochful termes, 10 for Nicoreon cauled Anaxarchine to be braid in a morter with yron peffles : whereas Magas commanded the Executioner to lay a sharpe naked sword upon the necke of Philemon, and so to let him go without doing him any more harme. And therefore it is, that Plate named anger the finewes of the foule, giving us thereby to understand, that they might be stretched by bitterneffe, and let flacke by mildneffe. But the Stoicks, for to avoid and put backe thefe objections and fuch like, denie that these stretchings and vehement fits of passions be according to judgement, for that it may faile and erre many waies: faying, they be certaine pricks or ftings, contractions, diffusions or dilatations, which in proportion and according to reason, may be greater or lesse. Certes, what variety there is in judgement, it is plaine and evident. For some there be that deeme povertie not to be ill: others holde, that it is very ill: and there are againe, who 20 account it the worlt thing in the world; infomuch as to avoid it, they could be content to throw themselves headlong from high rocks into the sea. Also you thall have those, who reckon death to be evill, in that onely it deprive thus of the fruition of many good things: others there be, who thinke and fay as much, but it is in regard of the eternall torments & horrible punishments that be under the ground in hell. As for bodily health, some love it no otherwise than a thing agreeable to nature and profitable withall: others take it to be the foveraigne good in the world, as without which they make no reckoning of riches, of children, Ne yet of crowne and regall dignitic, Which men do match even with divinitie.

Nay, they let not in the end to thinke and fay, That vertue it felfe ferveth in no flead, and avai-30 leth nought, unleffe it be accompanied with good health: whereby it appeareth, that as touching judgement some etre more, some lesse. But my meaning is not now to dispute against this evalion of theirs. Thus much onely I purpole to take for mine advantage out of their owne confession, in that themselves do grant, That the brutish and sensual part, according to which, they fay that passions be greater and more violent, is different from judgement: and howsoever they may feeme to contest and cavill about words and names, they grant the substance and the thing it selse in question, joining with those who mainteine that the reasonlesse part of the soule which enterteineth passions, is altogether different from that which is able to discourse, reason and judge. And verily Chryspe in thosebooks which he entituled, Of Anomologie, after he had written and taught, that angenis blinde, and many times will not permit a man to fee those 40 things which be plaine and apparent, and as often cafteth a darke mift over that which he hath already perfectly learned and knowen; proceedeth forward a little further: For (quoth he) the passions which arise, drive out and chase forth all discourse of reason, and such things as were judged and determined otherwife against them, urging it still by force unto contrary actions. Then he wieth the tellimonic of Menander the Poet, who in one place writeth thus, by way of exclamation:

Wo worth the sime, wretch that I am, how was my minde destraught
In body mine? where were my with?
Some folly (sure) mie eaught,
What sime I sell to this. For why?
Thereof I made no choise.
Fare better things they were, iwis, which had my former voice.

The same Chrysppus also going on still: It being so (quoth he) that are alonable creature is by nature borne and given to use reason in all things, and to be governed thereby: yet notwithstanding we reject and cast it behinde us, being over-ruled by another more violent motion that carieth us away. In which words, what doth he else but confessee went that which happen upon upon the diffention betweene affection and reason? For it were a meere ridiculous mockerie in deed, as Plato faith, to affirme that a man were better & worfe than himfelfe : or that he were able now to mafter himselfe, & anon ready to be mastered by himselfe, and how were it possible that the fame man should be better & worse than himselfe, and at once both master and servant, unleffe every one were naturally in some fort double, and had in him somewhat better and somewhat worfe? And verily by that meanes, he that hath the worfe part, obedient to the better. hath powre over himselfe, yea, and is better than himselfe: whereas he that suffreth the brutish and unreasonable part of his soule to command and go before, so as the better and more noble part doth follow, and is serviceable unto it, he no doubt is worse than himselfe: he is (I say) incontinent or rather impotent, and hath no power over himselfe, but disposed contrary to na- 10 ture. For according to the course and ordinance of nature, meet and fit it is that reason being divine and heavenly, should command and rule that which is fenfuall and voide of reason: which as it doth arife and fpring out of the very bodie, fo it refembleth it, as participating the properties and passions thereof, yea and naturally is full of them, as being deepely concorporate and throughly mixed therewith: As it may appeare by all the motions which it hath, tending to no other things but those that be materiall and corporall, as receiving their augmentations and diminutions from thence, (or to fay more properly) being stretched out and let flacke more or leffe, according to the mutations of the body. Which is the cause that young perfons are quicke, prompt, and audacious rath: alfo, for that they be full of bloud, and the fame hot, their lufts and appetites, are likewife firy, violent and furious: whereas contrariwife in old 20 folke because the source of concupiscence seated about the liver is after a fort quenched wwea and become weake and feeble: reason is more vigorous and predominant in them; as much as the sensuall and passionate part, doth languish and decay together with the body. And verily this is that which doth frame and dispose the nature of wilde beasts to divers passions: For it is not long of any opinions good or bad which arise in them, that some of them are strong, venterous and fearelesse, yea and ready to withstand any perils presented before them: others againe be fo furprised with feare and fright, that they dare not stirre or do any thing: but the force and power which lieth in the bloud, in the spirits and in the whole bodie, is that which causeth this diversitie of passions, by reason that the passible part growing out of the sless as from a roote, docth bud foorth and bring with it a qualitie and proneneffe femblable. But 30 in man that there is a sympathic and fellow mooving of the body, together with the motions of the paffions, may be prooved by the pale colour, the red flushing of the face; the trembling of the joints, and panting and leaping of the heart in feare and anger: And againe on the contrary fide by the dilations of the atteries, heart and colour, in hope and expectation of fome pleafures. But when as the divine spirit and understanding of man docth moove of it selfe alone without any passion, then the body is at repose and remaineth quiet, not communicating nor participating any whit with the operation of the minde and intendement, no more than it being disposed to studie upon any Mathematicall proposition or other science speculative, it calleth for the helpe and affiltance of the unreaf mable part: By which it is manifest, that there betwo diffinct parts in us, different in facultie and power one from another. In fumme, Go 40 through the univerfall world, althings (as they themselves affirme, and evident experience doth convince) are governed and ordred, fome by a certeine habitude : others by nature: fome by fenfuall and unreasonable soule: others by that which hath reason and understanding. Of all which man hath his part at once, yea, and was borne naturally with these differences above faid. For, conteined he is by an habitude: nourifhed by nature: reason & understanding he useth: he hath his portion likewife of that which is unreasonable and inbred; there is together with him the fource and primitive cause of passions, as a thing necessarie for him, neither doth it enter into him from without in which regard it ought not to be extirped utterly; but hath neede onely of ordering and government: whereupon Reason dealeth not after the Thracian maner, nor like king Lycurgus, who commanded all vines without exception to be cut downe, because 50 wine caused drunkennes: it rooteth not out (I say) all affections indifferently one with another, the profitable as well as the hurtfull: but (like unto the good gods Phytalmina and Hemorides, who teach us to order plants that they may fructifie, and to make them gentle which were favage) to cut away that which groweth wilde and ranke, to fave all the rest and so to order and manage the fame, that it may ferve for good use. For neither do they shed and spill their wine upon the floure, who are afraid to be drunke, but delay the fame with water: nor those who feare the violence of a passion, do take it quite away, but rather temper and qualifie the same:

like as folke use to breake horses and oxen from their slinging out with their heeles, their sliffeness & curstness of the head & stubburnes in receiving the bridle or the yoke, but do not restreine them of other motions in going about their worke and doing their deed. And even so verily, reason maketh good use of these passions, when they be well tamed and brought (as it were) to hand: without over weakning or rooting out cleane, that part of the soule which is made for to second reason, and do it good service: For as Pindar us saith,

The horfe doth ferve in chariot at the thill, The oxe at plough doth labour hardin field, Who list in chafe the wild Bore for to kill, The hardy hound he must provide with skill.

And I affure you, the entertainment of these passions and their breed, serve in farre better slead, when they doe affift reason and give an edge (as it were) and vigour unto vertues, than the beafts above named in their kind. Thus moderate ite doth second valour and fortitude: hatred of wicked persons helpeth the execution of Iustice: and indignation is just and due unto those, who without any merit or desert enjoie the felicitie of this life: who also for that their heart is puffed up with foolith arrogancie, and enflamed with difdainfull pride and infolence in regard of their prosperitie, have need to be taken downe and cooled. Neither is a man able by any meanes (would be never fo faine) to separate from true friendship, naturall indulgence, and kind affection: nor from humanitie, commiferation and pitie; ne yet from perfect benevo-20 lence and good will, the fellowthip in joy and forrow. Nowif it be true (as it is indeed) that they do groffely erre, who would abolifh all love, because of foolish and wanton love: surely they do amifle, who for coverousnes sake and greedines of money, do blame and condemne quire all other appetites and defires. They do (Ifay) afmuch as those, who would forbid running altogether, because a man may stumble and catch a fall as he runneth; or debarre shooting for that we may overshoot and misse the marke: or to condemne hearing of musicke, because a discord or jarre is offensive to the eare. For like as in founds, musicke maketh an accord and harmonie, not by taking away the loud and base notes: And in our bodies Physicke procureth health, not by destroying heat and cold, but by a certaine temperature and mixture of them both in good proportion: Even fo it fareth in the foule of man, wherein reason hath the pre-30 dominance and victoric: namely, when by the power thereof, the paffions, perturbations and motions are reduced into a kind of moderation and mediocritic. For no doubt exceffive forrow and heavines, immeasurable joy and gladnesse in the soule, may be aptly compared to a swelling and inflammation in the body, but neither joy nor forrow simply in it selfe. And therefore Homer in this wife fentence of his

Aman of woorth doth never colour change,

Exce sive feare in him is verie strange, doth not abolish feare altogether, but the extremitie thereof; to the end, that a man should not thinke that either valour is desperate follie, or confidence audacious temericie. And therefore in pleafures and delights, we ought likewife to cut off immoderate luft: as also in taking punish-40 ment, extreme hatred of malefactours. He that can do fo, shall be reputed in the one not indolent, but temperate, and in the other not bitter and cruell, but just and righteous. Whereas let paffions be tid cleane away (if that were possible to be done) our reason will be found in many things more dull and idle: like as the pilot and mafter of a ship hath little to do, if the winde be laid and no gale at all stirring. And verily (as it should feeme) wife Law-makers, feeing this well enough, have with great policie given occasion in cities and common-wealths of Ambition and Emulation among citizens one with another: and in the field against enemies devised to excite the courage of fouldiours, and to whet their ire and manhood by found of trumpets, fifes, drums, and other instruments. For not onely in Poetrie (as Plato faith verie well) he that is infpired and (as it were) ravished with the divine instinct of the Muses, wil make a rediculous soole 5000 him, who otherwise is an excellent Poet, and his crafts-master as having learned the exquisite knowledge of the art: but also in battels, the heat of courage let on fire with a certaine divine inspiration is invincible and cannot be withstood. This is that martiall furie, which (as Homer faith) the gods do infuse or inspire rather into warlike men:

The Princes hear with might andire.

And againe,

One godor other surely deth him a sist

Else faring thus, he never could persist.

As if to the discourse of reason they had adjoined passion as a pricke to incite, and a chariot to fet it forward. Certes, even these verie Stoicks with whom now we argue, and who seeme to reject all passions, we may see oftentimes, how they stirre up yoong men with praises, and as often rebuke them with sharpe admonitions and severe reprehensions. Whereof there must needs enfue of the one part pleafure, and of the other part displeasure. For surely checkes and faultfindings, strike a certaine repentance and shame: of which two, the former is comprised under forrow, and the latter under feare: and these be the meanes that they use principally to chastice and correct withall. Which was the reason that Diogenes upon a time, when he heard Plato so highly praifed and extolled. And what great and woorthy matter (quoth he) finde you in that 10 man, who having been a Philosopher so long & taught the precepts thereof, hath not in all this time greeved and wounded the heart of any one person? For surely the Mathematicall sciences a man cannot fo properly call the eares or handles of Philosophie (to use the words of Xenoerates) as he may affirme that these affections of yoong men, to wit, bashfulnesse, desire, repentance, pleasure and paine are their handles, whereof reason and law together taking hold by a discreet aprand holesome touch, bring a yoong man speedily and effectually into the right way. And therefore the Lacedæmonian schoolemaster and governour of children said verie well, when he professed, that he would bring to passe that the child whom he tooke into his tuition, should joy in honest things, and grieve in those that were foule and dishonest. Then which there cannot possibly be named a more woorthy or commendable end of the liberall education 20 and bringing up of a yoong youth well descended.

OF VERTVE AND VICE.

The Summarie.

N this little weatife adjoyned aptly unto the former, the Author prooveth, that outward and corruptible things be not they that (et the soule inrepose, but reason well railed and governed: And after that he hath depainted the miserable estate of wicked and similarly persons stroubled and tormented with their passions both night and day, he prooveth by proper and apt similatudes, that Philosophic together with the love of versue, bring eth true conteniment and happinesse indeed unto a man.

OF VERTVE AND VICE.

The feemeth, and commonly it is thought, that they be the garments which do heat a man; and yet of themselves they neither doc heat nor bring any heat with them: for take any of them apart by it selfes, you shall finde it colde; which is the reason that men being verie, hote, and in a fit of a fever, love often to change their clothes, for to coole and refresh their bodies. But the trueth is this, Looks you what heat a man doth yeeld from himselfe, the clothese or garments! that cover the body do keepe in the same, and unite close together in and being thus included and held int, suffer it not to evaporate, breathe out, and vanish away. The same errour in the sate of this life, hath deceived many man, who imagine that if they may dwell in stately and gorgeous great houses, be attended upon with a number of servants, retaine a fort of slaves, and can gather together huge summes of golde and silver, then they shall live in joy and pleasure whereas in verie south.

footh, the fweete and joifull life proceedeth not from any thing without. But contrariwife, when a man hath those goodly things about him; it is himselfe that addeth a pleasure and grace unto them, even from his owne nature and civill behaviour, composed by morall vertue within him, which is the very sountaine and lively spring of all good contentment.

For if the fire do alwaies burne out light, More stately is the house, and faire in sight.

Semblably, riches are more acceptable, glorie hath the better and more fining luftre, yea, and authoritic carieth the greater grace, if the inward joy of the foule be joined therewith: For furely men doe endure povertie, exile and banifirment out of their owne countries, yea, and to beare the burden of olde age willingly and with more ease, according as their maners be milde, and the minde disposed to meeknesse. And like as sweet odours, and Aromaticall perfumes, give a pleasant spiral unto three-bate and ragged clothes; but contrariwise, the rich robe of Anchyses yeelded from under it stincking matter and corrupt blood; which as the Poetsaith, Ran downe by drops upon his cloke Of filke so fine, and is did soke.

Even fo, with vertue, any fort of life, and all maner of living is pleafant & void of forow: where as contrariwife, vice caufeth those things which otherwise seemed great, honourable, and magnificent, to be odious, lothsome and unwelcome to those that have them, if (I say) it be mingled therewith, according to the testimonic of these vulgar verses:

This man who whiles he walkes abroad in street
Or market place, is ever hippy thought:
No sooner sets within his owne house feet,
Thrice wretched but he is, and not for nought.
His wise (as master) hath of all the power,
She bids, commands, she chides and sights ech hower.

And yet one may with ease be rid and divorced from such a curst and shrewd wife, if he be a mattin deed, and not a bond-flave; but for thine owne vice, no meanes will serve to exempt the from it. It is not enough to command it to be gone, by sending a little script or bill of divorcement, and to thinke thereby to be delivered from troubles, and so to live alone in quiet and rego pose. For it cleavest close within the ribbes, it slicketh fast in the very bowels, it dwelleth there both night and day.

It burneth thee, yet fire-brand none is seene, And hastneth age apace before thouweene,

A troublefome companion it is upon the way, by reafon of arrogancy and prefumption: a costly and sumptious guest at the table for gluttonie and gourmandise; an unpleasant and combersome bedfellow in the night, in regard of thoughts, cares and jelousies which breake the sleepe, or trouble the same with santasies. For whiles men lie assemple, the bodie is at rest and repose; but the minde all the while is disquiered and affrighted with searefull dreames and tumultuous visions, by reason of superstitious seare of the gods,

If that I fleepe, when forrowes me surprise, Then fearefull dreames me kill before I rise.

faith one. And even so do other vices serve men: to wit, Envic, Feare, Wrath, Wanton love, and Vnbridled luft. For in the day time, vice looking out, and composing it selfe somewhat unto others abroad, is somewhat ashamed of herselse, and covereth her passions; the giveth not herselse wholly to her motions and perturbations, but many times doth strive againe and make refishance: but in sleepe, being without the danger of lawes and the opinion of the world, being farre remooved (as it were) from feare and shame: then it fetteth all lusts aworke, then it quickeneth and raifeth up all leaudnesse, and then it displaieth all lascivious wantonnesse. It tempteth (as Plate faith) a man to have carnall dealing with his owne mother, and to eat of forbilder 50 and unlawfull meats: there is no villanie that it forbeareth; executing (fo far forth as it is able) all abomination; and hath the fruition thereof, if it be but by illusions and fantasticall dreames, which end not in any pleasure, nor accomplishment of concupiscence, but are powerfull onely to excite, flirre, and provoke still the fits of secret passions and maladies of a corruptheart. Wherein lieth then, the pleasure and delight of sinne, if it be so, that in no place nor at any time it be void of pensivenesse, care and griefe rif it never have contentment, but alwaies in molestation and trouble, without repose ? As for carnall delights and fleshly pleasures, the good complexion and found constitution of an healthfull bodie, giveth thereby meanes, place, opportu80

nity and breeding. But in the foule it is not possible that there should bee engendred anie turth, joy and contentment, unlesse the first foundation be laied in peace of conscience, and tranquillitie of spirit, void of seare, and enjoying a seried calme in all assurance and considence, without any shew of tempest toward. For otherwise, suppose that some hope doe smile upon a man; or say, that delight tickle a little; the same anon is troubled, and all the sport is marred by some carefull cogitation breaking forth: like as the object and concurrence of one rocke troubleth and overthroweth all, though the water and weather both be never so calme.

Now gather gold and spare not by heapes, rake and scrape together masses of silver, builde faire, gallant and stately walking places, replenish all thy house with slaves, and a whole citie with debtours : unlesse withall thou doe allay the passions of thy minde; un-10 leffe thou stay and appeale thy infatiable lust and defires unlesse thou free and deliver thy felfe from all feare and carking cares: thou doft as much as streine wine, or make Ipocras for one that is ficke of a feaver, give honie to a cholericke person diseased with the raging motion of choler, offer meats and viands to those that be ficke of the flomachicall flux, continual laske, ulceration of the guts and bloudy flix, who neither take pleasure therein, nor are the better but the woorfe rather a great deale for them. See you not how ficke folkes are offended, and their stomacks rife at the most fine, costly and deintiest meats that be offred unto them? how they fpit them forth againe, and will none, though they be forced upon them? And yet afterwards, when the bodie is reduced againe into good temperature: when pure spirits and good fresh bloud is engendred, and when the naturall heate is restored and become familiar 20 and kind: then they rife up on their feete to their meat, then their stomacks serve to eate full savorly of course bread with cheese or cresses, and therein they take great pleasure and contentment. The like disposition in the minde doth reason worke. Then and never before shalt thou be pleased and at peace with thy selse, when thou hast once learned what is good and honest indeed. In povertie thou shalt live deliciously like a king : or in a private and quiet state sequestred from civill and publike affaires, thou shalt live as well as they who have the conduct of great armies, and governe the common weale. When thou hast studied Philosophie and profited therein, thou shalt never lead a life in discontentment, but shalt learne how to away with any estate and course of life, and therein find no small joy & harts ease. Thy riches thou wilt rejoice in, because thou thalt have better meanes to do good unto all men: In povertie likewise thou 20 wilt take joy in regard thou shalt have fewer cares to trouble thee: Glorie will turne to thy folace, when thou that fee thy felfe to honoured: and thy low estate and obscure condition will be no leffe comfort, for that thou shalt be fafe and secured from envie.

THAT VERTVE MAY BE TAUGHT AND LEARNED.

The Summarie.

Lutarch refuting heretheerror of those, who are of opinion, That by good and diligent instruction a man cannot become the better; recommendeth sufficiently the studie of vertue. And to proove this assertion of his, he sheweth that the apprentissact of of that, which is of small consequence in this world, witnesseth enough that a man ought to be trained from day to day to the knowledge of things that are bescening andworthy his perjon: Afterwards, he declareth that as much travel foodld be emploied to make him comprehend fuch things as he far distant from the capacity and excellencie of his spirit: In which discourse he taxetheovertly those vaine and giddy heads, who (as they say) runne, after their owne shadow, whereas they should stay and rest upon that which is simme and permanent.

THAT

That vertue may be taught and learned.

THAT VERTUE MAY BE taught and learned.

E difpute of vertue, and put in question, whether Prudence, Iuftice, Loialtie and Honestie may be taught or no? And do we admire then the works of Oratours, Sailers and Shipmasters, Architects, Husbandmen and an infinite number of other such which be extant? Whereas of good men we have nothing but their bare and simple names, as if they were Hippo-Centaures, Gyants or Cyclopes; and mervaile we that of vertuous actions which be entire; perfect, and unblameable, none can be found: ne yet any maners so composed according to dutie, but that they be tainted with some passions and vicious perturbations? yea and if it happen that nature of her selfe bring foorth some good and honest actions, the same straightwaies are darkened, corrupted and in a maner marred, by certeine strange mixtures of contrarie matters that creepe into them, like as when among good come there grow up weeds and wilde but hes that choke the fame; or when some kinde and gentle fruit is cleane altered by favage nourithment. 20 Men learneto fing, to daunce, to read and write, to till the ground, and to ride horses, they learne likewife to thew themselves, to do on their apparell decently; they are taught to wait at cup and trencher, to give drinke at the table, to feafon and dreffe meate: and none of all this can they skill to performe and do handsomely, if they be not trained thereto: and yet shall that, for which these and such like qualities they learne, to wit, good life and honest conversation, be reckoned a meere casuall thing, comming by chance and fortune, and which can neither be taught nor learned? Oh good firs, what a thing is this? In faying, That vertue cannot be taught, we denie withall that it is, or hath any being. For if it be true, that the learning of it, is the generation and breeding thereof, certes he that hindereth the one disanulleth the other: and in denying that it may be raught; we graunt that no fuch thing there is at all: And yet as Plato 30 faith, for the necke of a Lute normade in proportion to the rest of the bodie, there was never knowen one brother go to warre with another, nor a friend to quarrell with his friend, ne yet two neighbour cities to fall out and mainteinedeadly feud, to the interchangeable working and fuffring of those miseries and calamities which follow open warre. Neither can any man come forth and fay, that by occasion of an accent (as for example, whether the word Telchines should be pronounced with the accent over the second fyllable or no) there arose sedition and diffention in any city; or debate in a house betweene man and wife, about the warpe and wouse of any webbe: Howbeit never man yet would take in hand to weare a peece of cloth, nor handle a booke, nor play upon the lute or harpe, unleffe he had learned before; for albeit he were not like to sustein any great losse and notall dammage thereby, yet he would seare to be mocked 40 and laughed to fcorne for his labor, in which case as Heraclium faith, it were better for a man to conceale his owne ignorance; and may fuch an one thinke then, that he could order a house well, rule a wife, and behave himfelfe as it becommeth in mariage, beare migistracie, or governe a common weale as he ought, being never bound and brought up to it? Diogenes espying upon a time aboy eating greedily, and unmanerly gave his mafter or Tutour a good cuffe on the eare: and good reason he had so to do, as imputing the fault rather to him, who had not taught, than to the boy, who had not learned better manners. And is it fo indeed ? ought they of neceffitie, who would be manerly at the table, both in putting hand to a dith of meat, and taking the cup with a good grace, or as Aristophanes faith, to be taught even from their infancie. And is it possible that the same should know how to behave themselves in wedlocke, how to manage the affaires of State, how to converse among men, how to beare office without touch and blame, unlesse they have learned first how to cary themselves one toward another? Arisippus answered upon a time, when one said unto him, And are you sir every where? I should (quoth he, laughing merily) cast away the fare for seriage, which I pay unto the mariner, if I were every where. And why might not a man say likewise, Is children be not the better for their teaching, the falarie is loft which men bestow upon their Masters and Teachers. But wee fee that they taking them into their governance prefently from their nources, like as they did forme their limmes and joints featly with their hands, do prepare and frame their maners accordingly, & fet them in the right way to vertue. And to this purpose answered very wisely a Laconian Schoole-master to one who demanded of him, what good he did to the childe of whom he had the charge ? Mary (quoth he) I make him to take joy and pleafure in those things that be honest. And to say a trueth, these teachers and governours instruct children to holde up their heads straight as they go in the street, and not to beare it sorward: also, not to dip into fauce, but with one finger : not to take bread or fill but with twaine : to rubbe or ferarch after this or that maner: and thus and thus to truffe and holde up their clothes. What 10 shall we say then to him, who would make us beleeve that the Art of Physicke professeth to fcoure the morphew, or heale a whit-flaw: but not to cure a pleurifie, fever, or the phrenfie? And what differeth he from them, who holde that there be schooles and rules to teach petties and little children how to be manerly, and demeane themselves in small matters, but as for great, important and absolute things, it must be nothing els but use and custome, or els meere chance and fortune that doth effect them? For like as he were ridiculous, and worthy to be laughed at, who should fay, that no man ought to lay hand upon the oare for to row, but he that hath beene prentife to it; but fit at the sterne and guide the helme he may, who was never taught it: euen fo, he, who mainteineth, that in some inferiour arts there is required apprentisage, but for the attainining of vertue none at all, deserveth likewise to be mocked. And verily, he should doe con-20 trary unto the Scythians : For they, as Herodot so writeth, use to put out the cies of their flaves only, to the end that being blinde, they might turne round about with their milke, & fo stirre and shake it. But he for sooth putteth the eie of reason into these base and inferior arts, which are no better than fervants waiting upon others; but plucketh it from vertue. Iphierares answered contrariwife, being demanded of Calliss the fonne of Chabrias, by way of contempt and derifion, in this wife, What are you fir? An Archer? A Targetiere? A man at armes? or a light armed fouldiour? I am none (quoth he) of all these, but rather one of those who commandeth them all. Well, ridiculous then is he, and very abfurd, who would fay, There were an art to be taught, of drawing a bowe & shooting, of fighting close at hand being atmed at all pieces, of discharging bullets with a fling, or of fitting and riding an horse; but for sooth to leade and conduct an army, 30 there was none at all : as who would fay, that feat, were a thing not learned, but comming by chance, I know not how. And yet I mult needs fay, more fottish and foolish were he, who flould hold and affirme that Prudence onely could not be taught, without which no other Arts and Sciencesbe woorth ought, or availe any whit. That this is true, and that the is alone the guide which leadeth and guideth all other Sciences, Arts and Vertues, giving them every one their due place and honour, and making them profitable to mankinde, a man may know by this, if there were nothing els, That there would be no grace at a feaft, owby this, if there were nothing els, That there would be no grace at a feaft, owby this, if there were nothing els, That there would be no grace at a feaft, though the meat were never fo well dreffed and ferved up by skilfull Cooks, though there were proper Escuirs or Shewers to set the dishes upon the boord, Carvers, Tasters, Skinkers, and other Servitours and Waiters enough, unlesse there besone good order observed among the said Ministers, to place and dispose everie

SCERNE A FLATTERER

FROM A FRIEND.

The Summaric.

He traveller hath great occasion and cause to rejoice, if in his journey he goe with a good companion, who by his pleasant and prositable discourses may make him sor yet the tedious dissinguise of the way: even so in this life, happie is the man, who can finde and meet with those to beare him company, by whom he may both easily passe through the occurrent dangers that are presented unto him, and also advance sorward cheere-

20 fully unto vertue. In which regard, our author Plutarch having discoursed as touching the Nouviture, education, and instruction of youth, as also of Vice and Versue in generall, by good order and in great reason, sheweth in this Treatise, what fort of people we ought carefully to avoid, and with whom to joine and be acquainted. And as he was aman well experienced and practifed in the affaires of this world, he affirmeth and proovesh by very found and firme reasons, I hat there is nothing whereof we are to be more wary and heedfull than falfe friendship, which he calleth Flutterie. Moreover, this being a matter of so great importance, as every wife man may well thinke and perceive, he draweth out this present discourse in length: and for that his purpose is to instruct us in those meanes whereby we may be able to distinguish betweene a flatterer and a true friend; he sheweth in the first place, I hat the onely principall remedie to stop up the entrie against all flatterers, is to know our selves well: for other-30 wife, we shall have such array and ornaments hanged upon us, that we shall not easily perceive and discerne who we are. And contrart wife, it hapneth of sen times, that we esteeme them to be our perfect friends, so skilfull are they in counterfesting; and withall, when they finde us disposed to enterteine such companie, our owne indiferetion depriveth us of that true in fight and view, which our foule ought to have in discerning a false friend from a true. Being willing therefore to aid and helpe us in this point he describeth a crafty and wily flatterer, he discovereth his cumning casts, and depaintesh him in his colours, shewing the very draught of lineaments which may direct us to the knowledge of him, to wit, That he doth conforme and frame himselfe to the humor and nature of those whose companie he haunteth; how he is unconstant and mutable, changing and turning into many and sundry fashions, without any right and syncere affection, applying himselfe all the while to every thing els but vertue willing to 40 bereputed alwaies more leand and vicious, than those whom hee flattereth: without regard of doing them good any way, or feeking their profit, he onely aimeth at this, to please them and follow their veine in all things by custome and use, bringing him that will give eare unto his words, to this passe, That he shall thinke vice to be vertue: working covertly and under-hand for to deceive more cleanly, transforming vertue into vice, and making it nothing strange and coy to blame himselfe, for to do the more mischiese asterwards to another: then he flattereth most, when he maketh no semblance or shew at all that he mindeth any such thing, and exalteth up to the skie those that be most victors, and woorst of all others, so they will give him enterteinment. Likewise, for that flatterers shew themselves otherwhiles, very forward and bolde to speake their minds and to finde fault, which is one of the best and surest marks of true friendship, he treateth consequently of this libertie and freedome of speech, and how a 50 man may know whether there be any flatterie theremor no. He declares h therefore, how flatterers use this franke reprehension in vaine and frivolomethings, and never in those sinnes and grosse faults which are in deed blame-worthy: fo that this maner of reprehension, is a kinde of soothing them up, and lulling men ascepe in their notorious vices : or els they charge them with faults cleane contrarie. Now after he hath shewed how a man should take heed and beware of them, he discourset hof those services which may make flatterers, and wherein the fame differ from the offices and dueries of friends, and in purfaing and profecuting this Antithesis, he provet that a flatterer is prest and ready to do his plea-Sure in shamefull matters, where as a friend sheweth his good will in those that be honest: also that a flatterer is envious, and so is not a friend. And for that our nature is proud and blinde withall, having need of good friends to guide and direct it, he describe th with what maner of cie, and care we ought to see and hearethose that procure our good, albeit they may seeme to carie with them a kinde of severitie. Meane while he exhorteth friends fo to temper and qualifie their libertie in reprehension shat all m pudencie and importunate rigor befarre from it. But for asmuch as this is (as it were) the principall thing in amitie he heweth. That first we must cut away selfe-love in all our reprehensions; and secondly all injurious, bitter and biting speeches; then he adjoineth moreover, in what seasons, and upon what occurrences, a man ought to reproove and say his minde frankly: and with what dexteritie he is to proceed: that is to say, that sometimes, yea, and more often, he ought to rebuke his friend apart, or under the person of another : wherein he is to looke unto this, That he eschue all vaine-glorie, and sea- 10 Son his reprehensions with some praise among to make them more acceptable and better taken. Confequently, he teacheth us, how we must receive the advertisements, admonitions, and reprehensions of a true friend: and returning to the very point in deed, of amitie and friend hip, he sheweth what meane a man Could keepe for to avert and turne away the neighbour vice, and to urge our friends forward to their devoir : adding morcouer, That all remonstrance and admonition oughs to be tempered with milaneffe and lemnie : wherein he conclude th this whole Treatife, which I affure you is to be well read and marked in these daies of all persons, but those especially, who are advanced above others in worldly wealth or honourable place.

Lato writeth (ô Antiochus Philopappus) that all men do willingly pardon him, who professeth. That he loveth himselse best: Howbeit thereby (quoth he) is ingendred in us, this fault and inconvenience among may others the greatest: that by this meanes no man can be a just judge of himselse, but partiall and favourable. For the lover is ordinarily blinded in the thing that he loveth, unlesse have been etaught, yea and accustomed long before, to affect and esteeme things honest above those that be his owne properly, or inbred and familiar to hum. This is it, that giveth unto a statement harge field, under pretence of friendship, where he hath a fort (as it were) commodioufly feated, and with the vantage to affaile and endammage us, and that is, Selfe-love: whereby everie man being the first and greatest statterer of himselfe, he can be verie well content, to admit a stranger to come necre and flatter him, namely, when he thinketh and is well willing withall, to witheffe with him and to confirme that good felfe-conceit and opinion of his owne. For even he, who is justly reproched to be a lover of Flatterers, loveth himselse notwithstanding exceeding well; and for that good affection that he hath, is both very willing, 40 yea and fully perfwaded also, that all good things are in himselse: and the desire whereof is not fimply, bad, and unlawfull: but the perfwasion is it, that is dangerous and slipperie, having need to be restrained with great heed and carefulnesse. Now if Truth be an heavenly thing, and the verie fource yeelding all good things (as Plato faith) as well to the gods as to men: we ought thus to judge, That a flatteter is an enemic to the gods, and principally to Apollo: For oppofite he is alwaies and contrarie to this precept of his Know thy felfe: causing a man to be abused and deceived by his owne felfe, yea and to be ignorant of the good and evill things that be in him; in making the good gifts which are in him to be defective & unperfect : but the evill parts incorrigible and fuch as cannot be reformed. Now if it were so, that flatterie (as the most part of other vices) touched either onely or especially, base, meane, and abject persons, it were perhaps 50 neither so hurtfull, nor so hard to be avoided as it is. But like as wormes breed most of all and soonest in frimme, tender and sweet wood: even so, for the most the part the generous and gentle natures, and those mindes that are more ingenuous, honest, amiable, and milde than others, are readient to receive and nourish the flatterer that hangeth upon him. Moreover, as Simonides was woont to fay, that the keeping of an elcuirie or stable of horses, followeth northe lampe or oile cruet, but the rich corne fields: that is, it is not for poore men to entertaine great horses, but those rather who are landed men and with their revennewes able to maintaine them:

Even so, we see it is ordinarie, that flatterie keepeth not companie nor forteth with poore folke, or fuch persons as live obscurely & are of no abilitie: but comonly it is the ruine and decay of great houses, & a maladie incidet to mighty States; which oftentimes undoeth & overthroweth whole Monarchies, Realmes, and great Seignories. In which regard it is no fmall matter, nor a thing that requireth little, or no forecast & providence to search & consider the nature thereof: least being so active and busic as it is, and readie to meddle in everie place (nothing so much) it do no hurt unto friendship, nor bring it into obloquie and discredit. For these flatterers refemble lice for all the world: And why? These vermine we see never haunt those that be dead, but leave and forfake the corps to foone as ever the blood (whereof they were woont to feede) is 10 extinct or deprived of vitall spirit: Semblably, a man shall never see flatterers, so much as approchunto fuch persons as are in decay, whose state is crackt and credit waxeth coole; but looke where there is the glorie of the world, where there is authoritie and power, thither they flocke. and there they grow: no fooner is there a chaunge of fortune but they fneake and flinke away, and are no more seene. But we ought not to attend so long and stay for this triall, being unprofitable, or rather hurrfull and not without some danger: For it goeth verie hard with a man, if at the verie inftant and not before, even when he hath most need of friendship, to perceive those to be no friends whom he tooke to be, and namely, when he hath not with him at hand, a good and faithfull friend, to exchange for him that is untruftie, difloyal and counterfeit. For if a man did well, he should be provided before hand of an approoved and tried friend, ere he have neede 20 to employ him, aswell as of current and lawfull money; and not then to make triall of him and finde him faultie, when he is in greatest necessitie and standeth in most need: For we ought not to make proofe with our loffe, and finde him to be falle to our cost and detriment; but contrariwife to be skilfull in the meanes of finelling out a flatterer, that we receive no damage by him: For otherwise, that might befall us, which happeneth unto those who for to know the force of deadly poilons, take the affay, and talte first themselves thereof: well may they indeed come to the judgement thereof; but this skill is deerely bought, when they are fure to die for it. And like as we do not commend fuch; no more can we praise and approove of those, who measure friendship onely by honestic and profit: thinking withall, That such as converse and company with them pleasantly, are straight waies to be attainted as flatterers, no lesse then if they were ta-30 ken in the very act of flatterie: For furely a friend should not be unpleasant & unsavorie, without any feafoning (as it were) of delightfome qualities: neither is friendfhip to be accounted venerable in this respect, that it is austere or bitter; but even that verie beauty and gravitie that it hath is fweet and defireable, and as the Poet faith,

Delightsome Love and Graces three.
And not he onely who is in calamitie, Doth great content and comfort find
To see the sace of trustic friend.

according as Euripides faith, but true amitie addeth no leffe grace, pleafure, and joy unto those 40 that be in prosperitie, than it easeth them of forrow and griefe who are in adversitie. Evenus was woont to fay, that of all pleafant fauce, fire was the best and most effectuall: And even so God having mingled friendship with this life of ours, hath made all things joious, sweete, pleasant and acceptable, where a friend is prefent and enjoieth his part. For otherwise a man can not devise nor expresse, how and in what fort a flatterer could infinuate himselfe and creepe into favour, under the colour of pleasure, if he saw that friendship in the owne nature never admitted any thing that was pleafant and delectable. But like as false and counterfeit peeces of gold which will not abide the touch, represent onely the lustre and bright glittering of gold: So a flatterer refembling the sweete and pleasant behaviour of a friend, sheweth himselse alwaies jocund, mery and delightsome, without croffing at any time. And therefore we ought not pre-50 fently to suspect all them to be flatterers who are given to praise others: For otherwhiles to commend a man, so it be done in time and place convenient, is a propertie no lesse besitting a friend, than to blame and reprehend: Nay contrariwife, there is nothing fo adverte and repugnant to amitie and focietie, than testinesse, thwarting, complaining, and evermore fault-finding: whereas, if a man knoweth the good will of his friend to be ever prest and readie to yeeld due praises, and those in full measure to things well done, he will beare more patiently and in better part another time, his free reprehensions and reproofe for that which is done amisse: for that he is verily perswaded of him that as he was willing ynough to praise, so he was as loth to dispraise, and therefore taketh all in good woorth. A difficult matter then it is, will some one say, to discerne a flatterer from a friend, seeing there is no difference betweene them, either in doing pleasure, or yeelding praise: for otherwise, we see oftentimes, that in many services, courtesies and kindnesses besides, a flatterer is more readic and sorward than a friend. True it is indeed we must needs say: a right hard matter it is to know the one from the other; especially if we speake of a right flatterer indeed, who is his owne crafts-master, and can skill how to handle the matter artificially, and with great cunning and dexteritie: if (I fay) we make no reckoning of them for flatterers, as the common people doe, who are these ordinarie smell-feasts, and as ready as flies to light in everiedifh: these parasites (I say) whose toong (as one said verie well) will be walking fo foone as men have washed their hands, and be readie to fit downe to meat, cogging and foo- to thing up their good masters at everie word, who have no honestie at all in them, and whose fcurrilitie, profane, and irreligious impuritie, a man shall soone finde with one dish of meat and cup of wine. For furely there was no great need to detect and convince the flatterie of Melanthim the Parasite and Tester of Alexander Pheraus the Tyrant, who being asked upon a time how Alexander his good Lord and mafter was murthered, Mary with a thrust (quoth he) of a fword, which went in at his fide, and ranne as farre as into my belly: neither of fuch as a man shall never fee to faile, but where there is a good house and plentifull table kept, they will be fure to gather round about it, in such fort as there is no fire nor iron grates, or brasse gates, can keepe them backe, but they will be readie to put their foot under the boord: no nor of those women who in times past were called in Cypres, Colacides. i. Flatteresses; but after they were come to 20 syria, men named them, Climacides, as one would fay, Laddereffes, for that they used to lie along, & to make their backs stepping stooles or ladders as it were for Queenes & Great mens wives to get upon when they would mount into their coatches. What kinde of flatterer then is it so hard and yet needfull to beware of? Forfooth, even of him who feemeth none fuch, and professeth nothing leffe than to flatter: whom a man shall never finde about the kitchin where the good meate is dreffed, nor take measuring of shadowes to know how the daie goes, and when it is dinner or supper time: ne yet see drunken and lying along the ground untowardly, and full like a beast: But for the most part sober he is enough; he loveth to bee a curious Polypragmon; he will have an oare in every boat, and thinks he is to intermedle in all matters; he hath a minde to be privie and partie in all deepe fecrets; and in one word he carrieth himselfe like a grave 30 Tragedian, and not as a Comicall or Satyricall player, and under that vision and habit he counterfeiteth a friend. For according to the faying of Plato, it is the greatest and most extreame injustice for a man to make semblance of being just when he is not: even so we are to thinke, that flatteric of all others to be most dangerous, which is covert and not apert or professed; which is ferious (I fay) and not practifed by way of jeft and sport. And verily such glozing and flatteric as this, caufeth men oftentimes to miltrust true friendship indeed, and doth derogate much from the credit thereof: for that in many things it jumpeth fo even therewith, unleffe a man take verie good heed and looke narrowly into it. True it is, that Gobrias being runne into a darke and secret roome, together with one of the usurping Tyrants of Persia, called Magi, whom he purfued hard, and at handy gripes strugling, grappling, and wrestling close together, 40 cried out unto Darim comming into the place with a naked fword, and doubting to thrust at the Vsurper, for feare he should runne Gobrias thorough also, Thrust hardly and spare not (quoth he) though you dispatch us both at once. But we who in no wife can allow of that common faying, Let a friend perish, so he take an enemie with him: but are desirous to plucke and parta flatterer from a friend, with whom he is coupled and interlaced by meanes of fo many refemblances: we (I fay) have great cause to seare and beware, that we doe not cast and reject from us the good with the bad: or least in pardoning and accepting that which is agreeable and familiar unto us, we fall upon that which is hurtfull and dangerous. For like as among wilde feeds of another kind, those that being of the same forme, fashion, and bignes with the graines of wheat are intermingled therewith, a man shall hardly trie out from the rest, for that they will not passe 50 thorough the holes of the fieve, ruddle or trie, if they be narrow; and in case they be large and wide, out goeth the good come together with them; even fo it is passing hard to separate flatterie from friendship, being so intermedled therewith in all accidents, motions, affaires, dealings, employment and convertation as it is. For confidering that a flatterer feeth well ynough, that there is nothing in the world so pleasurable as friendship, nor yeeldeth more contentment unto man than it doth: He windeth himselse into savour by meanes of pleasure, and wholy is imploied to procure mitth and delight. Also for that both grace and commoditie, doth alwaies accompany amitie; in which regard the common Proverbe faith, that a friend is more necessarie than either fire or water. Therefore a staterer is readie to put himselfe forward, and offereth his service with all double diligence, striving in all occasions and businesses to be ever prompt and officious. And because the principall thing that linketh and bindeth friendship sure at the beginning, is the conformitie and likenes of manners, studies, endevours and inclinations, and in one word seeing that to be like affected, and to shew pleasure or displeasure in the same things, is the chiefe matter that knitteth amitie and both combineth, and also keepeth men together, by a certaine mutuall correspondencie in naturall affections: the flatterer knowing so much, composeth his nature (as it were) some unformed matter ready to receive all forts of into much, composeth his nature (as it were) some unformed matter ready to receive all forts of into another than and a commondate himselfe wholy to all those things that he taketh in hand; yea and to resemble those persons just by way of imitation whom he meaneth to set upon and deceive, as being souple, soft, and pliable, to represent them lively in everie point, so as a man may say of him after this manner.

Achillessonne thinke you he is? N ay, even Achilles himselse irvis.

But the craftieft cast of all other, that he hath, is this, That seeing (as he doth) libertie of speech, (both in trueth, and also according to the opinion and speech of the whole world) to be the proper voice of friendship (as a man would fay) of some living creature; insomuch, as where there is not this freedome of speaking frankely, there is no true friendship nor generositie in deed. In 20 this point alfo, he will not feeme to come short, nor leave it behinds for want of imitation; but after the fashion of fine and excellent cookes, who use to serve up tart, bitter and sharpe sauces together with sweet & pleasant meats, for to divert & take away the satietie and fulnesse which foone followeth them. These flatterers also use a certaine kind of plaine and free speech; howbeit, neither fyncere and naturall is it, nor profitable, but (as we commonly fay) from teeth outward, or (as it were) beckening and wincking flightly with the cie under the browes, nottouching the quicke, but tickling aloft onely, to no purpole. Well, in these respects above specified, hardly and with much adoe is a flatterer discovered, and taken in the maner; much like unto those beasts, who by nature have this propertie, To change their colour, and in hue to resemble that bodily matter or place whereon they fettle, and which they touch. Seeing then it is fo, that 50 he is so apt to deceive folke, and lieth hidden under the likenesse of a friend; our part it is, by unfolding the differences that are fo hidden, to turne him out of his masking habit, and being defooiled of those colours and habilements that he borroweth of others, for want of his owne (as Plate faith) to lay him naked and open to the eie: let us therefore enter into this discourse, and fetch it from the very first beginning.

We have already faid, that the original of friendship among men (for the most part) is our conformitie of nature and inclination, embracing the same customes and maners, loving the same exercises, affecting the same studies, and delighting in the same actions and imploiments: concerning which, these verses well and firly runne;

Olde folke love beft with aged folke to talke, And with their feeres yoong children to dispore: Women omee met, do let their tongues to walke, With such likewise, such persons best do sport: I hewretched man his miseries doth lament With those, whose state like sortunes do torment.

The flatterer then, being well aware that it is a thing naturally inbred in us, to delight in those that are like our selves, to converse with them, and to use and love them above all others, endevoureth first and formost to draw and approch, yea, and to lodge necre unto him whom he meaneth to enveagle and compasse, even as if he went about in some great passure to make tomatone beast, whom he purposeth to tame and bring to hand, by little and little joining close unto him, as it were, to be concorporated in the same studies and exercise, in the same affections, emploiments and course of life: and this he doth so long, untill the party whom he laieth for, have given him some advantage to take holde by, as suffering himselfe gently to be touched, clawed, handled and stroked; during which time, he letteth slip no opportunitie to blame those persons, to reproove those things, and courses of life; which he perceiveth the other to hate contrariwise, to praise and approove all that which he knoweth him to take delight in: and this he doeth not after an ordinary maner and in a meane, but excessively and beyond all measure, with a kinde of admiration and woonder; constraining this love or hatred of his, to a thing, not as if he had received these impressions from some sudden passion, but upon a staicd and setled judgement. Which being fo: how, and by what different marks thall he be knowen and convinced, that he is not the like or the fame in deed, but onely a counterfeit of the like and of the fame? First, a man must consider well, whether there be an uniforme equalitie in all his intentions and actions or no? whether he continue and perfift still, taking pleafure in the same things, and praising the same at all times? whether he compose and direct his life according to one and the fame molde and paterne? like as it becommeth a man who is an ingenuous lover of that friendship and conversation which is ever after one maner, and alwaies like it selfe: for such a one in deed is a true friend. But a flatterer contrariwise is one who hath no one permanent seat in his maners and behaviour, nor hath made choife of any life for his owne content, but onely to to please another, as framing and applying his actions wholly to the humor of another, is never fimple, uniforme, nor like himfelfe, but variable and changing alwaies from one forme to another, much like as water which is powred out of one veffel into another, even as it runneth forth, taketh the forme and fashion of that vessell which receiveth it. And herein he is cleane contrarie to the ape; for the ape as it should seeme, thinking to counterfeit a man, by turning, hopping and dauncing as he doth, is quickly caught: but the flatterer, whiles he doth imitate and counterfeit others, doth entice and draw them, as it were, with a pipe or call, into his net, and fo beginleth them. And this he doeth not alwaies after one maner; for with one he daunceth and fingeth; with another he wil feeme to wreftle, or otherwise to exercise the bodie in feats of activitic; if he chance to meet with a man that loveth to hunt, and to keepe hounds, him he will fol- 20 low hard at heeles, fetting out a throat as loud in a maner as Hippolytus in the Tragedie Phadra, crying,

So ho, this is my joy and onely good, With cric to lure, with tooting horne to winde, By leave of gods to bring into the wood My hounds, to roule and chafe the dapple Hinde,

And yet hath he nothing to do at all with the wilde beafts of the forrest, but it is the hunter himfelse whom hee laieth for to take within his net and toile. And say that hee light upon a yoong man that is a student & given to learning, then you shall see him also as deepe poring upon his booke, and alwaies in his Studie; you shall have him let his beard grow downe to his foot, like a 30 grave Philosopher: who but he then, in his side thred-bare students cloake, after the Greeke fathion, as if he had no care of himselse, nor joy of any thing els in the world: not a word then in mouth, but of the Numbers, Orthangles and Triangles of Placo. If peradventure there fall into his hands an idle do-nothing, who is rich withall, and a good fellow, one that loveth to cat and drinke and make good cheere,

That wily Fox Vlysses the Hisragged garments will off do.

off goes then his bare and overworne studying gowne, his beard he causeth to be cut & shorne as neere as a new mowen field in harvest, when all the corne is gone: no talke then but of flagons, bottels, pots, and cooling pans to keepe the wine cold: nothing now but merie con-40 ceits to moove laughter in everie walking place and gallerie of pleasure: Now hee letteth slie frumpes and fcoffes against schollers and such as studie philosophie. Thus by report it fell out upon a time at Syracufa: For when Plato thither arrived, and Denys all on a fodaine was fet upon a furious fit of love to Philosophie, his palace and whole court was full of dust and fand, by reason of the great recourse thither of Students in Geometrie, who did nothing but draw figures therein. But no fooner had Plato incurred his displeasure and was out of favor: no fooner had Denys the tyrant bidden Philosophie farewell, & given himselfe againe to belly-cheere, to wine, vanities, wantonnesse, and all loosenesse of life; but all at once, it seemed the whole court was transformed likewife, (as it were by the forcerie and enchantment of Cyrecs) into hatred and detestation of good letters; so as they forgat all goodnesse, and betooke themselves to 50 folly and fortul meffe. To this purpose it were not amisse for to alledge as testimonies, the fashions and acts of some notorious flatterers, such I meane as have governed Common-welths, and affected popularitie. Among whom the greatest of all other was Alcibiades, who all the while he was at Athens used to scoffe, and had a good grace in merrie conceits & pleasant jests: he kept great horses, and lived in jollitie, most gallantly, with the love and favor of all men: when he sojourned in Sparta, he went alwaies shaven to the bare skin, in an overworne cloke, or else the same very course, and never washed his bodie but in cold water. Afterwards, being in Thrace, he became a foldior, and would carrouse and drinke lustily with the best. He came no sooner to Tisaphernes in Asia, but he gave himselfe to voluptuous and pleasure, to rior, wantonnes, and superstuous delights: Thus throughout the whole course of his life, he wan the love of all men, by framing himselfe to their humors and saffions wheresover he came. Such were not Eparainondas and Agestlaus: For albeit they conversed with many forts of people, travailed divers cities, and saw fundry fashions and maners of strange nations; yet they never changed their behavior, they were the same men still, reteining evermore a decent port which became them, in their apparel, speech, diet, and their whole cariage and demeanor. Plato likewise was no changeling, but the same man at Syntemssathat he was in the Academic or College at Athens: and looke what his cariage was before Dion, the same it was and no other in Denys his court.

But that man may very eafily finde out the variable changes of a flatterer, as of the fifh called the Pourcuttle, who will but straine a little and take the paines to play the diffembler himselfe, making thew as if he likewife were transformed into divers and fundry fathions; namely in mifliking the course of his former life, and fodainly seeming to embrace those things which he rejected before, whether it be in diet, action or speech: For then he shall soone see the slatterer also to be inconstant, and not a man of himselse, taking love or hatred to this or that, joying or greeving at a thing, upon any affection of his owne that leadeth him thereto, for that he receiveth alwaies as a mirrour the images of the passions, motions and and lives of other men. If you 20 chance to blame one of your friends before him, what will he fay by and by? Ah well, You have found him out I fee now at last though it were long fince: Iwis I liked him not long a great while ago: Contrariwife, if your minde alter, fo that you happen to fall a praifing of him againe: Very well done will he fay, and binde it with an oth, I con you thanke for that: I am very glad for the mans fake, and I believe no leffe of him. Do you breake with him about the alteration of your life, and beare him in hand that you meane to take another course, as for example, to give over State affaires, to betake your felfeto a more private and quiet life. Yea marie (quoth he) and then you do well, it is more than high time to to do: For long fince we should have beene disburdened of these troubles so full of envie and perill. Make him believe once that you will change your copie, and that you are about to shake off this idle life, and to betake 30 your selfe unto the Common-weale, both to rule and also to speake in publike place: you shall have him to footh you up, and fecond your fong, with thefe and fuch like responds : A brave mind (beleeve me) and befeeming a man of your worth and good parts: For to fay a truth, this idle and private life, though it be pleafant, and have eafe enough, yet it is but bafe, abject, and dishonorable; when you finde him there once, mussle his nose immediately with this posle,

Good sir me thinks you soone do turne your stile, You seeme much chang d from him you were erewhile.

I have no neede of fuch a friend, that will alter as I doe, and follow me every way (for my shadow can do that much better) I had rather have one that with me will follow the truth, & judge according to it and not otherwise. Avant therefore, I will have nought to do with thee. Thus 40 you see one one way to discover a statterer.

A fecond difference we ought to observe in his imitations and resemblances, for a true friend doth not imitate all that he feeth him whom he loveth to do; neither is he forward in praising everiething, but that onely which is best: For according to Sophecles,

In love he would his fellow be,

But not in hate and enmitte.

And verily one friend is ready and willing to affift another in well doing and in honeft life, and never will need to be companion in leauthoffe, or helpe him to commit any wicked and heinous fact; unlesse peradventure through the ordinarie conversation, and continuall acquaintance together, he be tainted with infection of some ill qualitie and vicious condition, even so against his will and such a beswell aware; much like as they who by contagion catch the winaticke and bleered cies; or as the familiar friends and schollers (by report) of Plandid invitate him in stopping soward; and those of Antitude in his stammering and massing speech; and the Constigit of Alexander, the Great, in bending of his necke, and rough voice when he spake. For even so some the contrariwise, it fareth with a flatterer even as with the Chamcelion; For as he can take upon him any colour save onely white; semblably, a flatterer cannot possibly frame himselfe to any thing that good is and of importance; but there is no naughtinesse and badnesse in the world which he will not quickly imitate. And well I may compare such felfowes to ill painters, who when through infufficiencie in their art they be not able to draw to the life, the beautie and favour of a good face, will be fure yetto expresse the rivels, warts, moules, freckles, scarres and such like deformities. For even so a flatterer can imitate verie passing well, Incontinencie, foolish superstition, hastines and choler, bitternesse towards houshold servants, distrust and distidence in friends & kinsfolk, yea and treacherie against them: for that by nature he is alwaies inclined to the woorfe; and befides, fo far he would be thought from blaming vice, that he undertaketh to imitate the same. For those that seeke for amendment of life and reformation of manners are ever suspected: such (I say) as thew themselves displeased and offended at the faults and misdemeanors of their friends. And this was it that made Dion odious to Denys 10 the Tyrant, Samius to Philip, and Cleomenes to Ptolomans, and in the ende was their raine and overthrow. The flatterer who defireth to be both pleafant and faithfull at once, or at least wife to to be reputed, for excessive love and friendship that he pretendeth, will not seeme to be offended with his friend for any lewd parts, but in all things would be thought to carie the fame affection, and to be in manner of the fame nature and incorporate into him: whereupon it commeth to patle also, that even in casuall things and the occurrences of this life, which happen without our will and counfell, he will needes have a part, there is no remedie. This if he be disposed to flatter sicke persons, hee will make as though hee were sicke also of the same difease for companie; and if hee have to doe with such as bee dimme sighted or hard of hearing, hee will be thought neither to fee nor heare well for fellowship. Thus the flatterers 20 about Denys the Tyrants, when he had an impediment in his eies that he could not fee cleerely, faigned that themselves likewise were halfe blinde, and to make it good, hit one upon another at the board, and overthrew the diffies upon the table as they fate at supper. Others there be that proceed farther than fo, and because they would appeare more touched with a fellow-seeling of affections, will enter as farre as to the verie inward fecrets that are not to be revealed. For if they can perceive that they whom they do flatter, be not fortunate in their marriage, or that they are growen into diffrust, jealousie, and simister opinion, either of their owne children, or their neer kinsfolke and familiars; they spare not themselves but begin to complaine, & that with griefe of heart and forrow of their owne wives and children, of their kinred and friends, laying abroad fome criminous matters, which were better (iwis) to be concealed and finothered, 30 than intered and revealed. And this refemblance and likeneffe that they take upon themselves, causeth them to seeme more affectionate and fuller of compassion. The other then, thus flattered, thinking that by this means they have received from them a fufficient pawne and affurance of their fidelitie, thicke not to let fall from their mouth some matter of secrecicals; and when they have once committed it unto them, then they are ever after bound to use them, yea and be afraid to miftruft them in any thing. I my felfe knew one who feemed to put away his owne wedded wife, because his friend whom he flattered had divorced his before : and when he had so done, was knowen to go fecretly unto her, and messengers there were who passed to and fro betweene them under hand; which the divorced wife of the other perceived and found out well youngh. Certes little knew he what a flatterer was, and he had no experience of him who 40 thought these lambicke verses to expresse the Sea-crab better than him,

A beast whose body and belly are meet, The cie doth serve each way to see: With teeth it creepes, they stand for feet, A read now what creature this may be?

For this is the very portraiture and image of a parafite, who keepes about the frying pan (as Eupolis faith) of his good friends, and waiteth where the cloth is laid: But as touching thefe things, let us referre them to their proper place for to be discoursed more at large. Howbeit, for the prefent let us not leave behinde us one notable devise and cunning cast; that a flatterer hath in his imitations; to wit, that if he do counterfeit some good qualitie that is in him whom he doth starts, yet he giveth him alwaies the upper hand: For antiong those that be true friends; there is not emulation at al, no jealousse or envy betweene one & another: but whether they be equall in welding or come behinde; they take all in good part and never grieve at the matter. But the states rer bearing well in minde that he in everie place, is to play the second part, yeeldeth alwaies in his imitation the equalitie from himselfe, and doth affect to counterfeit another so, as he will be the inferiour, giving the superioritie unto the other in all things but those which are naught, for therein he chalengeth to himselfe the victoric over his friend. If he be somewhat mall-content and hard to be pleafed, then will the flatterer professe himselse to be starke melancholike: if his friend be somewhat too religious or superstitious, then will he make semblance as though he were rapt and transported altogether with the seare of the gods: If the other be amorous, he wil be in love surious: when the other saith I laughed a good; but I (will he say againe) laughed until I was well necre dead. But in good things it is cleane contrarie, for when he speaketh of good soomnanship he wil say, I runne swiftly indeed, but you thy away. Againe, I sit a horse and rid reasonable wel; but what is that to this Hippo-Centaure here for good horsemanship? Also, I have a pretie gift in Poetrie (I must needs say) and am not the worst verifiser in the world; but in these and such like speeches two things at once he doth: for first he seemeth to appropose the enterprise of the other as singular good, because he doth imitate him; and secondly he sheweth that his sufficiencie therein is incomparable and not to be matched, in that he consessed him felter to come short of him. And thus much of the different marks betweene a statterer and a friend as touching their refemblances.

To thunder verses I have no skill, To Iupiter there leave that I will.

Now, forafmuch as there is a communitie of delectation and pleafure in them both (as I have faid before) for that an honest man taketh no lesse joy and comfort in his friends, than a lewd person in flatterers, let us consider likewise the distinction betweene them in this behalfe. The onely way to diffinguish them a funder in this point, is to marke the drift and end of the 20 delectation both in the one and the other; which a man may fee more electely by this example: There is in a liveete ointment an odoriferous smell; so is there also in an Antidote or medicine; but herein lieth the difference, for that in the ointment above faid, there is a reference to pleasure onely, and to nothing else; but in the Antidote, beside the delectation that the odor yeeldeth, there is a respect also of some medicinable vertue; namely either to purge and clense the bodie, or to heate and chafe it, or elfe to incarnate and make new flesh to come. Againe, Painters do grinde and mixe freth colours and lively tinctures; fo the Apothecarie hath drugs and medicines of a beautifull and pleafant colour to the cie, that it would do a man good to look upon them. But wherein is the difference? Is there any man to groffe that conceiveth not readily, that the ods lieth in the use or end, for which both the one and the other be ordained? Sem-30 blably the mutuall offices and kindneffes that paffe from friend to friend, befide the honeftie and profite that they have, bring with them also that which is pleasing and delectable, as if fome deinty and lively flowers grew thereupon: For fomerime friends use plaies and pastimes one with another: they invite one another, they eate and drinke together: yea and otherwhiles (beleeve me) you shall have them make themselves mery and laugh hartily, jesting, gauding, and disporting one with another; all which serve as pleasant fauces to season their other serious and honest affaires of great weight and consequence. And to this purpose serve wel these verses:

With pleasant discourses from one so another They made themselves mery, being mes sogether. Also,

And nothing elfedisjoined our amity, Nor parted our pleasures and mutually lity.

But the whole worke of a flatterer, and the onely marke that he shooteth at, is alwaies to devise, prepare and confect, as it were, some play or sport, some action and speech, with pleafure and to do pleasure. And to knit up all briefly in one word; he is of opinion that he ought to do all for to be pleasant: whereas the true friend doing alwaies that which his dutie requireth, many times pleasterh, and as often againe he is displeasant: not that his intention is to displease at any time; however he fee it expedient and better so to do; he will not sticke to be a little hardh and unpleasant. For like as a Physician when neede requireth, putterh in some Saffron or Spiknard into his medicine; yea and otherwhile perintiteth his patient a delicate bath, or liberall 50 and deinty dietro his ful contentment: but sometimes for it againe, leaving out all sweet odors, casteth in Castorem; or elle he brufeth and stampeth some Ellebore, and forceth his patient to drinke of that potion; not proposing either in the former medicine pleasure, nor in the latter displeasure for the end; but both by the one and the other; training the sicke person under his hand to one & the same effect of his cure, to wir, his good and the health of his body; even so it is with a true friend:

one while with praifes and gracious words he extolleth and cheereth up his friend, inciting him thereby alwaies to that which is good and honest, as he in Homer,

To discerne a flatterer from a friend.

Deere heart Sir Teucer worthie sonne of Telamon that Knight. Come Prince and floure of valiant knights, Shoot thus your arrowes flight. And another, How can I ever put out of minde Heavenly Vlysses a Prince so kinde?

Contrariwife, anotherwhile where there is need of chaftifement and correction, he will not 10 spare but use sharpe and biting words: yea, and that free speech which carrieth with it an affection carefull to do good, and fuch as in deed befeemeth a tutor and governour, much after this manner:

What Menelaus! how ever that from Iupiter you discend: You play the foole, for folly such I cannot you commend.

It falleth out so likewise, that sometime he addeth deeds to words. And thus Menedemus shut the doore against the sonne of Aslepiades his friend, and would not deigne once to falute him. because he was a riotous youth, and lived dissolutely and out of all order: by which meanes he 20 was reclaimed from loofe life, and became an honest man. Arcesslass in like maner excluded Battes out of his schoole, and would not suffer him to enter, because in a Comedie that he composed, he had made one verse against Cleanthes; but afterwards Battus repenting of that he had done, and making fatisfaction unto Cleanthes, was pardoned and received againe into his favor. For a man may offend his friend with intention to dochim good; but he must not proceed fo farre in displeasing him, that thereby he breake or undo the knot of friendship: he ought (I say) to use a sharpe rebuke, as a Physician doth some bitter or tart medicine, to save or peserve the life of his patient. And a good friend is to play the part of a Mulician, who to bring his inftrument into tune, and fo to keepe it, setteth up these strings, and letteth downe those: and so ought a friend to exchange profit with pleafure, and use one with another, as occasion serveth, obser- 10 ving still this rule often times, to be pleasing unto his friend, but alwaies profitable: whereas the flatterer being used evermore to sing one note, and to play upon the same string, that is to say, To please: and in all his words and deeds, to aime at nothing els but the contentment of him whom he flattereth, can not skill either in act to refift, or in speech to reproove and offend him; but goeth on still in following his humor, according alwaids with him in one tune, and keeping the same note just with him.

Now, as Xenophon writeth of king Agefiland, that he was well apaied to be commended of them who he knew would also blame him if there were cause; so we are to thinke well of friendthip when it is pleasant, delightsome and cheereful, if otherwhiles also it can displease and crosse againe; but to have in fuspition the conversation and acquaintance of such, as never doe or say 40 any thing but that which is pleafing, continually keeping one course without change, never rubbing where the gall is, nor touching the forc, without reproofe and contradiction. We ought (Ifay) to have ready alwaies in remembrance the faying of an ancient Laconian, who hearing king Charilaus fo highly praifed and extolled; And how possibly (quoth he) can be be good, who is never tharpe or levere unto the wicked? The gad-file (as they fay) which useth to plague bulles and oxen, letleth about their cares, and fo doth the tick deale by dogges: after the fame maner, flatterers take holde of ambitious mens cares, and possesse them with praises; and being once for fast there, hardly are they to be removed and chased away. And here most needfull it is, that our judgement be watchfull and observant, and doe discerne whether these praises be attributed to the thing or the person; wee shall perceive that the thing it selfe is praised, if so they commend men rather ablent than in place: also if they desire and affect that themselves which they do so like and approve in others: again, if they praise not us alone; but all others, for the semblable qualities: likewise, if they neither say nor do one thing now, and another time the contrary. But the principall thing of all other, is this; If we our felves know in our owne ferret conscience, that we neither repent nor be ashanged of that, for which they so commend usine yet wish in our hearts, that we had faid or done the contrary; for the inward judgement of our mind and foule bearing witnesse against such praises, and not admitting thereof, is youd of affections and passions, wherby it neither can be touched nor corrupted and surprised by a flatterer, Howbeit, I know not how it commeth about, that the most part of men can not abide nor receive the confolations which be ministred unto them in their adversities, but rather take delight and comfort in those that weepe, lament and mourne with them : and yet the same men having offended or being delinquent in any ductie, if one come and find fault or touch them to the quicke therefore, do strike and imprint into their hearts remorfe and repentance, they take him for no better than an accuser and enemie: contrariwise, let one highly commend and magnific that which they have done; him they falute and embrace, him they account their wel-willer and friend in deed. Now, who loever they be that are ready to praise and extoll with applause and clapping to of hands, that which one hath done or faid, were it in catneft or in game; fuch (I fay) are dangerous and hurtfull for the prefent onely, and in those things which are next hand; but those, who with their praises pierfe as farre as to the maners within, and with their flatteries proceed to corrupt their inward natures and dispositions, I can liken unto those slaves or honsholde servants, who rob their masters, not onely of that come which is in the heape, & lieth in the garners, but also of the very seed; for the inclination and towardnesse of a man, are the seed that bring forth all his actions, and the habitude of conditions and maners, are the very fource and head from whom runneth the course of our whole life, which they pervert in giving to vices the names of vertues. Thucydides in his storie writeth: That during civill seditions and warres, men transferred the accustomed fignifications of words unto other things, for to justifie their deeds: for de-20 sparate rashnesse, without all reason, was reputed valour, and called Love-friend: provident delay and temporizing, was taken for decent cowardife: Modestie and temperance, was thought to be a cloke of effeminate unmanlinesse: a prudent and wary circumspection in all things, was held for a generall flouth and idlenesse. According to which precedent, we are to consider and observe in flatterers, how they terme prodigalitie by the name of liberalitie; cowardise is nothing with them but heedfull warinesse: brainsicknesse they entitle promptitude, quicknesse, and celeritie: base and mechanicall niggardise, they account temperate frugalitie. Is there one full of love and given to be amorous? him they call good fellow, a boun-companion, a man of a kinde and good nature. See they one halfie, wrathfull, and proud withall? him they will have to be hardie, valiant and magnanimous: contrariwife, one of a base minde and abject spirit, they 30 will grace with the attribute of fellow-like, and full of humanity. Much like to that which Plato hath written in one place: That the amorous lover is a flatterer of those whom he loveth. For if they be flat nofed like a shoing horne, such they call lovely and gracious: be they hawk nofed like a griffin, oh, that is a kingly fight fay they: those that be blacke of colour, are manly; white of complexion, be Gods children. And as for the terme Melichriis, that is, Hony-coloured, it is alwaics (verily) a flattering word, devised by a lover, to mitigate and diminish the odiousnesse of apale hue, which he seemeth by that sweet name, not to mislike, but to take in the best parr. And verily if hee that is foule & ill favoured, be borne in hand that he is faire and beautifull, or one of small & lowe stature made believe that he is goodly & tall; he neither continueth long in this his error, neither is the damage that he fufteineth thereby greevous & great, nor unrecove-40 rable: but the praises which induce & inure a man to beleeve, That vice is vertue, infomuch that he is nothing at all discontented in his sinne and greeved therefore, but rather taketh pleasure therein: those also which take away from us all thame and abashment to commitsaults; such were they that brought the Sicilians to ruine, and gave them occasion to beautifie or colour the tyrannie and crueltie of Denys and Phalaris, with the goodly names of Inflice and Hatted of wickednesse: These were the overthrow of Aeg ppt, in cloking the esseminate wantonnesse, the furious superstition, the yelling noises after a fanaticall maner of king Ptolomeus, together with the marks that he caried of Lillies and Tabours in his body, with the glorious names of Devotion, Religion, and the service of the gods. And this was it that at the same time went very neere, and had like to have corrupted and spoiled for ever the maners and fashions of the 50 Romanes, which before were so highly reputed, to wit, naming the riotousnes of Antonie, his loofenes, his fuperfluous delights, his fumptuous thewes & publike feafts, with their profusion and wasting of so much monie, by smooth and gentle termes of courtesies, and meriments full of humanitie, by which difguifements and pretexts, his fault was mollified or diminished in abusing so excessively the grandence of his puissance & fortune. And what was it else that made Ptolomaus to put on the malque or mussle (as it were) of a piper, and to hang about him pipes and fluited What was it that caused 2 groto mount up the Stage to act Tragedies, with a visour over his face, and buskins on his legs? was it not the praise of fuch flatterers as these? And are not most of our kings being when they fing finall and fine, after a puling maner, saluted Apolloes for their mulicker and if they drinke untill they be drunke, honored with the names of Bacchus the god of wine: and when they seeme a little to wrestle or trie some feats of activitie, stiled by and by with the glorious addition of Hercules, brought (thinke you) to exceeding dishonour & shame by this groffe flatterie, taking such pleasure as they do in these gallant surnames. And therefore we had most need to beware of a flatterer in the praises which he giveth, which himfelfe is not ignorant of, but being carefull and very fubtill in avoiding all suspicion, if haply he meet with one of these fine fooles, and delicate minions, well set out in gay apparell: or some rusticall thicke-skin, carying on his backe a good leather pilch; or (as they fay) one that feedeth grofly: fuch he will not spare but abuse with broad flattery, and make common laughing 10 flocks of them: Like as Struthias, making a very affe of Bias, and riding him up and downe, yea & infulting upon him for his fottifhnesse with praises that he would seeme to hang upon him; Thou hast (quoth he) drunk more than king Alexander the great, & with that turning to Cyprius laughed as hard as ever he could till he was ready to finke againe. But if a flatterer chance to deale with them that be more civill and elegant, and do perceive that they have a speciall eie unto him in this point, namely that they stand well upon their guard in this place, for feare lest they be furprifed by him: then he goes not to worke directly in praifing of them, but he keepeth aloofe, he fetcheth about many compasses a great way off at first, afterwards by little and little he winneth some ground and approcheth neerer and neerer, making no noise untill he can touch and handle them, much after the maner of those that come about wilde beasts, assaying 20 how to bring them to hand and make them tame and gentle. For one while he will report to fuch a one the praifes that fome other give out of him; imitating herein the Rhetoricians, who many times in their orations speake in the third person, and after this maner he will begin: I was not long fince (quoth he) in the market place, where I had fome talke with certeine strangers, and other ancient personages of good worth, whom I was glad at the heart to heare, how they recounted all the good in the world of you, and spake wonderfully in your commendation. Otherwhiles he will devife and fetch out of his owne fingers ends fome light imputations against him, yet all forged and false, agreeable to his person and condition, making semblance as if he had heard others what they faid of him, and very cunningly will he close with him, and beare him in hand that he is come in all hafte to know of him, whether ever he faid or did fo as 30 was reported of him: And if the other do denie it, (as it is no other like but he will) thereupon he takes occasion to enter into the praise and commendation of the man in this wise: I mervaile truly how that you should abuse and speake ill of any of your familiars and friends, who were never woont formuch as to miscall or say otherwise than well of your very enimies? or how it possibly could be, that you should be ready to gape after other mens goods, who use to be so liberall and bountifull of your owne? Other flatterers there be, who like as Painters to fet up their colours and to give them more beautifull light and luftre unto them, lay neere unto them others that be more darke and shadowie: so they in blaming, reprooving, reproching, traducing &deriding the contrarie vertues to those vices which are in them whom the meane to flatter, covertly and underhand do praise and approove those faults and imperfections that they 40 have, and fo in praifing and allowing, do feede and cherish the same: As for example, if they be among prodigall ding-thrifts and walters, riotous persons, covetous misers, mischievous wretches, and fuch as have raked & scraped goods together by hooke and crooke, and by all indirect means they care not how; before them they will speake basely of Temperance and Abstinence, calling itrufficitie: and as for those that live justly and with a good conscience, contenting themselves with their estate, and therin reposing suffisance, those they will nickname, heartlesse, and base minded solke, altogether insufficient to do or dare any thing. If it fall out, that they converse and be in companie with such as be idle lusks, and love to sit still at home and do nothing, forbearing to meddle with ordinarie affaires abroad in the world: they will not bash to finde fault with policie and civill government, calling the managing of State matters and com- 50 mon weale, a thankleffe intermedling in other mens affaires, with much travaile and no profit. And as for the minde and defire to be a magistrate and to fit in place of authoritie, they will not let to fay it is vaine glory and ambition, altogether fruitleffe. For to flatter and claw an oratour, they will reproove in his presence a Philosopher. Among light huswives that be wantonly given, they winne the price, and are very well accepted, if they call honest matrons and chaste dames (who content themselves with their owne husbands, and them love alone) rude and rufficall women, untaught, ill bred, unlovely and having no grace with them. But herein is the very height of wickedneffe, that these flatterers for advantage will not spare their owne selves: For like as wrestlers debase their owne bodies and stoupe downe low otherwhiles, for to overthrow their sellowes that wrestle with them, and to lay them along on the ground; so in blaming and finding many faults with themselves, they winde in, and creepe closely to the praise and admiration of others: I am (quoth one of them) a very coward, and no better than a verie slave at sea; I can away with no labour and travell in the world; I am all in a heat of choler, and raging mad, if I heare that one hath given me any bad termes; mary as for this man (meaning him whom he slattereth) he casteth doubts at no perill and danger, all is one with him, sea or land, he can endure all hardnesse, and he counteth nothing painfull, no hurt there is in him, a so fingular man he is, and hath not his fellow, he is angry at nothing, he beareth all with patience. But say he meet with one at aventure, which standeth upon his owne bottome, and hath some great opinion of his owne sufficiency for wit and understanding who hath a desire to be austere, and not to depend upon the conceits of others, but resteth in his owne judgement; and upon a certaine uprightnesse in himselse, efficiences hath these verses in his mouth:

Sir Diomede, do not me praife fo much to more or lesse, Nor out of measure me dispraise, I lowe not such excesse.

This flatterer then, who is his owne crafts-mafter and hath thoroughly learned his trade, goeth 20 not the old way to worke in fetting upon him, but he hath another engin and device in store to affaile fuch a grim fir withall. He will make an errand to him for counfell in his owne affaires, as being the man whom he effecmeth to have more wit and wildome than himselfe. There be divers others (quoth he) with whom I have better acquaintance and familiaritie than with your felfe: Howbeit, fir I am forced of necessitie to make bold and to importune you a little: For whither elfe should wee ingram men repaire, that have neede of advice? and to whom are we to have recourse in matters of trust and secresse. And then after he hath heard once what he will fay, and it makes no matter what it be; he will take his leave, faying, that he hath received not counfell from a man, but an oracle from some god. Now before he departeth, if haply he perceive that he taketh upon him good skill and infight in litterature, he wil present unto him some 30 compositions of his owne penning, praying him withall to peruse them, yea and to correct the fame. Mithridates the king, affected and loved the art of Phylicke veriewell: by reason whereof some of his familiar friends about him, came and offered themselves to be cut and cauterifed by him: which was a meere flatterie in deed and not in word. For it feemed that they gave great testimonie of his soule, in that they put their lives into his hands:

> Of subsile spirits, thus you may see, That many formes and shapes there be.

But this kind of diffimuled praifes, requiring greater and more warie circumspection to be taken heed of, if a man would detect and convince, hee ought of purpose when hee is tempted and affailed with such flatterie, to obtrude and propose unto the flatterer absurd counsell, if he 40 seeme to demand and aske it: advertisements also and properly of the same kinde, yea and corrections without all sense and to no purpose, when he shall offer his labours to be read and perused: In so doing, if he perceive the partie suspected to be a flatterer, doth not gaines and protradict any thing, but alloweth of all and receiveth the same, yea and more than that, when he shall to everie point crie out and say, Oh well said and sufficiently: O excellent wit: be sure, then he is caught in a trap: then I say it will be found plainely according to the common byword,

That when he did a watchword crave, Some other thing he fought to have: Or as we fay (in Proverb old) Draffe was bis errand, but drinke he would, that is to fay, hewaited for some occasion and opportunitie, by praising to pushe him up with vanitie and overweening of himselse. Moreover, like as some have defined painting to be a mute Poësie; even so praising is a kind of silent and secret staterie. Hunters (we see) then somest deceive the poore bealts, when they seeme to do nothing lesse than to hunt, making semblance as though they either travelled like waysaring men, or tended their slocks, or else tilled the ground. Semblably staterers touch those whom they statter, neerest and enter to the verie quickeby praising, when they make no shew thereof, but seeme to do nothing lesse than praise.

For he that giveth the chaire and feat to another comming in place, or as he is making an oration either in publike place before the people, or in Councell house to the Senate, breaketh off his owne speech, and yeeldeth unto him his roome, giving him leave to speake or to opine, and remaineth filent himselse: by this his silence sheweth, that he doth repute the other a better man, and of more fufficiencie for wifedome and knowledge than himfelfe, much more than if he should pronounce and ring it out aloude to the whole audience. And hereupon it is that this fort of people who make profession of flatterie, take up ordinarily the first and highest seats, aswell at sermons and publike orations whither men flocke to heare, as at the Theaters and shewen places, not that they thinke themselves worthie of such places, but because they may rise and make roome for better & richer persons as they come, and thereby flatter them kindly. This 10 we see also, that in solemne assemblies and great meetings or auditories, they are by their good wils the first that put themselves forth, and make offer to begin speech; but it is for nothing else, but that afterward they would feeme to quit the place and give affent to their betters, foone retracting their owne opinions, when they heare a mightie man, a rich or noble personage in authoritie to contradict and say the contrarie. And here we ought most of all to be circumspect and warie, that we may evict them of this, That all this courting, this giving place, this yeelding of the victorie and reverence made unto others, is not for any more sufficiencie that they acknowledge in them, for their knowledge, experience and vertues; ne yet for their worthinesse *Plinie repor- in regard of elder age, but only for their wealth, riches, credit, and reputation in the world. *Meteth this of K. gaby fus a great Lord belonging to the kings court of Persia, came upon a time to visit Apelles 20 not of Mega- the painter : and fitting by him in his shop to see him worke, began of his owne accord to discourse I wot not what, of lines, shadowes and other matters belonging to his art: Apelles hearing him, could not hold but faid unto him; See you not fir thefelitle prentife boies here that grinde Oker and other colours? So long as you face still and faid never a word, they advised you well and their eie was never off, wondering to fee your rich purple robes, your chaines and jewels of gold, no fooner began you to speake, but they fell to teighing, and now they laugh you to skorne, talking thus as you doe of those things which you never learned. And solon being demaunded once by Crafus King of Lydia, what men he had seene whom he reputed most happic in this world? named unto him one Tellus, none of the great men of Athens, but a good plaine and meane citizen, Cleobis also and Biton: and these he said were of all others most fortu- 30 nate. But these flatterers will affirme that Kings and Princes, rich men and rulers, are not onely bleffed, happie and fortunate; but also excell all others in wisedome, knowledge and vertue. There is not one of them that can endure fo much as to heare the Stoicks, who hold, that the fage and wife man (fuch a one as they depaint unto us) ought all at once to be called, rich, faire, noble, yea and a king: whereas our flatterers will have the rich man onely, whom they are disposed to flatter, to be an Oratour and a Poet; yea and if he will himselfe, a painter, a good piper, passing light of foote and strong of limmes; infomuch, as who foever wrestleth with him, shall be sure to take the foile and lye along; and whomsoever he runneth with in the race, he shall come behinde him a faire deale, but how? Surely even as Criffon the Himeraan lagged for the nonce behind King Alexander the Great, when he ran with him for the best game: for which 40 the King was highly displeased & wroth at him, when he once perceved it. Carneades was woont to fay, that the fons of Kings and great rich men, learned to do nothing well and right, but onely to fit and ride an horse. For that their masters are woont to flatter and praise them in all their schooles where they be taught: for if they be at the exercise of wrestling, you shall have him that wreftleth with them, of purpose to take a fall and lie under them: Marie, the horse not knowing nor having the reason to discerne a private mans some from a prince; nor whether he be poore or rich that fits upon his backe, will be fure to cast him over his head and lay him along who foever he be, that cannot skill how to hold and rule him. Bion therefore was but a verie lob and foole in faying thus: If I wish that with praising a peece of ground I could make it good, rich and fertile, it should want for no praises; and rather would I commend it than toile and so moile in digging, tilling, & doing worke about it. And yet I will not fay, that a man is too blame and doth amisse in praising: if so be, that those who are praised be the better and more fruitfull in all good things for it. Howbeit to come againe into the ground before faid; a field being praised never so much is not the worse nor lesse sertile therefore: but I assure you they that commend folke falfely, and beyond their defert and due, puffe them full of winde and vanitie, and worke their overthrow in the end. But now having discoursed sufficiently upon this article and point of praises, let us proceed forward to treat of franknes and libertie of speech.

And verily meete and reason it had beene, that as Patroelau when he put on the armour of Achilles, and brought forth his horses of service to battell, durst not meddle with his speare Pelias, but left it onely untouched; fo a flatterer alfo, although he maske and difguise himselse withother habits, ornaments and enlignes of a friend, should let this libertic onely of speech alone, and not once go about to touch or counterfeit it, as being indeed

Moston of Such poise and weight

So big withall so stiffe and streight, shot of all others it belongeth onely to friend hip for to be caried and welded by it. But for as much, as our flatterers now a daies are afraid to be detected in laughing in their cups, in their to jetts, scoffes, and gamefornemirth, therefore to avoide such discovery, they have learned for footh to knit and bend the browes, they can skill iwis, to flatter, and yet looke with a frowning face and crabbed countenance, they have the cast to temper with their glavering gloses some rough reprehensions, and chiding checks among: let us not overpasse this point untouched, but consider and examine the same likewise. For mine owne part I am of this minde; That as in a Comedie of Menander, there comes in a counterfeit Hercules to play his part upon the stage with a club on his shoulder, that is (you may bee sure) nothing massie, heavie, stiffe and strong, but some device and gawd, hollow and emptie within, made of browne paper or such like stuffe; Even so, that plaine and free speech which a flatterer useth, will bee found light, foft, and without any strength at all to give a blow: much like (to fav truly) unto the foft 20 bed pillowes that women lie on, which feeming full and plumpe to refift and beare out against their heads, yeeld and finke under the fame fo much the more: For after the fame maner, this counterfeit free speech of theirs puffed up full of winde, or else stuffed with some deceitfull light matter, feemeth to rife up, to swell, and beare out hard & stiffe, to the end that being preffed downe once (and both fides as it were comming together) it might receive; enlap and enfold him that chaunceth to fall thereupon, and so carie him away with it. Whereas the true and friendly libertie of speech indeed, taketh hold of those that are delinquent and do offend, bringing with it a kinde of paine for the time, which notwithstanding is holsome and healthfull: refembling heerein the nature of honie, which being applied to a fore or ulcerous place, at the first doth smart and sling; but it doth clense and mundifie withall, and otherwise is profitable, 30 sweete and pleasant. But as touching this plaine dealing and franke speech, I will write a part of purpose in place convenient. As for the flatterer he maketh shew at the first, that he is rough, violent, and inexorable in all dealings with others: For over his servants he carieth a hard hand, and is not pleased with their service, with his familiars, acquaintance and kinsfolke he is sharpe and eager, ready to finde fault with every thing; he maketh no reckoning nor account of any man but himselse; he despiseth and disdaineth all the world besides; there is not a man living that he will pardon and forgive; he blameth and accuse the every one; and his whole studie is to win the name & reputation of a man that hateth vice, & in that regard careth not whom he doth provoke, and whose displeasure he incur: as who, for no good in the world would he hired to hold his toting, nor willingly forbeare to fpeake plainly the truth; who with his good will would 40 never speake or do any thing to sooth up and please another: Then will he make semblance as though he neither faw nor tooke knowledge of any great and groffe finnes indeed: but if peradventure there be some light and small outward faults, he will make soule a doo thereat, he will keepe a woondring and crying out upon them: then shall you have him in good earnest exclaime and reproove the delinquent with a loud and founding voice: As for example, if hee chance to espie the implements or any thing esseabout the house lie out of order; if a man be not well and neately lodged; if his beard be not of the right cut, or his haire grow out of fa-Thion; if a garment fit not handfomly about him, or if a horse or hound be not so carefully tended as they should be. But say that a man set nought by his parents, neglect his owne children, miluse his wife, disdaine and despise his kinred, spend and consume his goods; none of all 50 these enormities touch and moove him: Heere he is mute and hath not a word to fay; he dares not reprove these abuses: much like as if a Master of the wrestling schoole, who suffreth a wrestler that is under his hand to be a drunkard and a whooremonger, should chide and rebuke him sharpely about an oile cruse or curry-combe; or as if a Grammarian should finde fault with his scholar and chide him for his writing tables or his pen, letting him goe away cleere with folæcismes, incongruities and barbarismes, as if he heard them not. Also I can liken a flatteter to him, who will not blame an ill authour, or ridiculous Rhetorician in any thing as touching his oration it felfe; but rather reprooveth him for his utterance, and sharpely taketh him up for that by drinking of cold water he hath hurthis winde-pipe, and fo marred his voice; or to one who being bidden to reade over and perufe a poore feely Epigram or other writing that is nothing woorth, taketh on and fareth against the paper wherein it is written, for being thicke, course or rugged; or against the writer, for negligent, flovenly or impure otherwise. Thus the claw-backs and flatterers about king Prolomato, who would feeme to love good letters, and to be desirous of learning, used ordinarily to draw out their disputations and conferences at length, even to midnight, debating about some glosse or signification of a word, about a verse, or touching fome historie: but all the while there was not one among fo many of them; they munder-would tell him of his crueltie, of his wrongs and oppressions; ne yet of his hidranning; tame in the son cex-bouring, and other enormious indignities, under the colour of religion; and steke to reforme pound it, beat him. Certes a foolith fellow were he, who comming to a man difeated with tumors, fwellings, impostumes, or hollow ulcers, called Fistulaes, should with a Chirurgians launcet, or Barbers endgels, and rufor, fall to cut his haires, or pare his nailes; even fo it fareth with these flatterers; who applie oppositing the their libertie of speech to such things, as neither are in paine, nor yet do any hurt. Moreover, fome others there bee of them, who being more cunning and craftic then their fellowes, and use this plainnesse of language and reprehension of theirs, for to please and make sport withall. Thus Agis the Argive, feeing how Alexander the great, gave very great rewards and gifts to a certaine pleafant and odde fellow that was a jefter, cried out for verie envie and dolour of heart; O great abuse and monstrous absurditie: The King hearing it, turned about unto him in great displeasure and indignation, demaunding of him what he had to say? I confesse (quoth se) indeed, that I am grieved, and I thinke it a great indignitie, when I see all you that are descended from Impiter and his fonnes, to take pleasure in flatterers and jesters about you, for to make you merric. For even fo Hercules tooke adelight to have in his company certaine ridiculous Cecropes, and Bacchus had ever in his traine the Silenes. In your court likewife, a man may fee fuch to be in credite and highly efteemed. When Tiberius Cafar the Emperor upon a certeine day was come into the Senate house of Rome, one of the Senators who knew how to flatter, arose and stood up, and with a good loud voice; Meete it is (quoth he) ô Cafar that men free borne, should likewife have the libertie of speech, and speake their minds frankly, without diffimuling or concealing any thing which they know to be good and profitable: with this speech of his, he stirred up the attention of the whole house, so as they gave 30 good care unto him, and Tyberius himselfe listened what he would say. Now when all was still and in great filence; Hearken (quoth he) ô Cafar, what it is that we all accuse and blame you for, but no man dare be so bolde as to speake it out : You neglect your selfe, and have no regard of your owne person; you consume and spoile your body with continual cares and travels for our fake, taking no rest nor repose either day or night. Now when he had drawen out a long traine of words to this purpose, Cassus Severus a Rhetorician, stood up, and by report said thus; Such libertic of speech as this, will be the utter undoing of this man. But these flatteries are of the lighter fort, and doe leffe hurt: there be other more dangerous, which worke the mischiefe and corruption of those who are not wife, and take no heed unto them; namely, when flatterers set in hand to reproove them whom they flatter, for the contrary vices to those that be in them. 40 Thus Himerius the flatterer reproched a certaine rich man of Athens, the veriest pinching inifer and the most covetous withall, that was in the whole city, with the imputations of prodigality, and negligence about his owne profit and gaine; charging him that one day he would fmart for it, and both he and his children be hunger-sterved for want wherwith to susteine themfelves, if he looked no better to his thrift: or when they object miferable niggardife and beggerie, unto those that are knowen to be prodigall spenders, and consume all. After which maner, Titus Petronius reprooved Nero. Againe, if they come to princes and great lords, who deale cruelly and hardly with their subjects and tenants, faying unto them. That they must lay away this overmuch lenity and foolish pitty of theirs, which neither is seemely for their persons, nor yet profitable for their state. And very like to these, is he who maketh semblance to him who is 50 avery senselesse for and soolish soole, that he stands in great seare and doubt of him, lest hee should be circumvented by him, as if he were some cautelous, crafty and comping person. He alfo, that doth rebuke another, who is an ordinary flanderer, who taketh pleafure (upon fpight and envie) to be ever railing on all men, and backe-biting them, if hee chance any one time to breake out into the praise of some woorthy and excellent personage, saying in this maner unto him; This is a greatfault that you have, and a disease that followeth you, thus to praise men of no woorth: What is he (I pray you) whom you thus commend? what good parts be in him?

hath he at any time done any doughty deed, or delivered any fingular speech that might deserve fuch praises? But in amatorious and love matters they passe: there you shall have them most of all to come over those whom they flatter and lay on load; to them they will joine close, and fet them on a flaming fire. For if they fee brethren at some variance, or setting nought by their parents, or els to deale unkindly with their owne wives, and to fet no store by them, or to be icalous and fuspicious of them; they never admonish, chastice or rebuke them for it, that they may amend; but rather they will kindle more coales betweene, and encrease their anger and discontentment on both sides: Nay, it is no great matter (will they say,) it is even well enough; you will never fee and know who you are you are the cause of all this your owne selfe; and selfe do, felfe have; you evermore have borne your felves so pliable, submisse and lowly toward them, that you are but rightly ferved. But fay there be some itching heat of love, or smart anger upon jealoufit, in regard of a courtifan or married wife, whom the party is amourous of; then shall you see a flatterer ready at hand to display his cunning openly, and to speake his minde freely unto him, putting fire to fire and feeding his love; you thall have him to lay the law upon this lover, accusing and entring processe against him in these termes: You have broken the lawes of love; you have done and faid many things not fo kindly as beformed a true louer, but rather dealt hardly with your love, and enough to lofe her heart, and incurre her hatred for euer;

> Vnthankefull person that thou art. For kisses so many of thy sweet hart.

Thus the flattering friends of Antoniu, when he burned in love of the Aegyptian queene Cleopatra, would perfivade and make him beleeve, that the it was who was enamoured upon him, and by way of opprobrious imputation they would tell him to his face, that he was proud, difdirally hard hearted, and void of all kinde affection. This noble queene (would they fay) for faking fo mighty and wealthy a kingdome, so many pleasant palaces, and stately houses of blessed abode, such meanes and opportunities of happinesse, for the love of you pineth away, and consume therselfe, trudging after your campe to and fro, for to doe your Honour content and pleasure with the habit and title of your Concubine, Whiles you in brest do eary an hart Which will not be wrought by any art.

30 neglecting her (good lady) and fuffering her to perish for sorow and hearts griefe. Whereupon he being well enough pleafed to heare himfelfe thus charged with wrong doing to her, and taking more pleasure in these accusations of theirs, than if they had directly praised him, was so blinde that he could not fee how they that feemed thus to admonish him of his duetie, perverted and corrupted him thereby so much the more. For this counterfeit liberty of plaine dealing and plaine speech, may be very well likened to the wanton pinches and bitings of luxurious women, who tickle and ftirre up the lust and pleasure of men by that which might seeme to cause their paine. For like as pure wine, which otherwise of it selse is a fure remedy against the poifon of hemlocke, if a man doe mingle it with the juice of the faid hemlocke, doth mightily enforce the poison thereof, and make it irremediable, for that by meanes of the heat it conveieth 40 the fame more speedily unto the heart; even so these lewd and mischievous slatterers, knowing full wel that franke speech is a singular helpe and remedy against flattery, abuse it to flatter withall. And therefore it seemeth that Bias answered not so well as he might have done, to one that asked of him, which was the shrewdest and most hurtfull beast of all other: If (quoth he) your question be of wilde and savage, a Tyrant is worse; if of tame and gentle, a Flatterer. For hec might have faid more truely; that of Flatterers some be of a tame kinde, such (I meane) as these paralites are who haunts the baines and ftouphes; those also that follow good cheere and keepe about the table. As for him, who (like as the Pourcuttle fish stretcheth out his clawes like branches) reacheth as farte as to the secretchambers and cabinets of women, with his busic intermedling, with his calumniations and malicious demeanors, such a one is savage, fell, intractable 50 and dangerous to be approched.

Now one of the meanes to beware of this flatterie, is to know and remember alwaies, that our foule confilteth of two parts, whereof the one is addicted to the truth, loving honeftie and reason; the other more brutility, of the owne nature unreasonable, given to untruth and withall passionate. A true friend assisted the vermore the better part, in giving counsell and comort, even as an expert and skilfull Physition, who hath ancie that aimeth alwaies at the maintenance and encrease of health; but the flatterer doth apply himselse, and settleth to that part which is voide of reason and full of passions: this he scratcheth, this he tickleth continually, this he stroketh and handleth in such fort, by devising some vicious and dishonest pleasures, that he withdraweth and turneth it away quite from the rule and guidance of reason. Moreover, as there be some kind of viands, which if a man eate, they neither turne unto blood, nor ingender spirits, ne yet adde vigor and strength to the nerves and the marrow; but all the good they do is haply to cause the flesh or genitall parts to rise, to stirre and loose the belly, or to breed some foggie, fantom and halfe rotten flesh, which is neither fast nor found within; even so, if a man looke necrely and have good regard unto a flatteror, he shall never finde that all the words he useth, minister or procure one jot of good to him that is wife and governed by reason; but feed sooles with the pleafant delights of love; kindle and augment the fire of inconfiderate anger; provoke them unto envie; breed in them an odious and vaine prefumption of their owne wit; increase 10 their forrow and griefe, with moaning them and lamenting with them for companie; feton worke and exasperate their inbred naughtinesse and lewed disposition; their illiberall minde and covetous nature; their diffidence and distrustfulnesse of others; their base and servile timiditie, making them alwaies worfe, and apt to conceive ill; more fearefull; jealous and suspicious, by the meanes of fome new accusations, false furmises and conjecturall suggestions, which they be ready to put into their heads. For evermore it getteth closely into some vicious passion and affection of the minde, and there lurketh; the fame it nouriffeth and feedeth fat, but anon it appeereth like a botch, rifing eftfoones upon the corrupt, difeafed or inflamed parts of the foule. Arythou angrie with one? punish him (faith he:) Hast thou a minde to a thing & buy it, and make no more adoc: Art thou never fo little afraid? let us flie and be gon: Sufpe creft thou this 20 or that? believe it confidently (faith he.) But if peradventure, he can hardly be feene and discovered about these passions, for that they be so mightie and violent, that oftentimes they chase and expell all use of reason, he will give some vantage to be sooner taken in others that be not fo ftrong and vehement, where we shall find him alwaies the same and like himselfe. For say, a man do suspect that he hath taken a surfeit, either by over liberall feeding or drinking headie wine, and upon that occasion make some doubt to bathe his bodie, or to eate presently againe and lay gorge upon gorge (as they fay:) A true friend wil advice him to forbeare & abstaine; he will admonifh him to take heed to himfelfe and looke to his health: In comes a flatterer, and he will draw him to the baine in all halte; he will bid him to call for some noveltie or other to be fer upon the boord, willing him to fall fresh to it againe, and not to punish his body and do himfelfe injurie, by falting and refusing his meate and drinke: Also if he see him not disposed to take a journey by land or voyage by tea, or to go about any enterprise whatsoever it be, slowly and with an ill will, he will fay unto him; either that there is no fuch great need, or the time is not fo convenient, but it may be put off to a farther daie, or it will ferve the turne well enough to fend others about it. Now if it fall out fo, that he having made promife to fome familiar friend, either to lend or let him have the use of some money, or to give him it freely, do change his minde and repent of his promife; but yet be somewhat abashed and ashamed thus to breake his word; the flatterer by and by will put himfelfe to the worfe and lighter end of the ballance. and make it weigh downe on the purse side, soone excluding and cutting off all shame for the matter: What man! (will be fay) Spare your purse and save your silver; you are at a great 40 charge; you keepe a great house, and have many about you which must be maintained and have fufficient; in such fort, that if we be not altogether ignorant of our felves, and wilfully blinde, not feeing that we be coverous, fhameleffe, timorous and bafe minded, we cannot choose but flart and finde out a flatterer; neither is it possible that he should escape us. For surely he will evermore defend and maintaine these impersections, and frankly will be speake his minde in favour thereof, if he perceive us to over passe our selves therein. But thus much may suffice as touching these matters.

Let us come now to the uses and services that a flatterer is employed in: For in such offices he doth confound, trouble, and darken much the difference betweene him and a true friend; shewing himselfe in apparence, alwaies diligent, ready and prompt in all occurrences, without 50 feeking any colourable pretenses of shifting off, and a resulting to do any thing As for a faithfull friend, his whole carriage and behaviour is simple, like as be the words of truth, as faith Eurypides, without wells and gards, plaine without plaits, and nothing counterfeit: whereas the conditions of a flatterer to say a truth,

By nature are difeafed much,

And medicines needfull are for fuch, not only with wildome to be ministred and applied, but also many in number, and those (I affire vou) of a more exquisite making and composition than any other. And verily as friends many times when they meet one another in the street, passe by without good-morrow or god speed, or any word at all betweene them; onely by fome lightfome looke, cheerefull fmile, or amiable regard of the eie reciprocally given and taken, without any other token els, there is tellified the good-will and mutuall affection of the heart within : whereas the flatterer runneth toward his friend to meet him, followeth apace at his heeles, fpreadeth foorth both his armes abroad, and that afarre off, to embrace him: and if it chance that he be faluted and spoken to first, because the other had an eie on him before, he will with brave words excuse himselfe, yea, and many times call for witneffes, and bind it with great oathes good store, that he saw him not. Even so likewise 10 in their affaires and negociations abroad in the world, friends omit and overflip many fmall and light things, not fearthing narrowly into matters, not offering or expecting againe any exquiquisit service; nothing curious and busie in ech thing, ne yet putting themselves forward to everie kinde of ministerie: but the flatterer is herein double diligent, he will be continually emploied and never rest, without seeming at any time to be weary, no place, no space nor opportunity will he give the other to do any service; he looketh to be called unto and commanded; and if he be not bidden, he will take it ill and be displeased; nay you shall have him then out of heart and discouraged, complaining of his ill fortune, and protesting before God and man, as if he had fome great wrong done unto him. These be evident marks and undoubted arguments to such as have wit and understanding, not of a friendship found, sober & honest, but rather smelling of 20 wanton and whorish love, which is more ready to embrace and clip, than is decent and seemely. Howbeit, to examine the fame more particularly, let us confider what difference there is betweene a flatterer and a friend, as touching the offers and promifes that they make. They who have written of this theame before us, say very well, that a friends promite goeth in this forme,

If that I can, or if it may be done, Fulfil I will your minde, and that right foone. but the offer of a flatterer runneth in this maner, What would you have? fay but the word to me,

Without all doubt, effected it shall be.

For such franke promisers and braggers as these, the Poets also use to bring unto the Stage in 30 their Comedies, after this sort;

Now of all loves, Nicomachus, this I crave, Set me against this souldier here so brave, I will so swinge his cost, you shall it see, I hat like a pompion his sless shall tender be: His sace, his head I shall much softer make, Than is the spunge that growes in sea or lake.

Moreover, you shall not see a friend offer his helping hand or aide in any action, unlesse he were called before to counsell, and his opinion asked of the enterprise, or that he have approoved and set downe the same upon good advisement, to be either honest or profitable: whereas as the flatterer, if a man should do him so much credit, as to require his consent and approbation, or otherwise request him to deliver his opinion of the thing, he, not onely upon a desire to yeeld unto others and to gratific them; but also for seare to give any suspicion that he would seem to draw backe and avoid to set his hand to any worke or businesse whatsoever, is readie with the formost to applie himselse to the appetite and inclination of another, yea and withall, pricketh and inciteth him sorward to enter upon it. And yet lightly you shall find even of rich men and kings, but sew or none who can or will come forth with these words;

Would God some one that needy is and poore, Tea, woorse than be that begs from doore to doore, Would come to me (so that he were my friend) Without all feare, and speake to me his mind.

But now adaies it is farre otherwise; for they are much like unto composers of Tragedies, who will be provided of a quire or dance of their friends to sing with them, or desire to have a Theatre of purpose to give applause and clap their hands unto them. And verily whereas Merope in a certeine Tragedie giveth these sage and wise advertisements;

Take those for friends, I reed, and holde them so, Whose speech is sound, and waves not to and fro: But those that please thy minde in word and deed,

Count leved, and such locke forth of doore with speed.

Our Potentates and Grand Seigneurs doe cleane contrary; for fuch as will not follow their humors, and foothe them up at every word, but gain-fay their courses, in making remonstrance of that which is more profitable and expedient; such they disdaine and will not vouchsafe them a good looke. But for those wicked wretches, base minded varlets, and coosening impostors, who can curry favor, they not onely fet their doores wide open for fuch, and receive them into their honses, but they admit them also to conferences with their inward affections and the very secrets of their heart. Among whom you shall have one more plaine perhaps and simple than the rest, who will say, that it is not for him, neither is he woorthy to deliberate and consult of so great affaires; mary he could be content, and would take upon him, to be a poore fervitour and 10 minister, to execute whatsoever were concluded and enjoined him to doe: another more craftie and cunning than his fellowes, is willing enough to be used in counsell, where he will heare all doubts and perils that be cast; his eie-browes shall speake if they will, his head and eies shall nod and make figures, but his tongue shall not speake a word: Say that the partie whom he mindeth to flatter, do utter his minde and what he thinketh good to do: then will he crie out aloud and fay, By Hercules I sweare, it was at my tongues end to have faid as much, had you not prevented me and taken the word out of my mouth, I would have given you the veriefame counsell. For like as the Mathematicians do affirme, that the superficial and outward extremities, the limmes also of the Mathematicall bodies, doe of themselves and in their owne nature, neither bend nor firetch, ne yet moove at all: for that they be intellectuall onely or imaginatie, and not corporal, 20 but according as the bodies do bow, reach or stirre, so do they; so you shall ever finde that a statterer, will pronounce, opine, thinke and be mooved to anger, according as he feeth another before him. And therefore in this kind, most easie it is to observe the difference between a flatterer and a friend. But yet more evident you shall see it in the manner of doing service. For the offices and kindneffes which come from a friend, are ever best, and (as living creatures) have their most proper vertues inwardly, carrying least in shew, and having no outward oftentation of glorious poince. And as it falleth out many times a Physitian cureth his patient, and saieth little or nothing at all unto him, but doth the deed ere he be aware; even fo, a good friend whether hebe present or departed from his friend, doth him good still, and taketh care for him when he full little knoweth of it. Such a one was Arcefilant the Philosopher, who befide many o-30 ther kind parts which he shewed unto his friend Apelles, the painter of Chios, comming one day to visite him when he was sicke, & perceiving how poore he was, went his way for that time : and when he returned againe, brought twentie good drachmes with him: and then fitting clofe unto Apelles by his beds fide: Here is nothing here (quoth he) I fee well, but these foure bare Elements that Empedocles writeth of,

Hot Fire cold Water, freere and foft: Grosse Earth, pure Aire that spreads aloft.

But me thinkes you lie not at your case; and with that he remooved the pillow or bolfter under his head, and so conveighed underneath it privily, the small pieces of coine aforesaid. The old woman his nourfe and keeper, when the made the bed, found this money: whereat the marvel-40 led not a little, and told Apelles thereof, who laughing thereat: This is (quoth he) one of Arcefiland his theevish easts. And for that it is a Maxime in Philosophie, that children are borne like their parents, one Lacydes a schollar of Arcesilans aforesaid, being affistant with many others to afriend of his named Cephifocrates, when he came to his triall in a case of treason against the State: in pleading of which cause, the accuser his adversarie called for Cephisocrates his ring, a pregnant evidence that made against him, which he had cleanly slipped from his finger & let it fall to the ground; whereof the faid Lacydes being advised, fet his foote presently over it, and so kept it out of fight: for that the maine proofe of the matter in question lay upon that ring. Now after fentence passed on Cephisocrates his side, and that he was cleerely acquit of the crime, he went privately to everie one of the judges for to give them thanks: One of them who (as it 50 should seeme) had seene what was done, willed him to thanke Lacydes: and with that told how the case stood, and how it went with him as it did: but all this while Lacydes himselfe had not faid a word to any creature. Thus I thinke verily, that the gods themselves doe bestow many benefits and favours upon men fecretly, and whereof they be not aware; being of this nature to take joy and pleafure in bountifulneffe and doing good. Contrariwife, the office that a flatterer feemeth to performe, hath nothing in it that is just, nothing true, nothing simple, nothing liberall: onely you shall see him sweat at it; you shall have him runne up and downe; keepe a loude crying & a great ado, and fet his countenance upon the matter, fo as that he maketh right good femblance & thew that he doth especiall service, taketh much care & paines about his business & maketh half to dispatch it: and much like are all his doings to a curious picture, which with ftrange colours, with broken plaits, wrinkles and angles, affecteth and ftriveth (as it were) to fnew fome lively refemblance. Moreover, much ado he maketh, & is troublefome in telling how he went to and fro, wandring here and there about the matter; also what a deale of care he tooke therein; how he incurred the evill wil & displeasure of others; and a thousand hinderances, troubles & dangers, as befides he reckoneth up; infomuch as a man that heareth, would fay; All that ever he did was not worth fo much as the twittle twattle that he maketh. For furely a good turne to that is upbraided in that wife, becometh burthenfome, odious, & not thankfully accepted, but intollerable. In all the offices & fervices of a flatterer, you shall find these upbraidings and shamefull reports, that would make one blufh to heare them, and those not onely after the deed done, but at the verie instant when he is about it. But in steed hereof, a true friend, if it fall out so, that he be forced and urged to relate what is done, maketh a plaine report and narration in modest manner; but of himselse he will neuer say word. After which fort did the Lacedæmonians in timespaft, when they had fent come unto the Smyrnæans, which, in their extreme necessitie they craved at their hands: For at what time as the men of Smyrna magnified, and wonderfully extolled this liberalitie of theirs, they returned this answere againe: This is not so great a matter that it should deferve so highly to be praised or wondered at: for (say they) gathered we have 20 thus much, and made this supply of your necessities, onely by cutting our selves and our labouring beafts (hort of one daies pittance and allowance. Bountie in this wife performed, is not onely gentleman-like and liberall indeed, but also more welcome and acceptable to the receivers; in as much as they thinke it was no great damage, nor much out of their way that did it. Furthermore, not onely this odious faithion of doing any fervice with fuch paine and trouble, or the readinesse to make offer and promise so quickly, doth principally bewray the nature of a flatterer: but herein also much more he may be discovered: for that a friend is willingly employed in honest causes: but a flatterer in shameful and dishonest: as also in the divers ends that they purpose; for the one seeketh to profit his friend, the other to please onely a friend; as Gorgias was woont to fay, will never require that his friend should do him a pleasure, but in just 30 things onely: whiles a flatterer ferveth his turne in many things that are unjust: For why?

To do good deeds friends should be joint,

But not to sinne in any point. whereas he should endevour to avert and withdraw him from that which is not decent, or seemly: Now if it happen that the other will not be perswaded by him, then were it not amisse to say unto him, as Antipater once answered Phocion; You cannot have me to be a friend and flatterer too (that is to fay) a friend, and no friend. For one friend is to frand to another, and to affift him in doing, and not in mildoing, in confulting, and not in completting and conspiring, in bearing witnesse with him of the truth, and not in circumventing any one by falshood, yea and to take part with him in fuffring calamitie, and not to beare him company in doing injurie: For 40 fay that we may chance to be privie unto some shamefull and reprochfull deeds of our friend; yet we ought not to be partie unto them therein, nor willing to aide them in any undecent action. For like as the Lacedemonians being defaited in battell by king Untipater, and treating with him about the capitulations and articles of peace, made request unto him, That he would impose upon them what conditions he would himselfe, were they never so chargeable and disadvantageous unto them, but in no wife enjoine them to do any shamefull indignitie; even so a faithfull friend ought to be so disposed, that if his friends occasions do require any matter of expence, danger, or travaile, he shew himselfe at the first call and holding up of his singer, ready to come, and cheerefully to take his part and undergo the same, without any shifting off, or allegation of any excuse whatsoever:mary, if there be never so little shame or dishonor that may 50 accrew thereby, he shall then refuse and pray him to hold him excused; he shall request pardon and defire to have leave for to be difiniffed and depart in peace. The flatterer is quite contrary; for in painfull, difficult and dangerous affaires, which require his helpe and affiftance, he draweth backe, and is ready to plucke his necke out of the collar: if (I fay) in this case you seeme for triall fake to knocke (as it were upon a pot) to fee whether he be right, he will not ring cleere; but you shall see by the dead found of his pretended and forged excuses, that he is full of cracks and flawes: contrariwife, in dishonest, vile, base and shamefull ministeries, I am for you (will he fay) I am yours to command; doe with me what you will, tread me under your foot, abuse me at your pleafure: to be fhort, he will thinke nothing to be an ignominious indignity unto him. See you not the ape? good he is not to keepe the house and to give warning of thieues, as dogs do; cary upon his backe any burdens he can not, like the horse; neither yet is he sit to draw or to plough the ground, as the oxedoth; and therefore he beareth all kinde of abuse and misusing, all wrongs, all unhappy sports and trickes that can be devised, serving onely as an instrument of mockerie, and a meere laughing stocke. Even so it fareth with a flatterer, being not meet to plead at the barre for a friend, to affift him in counfell, to lay his hand to his purse and supply his wants that way, nor to fight as his champion in maintenance of his quarrell, as one that can away with no labour, no paines taking, or ferious emploiment; and in one word, fit for nothing, that good is: mary in such affaires as may be done under the arme, that is to say, which be close to fecret and filthy fervices, he is the forwardeft man in the world, and maketh no excuses. A truftie currier he is betweene, in love matters, in finding favour with a bawd and bringing a wench or harlot to your bedde, he is excellent, and hath a marvellous gift; to make the shot, and cleare the recknoning of any fumptuous feast or banket hee is ready and perfect; in providing for a great dinner or fupper, and fetting the fame foorth accordingly, he is nothing flow, but nimble enough. To give enterteinment unto concubines he is very handsome, obsequious and serviceable; if one bid him to speake audaciously and malapertly against a father in law, a guardian, tutour, or any fuch, or to put away his true espoused wife, like as he seeth his good malter do before him, he is without all shame & mercy: so that even heerein also it is no hard matter to fee what kinde of man he is, and how much he different from a true friend: For com-20 maund him to commit what villanie and wickedneffe you will, ready he is to execute the fame, and so he may gratific and pleasure you that set him on worke, he careth not to do any injurie to

There is moreover another meanes not of the least consequence, whereby a man may know how much a flatterer differeth from a friend indeed, namely, by his disposition and behaviour towards his other friends: for a true friend sindeth contentment in nothing so much as to love many, and likewise to be loved of many; and herein he laboureth especially with his friend to procure himselse many others to love and honor him: for being of this opinion, that among good friends all things are common, he thinketh that nothing ought to be more common than friends themselves. But the supposed, false and counterfeit friend, being privit to his owne conscience, that he doth great injurie to true amitie and friendship, which he doth corrupt in manner of a base piece of money: as he is by nature envious, so he exercises that envie of his, upon such as be like himselfe, striving with a kinde of emulation to surpasse that envie of his, upon such as be like himselfe, striving with a kinde of emulation to surpasse that himselfe, he trembleth and is afraid, and in truth darenot come neere nor shew his face to such an one, no more (I assure you) than a footman to go and keepe pace (according to the Proverb) with a Lydian chariot, or rather (as Simonides faith, Laidto fine goldsried cleane from droffe, He hathnot so much as lead so groffe.

Being compared with true, found and grave friendship, which (as they fay) will endure the ham-40 mer, he cannot choose but finde himselse to be but light, falsified and deceitfull: seeing then that he must needs be detected and knowen, for such an one as he is, what doth he thinke you? Surely he plaieth like an unskilfull painter, who had painted certaine cockes, but verie badly: For like as he gave commandement to his boy for to keepe away naturall and living cockes in deed, farre ynough off from his pictures; so a flatterer will doe what he can to chase away true friends, and not luffer them to approch neere; or if he be not able fo to do, than openly and in publike place, he will feeme to currie favour with them, to honor and admire them, as farre better than himfelfe: but fecretly, underhand, and behinde their backs, he will not let to raife fome privie calumniations, & fowe flanderous reports tending to their discredit: but if he see that by fuch privie girds and pinches which will fret and gall the fore, he cannot at the first bring his 50 purpose about: yet hee remembreth full well and observeth the saying of Medius. This Medius was the chiefe captaine of the troupe, or the master rather of the quire (if I may so fay) of all those flatterers that used the court of king Alexander the great, & came about his perfon; the principall Sophister also that opposed himselfe and banded against all good men, and never rested to slander and backbite them: This rule and lesson he taught his scholars and quirifters that were under his hand, To cast out flanders boldly, and not to spare, therewith to bite others: For (quoth he) although the fore may heale up againe, yet the scarre will remaine and be ever feene. By these cicatrices and scarres of falle imputations, or (to speake more properly and truly) by fuch gangrenes and cankerous ulcers as thefe, Alexander the king being corroded and eaten, did to death Calisthenes, Parmenion, and Philotas, his fast & faithfull triends: but to fuch as Agnon, Bagoas, Agefias and Demetrius were, he abandoned and gave himtelfe wholy to be supplanted and overthrowen at their pleasure, whiles he was by them adored, adorned, arraied gorgeously with rich robes, and set out like a Barbarian image, statue or idoll. Loc what is the force and power of flatterie to win grace and favor; and namely in those, who would be reputed the mightiest monarches and greatest potentates of the world, it beareth most sway: For fuch are perswaded, and desirous also, that the best things should be in themselves; and this 10 is it, that giveth both credite and also boldnesse unto a flatterer. True it is I must confesse, that the highest places and forts situate upon the loftiest mounts, are least accessible and most hard to be gained by those who would surprise and force them; but where there is an high spirit and haughtic minde by nature, not guided by the fame judgement of reason, but lifted up with the favors of fortune, or nobilitie of birth, it is the eafieft matter in the world even for most base and vile persons to conquer such, and the avennes to them lie ready and open, to give the vantage of eafiest entrance. And therefore as in the beginning of this Treatife I gave warning; fo now I admonish the Readers againe in this place; That every man would labour and strive with himselfe to roote out that selfe love and overweening that they have of their owne good parts and woorthinesse: For this is it that doth flatter us within, and possesses our minds before 20 hand, whereby we are exposed and lie more open unto flatterers that are without, slinding us thus prepared already for to worke upon. But if we would aboy the god Apollo, and by acknowledging how much in all things we ought to effective that oracle of his, which commandeth us To know our felves, fearch into our owne nature, and examine withall our nouriture and education : when we finde there an infinite number of defects, and many vanities, imperfections and faults, mixed untowardly in our words, deeds, thoughts and paffions, we would not to eafily fuffer these flatterers to tread us under their feete, and make a bridge of us as they do at their pleasure. King Alexander the great was woont to say; that two things there were especially which mooved him to have leffe beleefe in them, who faluted and greeted him by the name of a God: The one was Sleepe, & the other the use of Venus: in both which he found that he was 20 worle than himfelfe, that is to fay, subject to infirmities and passions more than in any thing els: But if we would looke into our felves and ever and anon confider, how many groffe vices, troublefome paffions, imperfections and defects we have, furely we shall finde that we stood in great neede, not of a false friend to flatter us in our follies, and to praise and extoll us; but rather of one that would frankely finde fault with our doings, and reproove us in those vices that ech one privately and in particular doth commit. But very few there be among many others; who date freely and plainely speake unto their friends, but rather sooth them up and seeke to please them in every thing: And even in those, as few as they be, hardly shall you find any that know how to do it well, but for the most part they thinke that they speake freely, when they do nothing but reproove, reproch and raile. Howbeit, this libertie of speech whereof I speake, is 40 of the nature of a medicine, which if it be not given in time convenient and as it ought to be, befides, that it doth no good at all, it troubleth the body, worketh greevance, and in stead of a remedie prooveth to be a mischiese: For even so, he that doth reprehend and find fault unseafonably, bringeth foorth the like effect with paine, as a flatterer doth with pleafure. For men ate aptto receive hurt and damage, not onely by overmuch praise; but also by inordinate blame when it is out of due time: for it is the onely thing that of all others maketh them foonest to turne fide unto flatterers, and to be most easily surprised by them; namely, when from those things that stand most opposite and highest against them, they turne aside like water, and run downe those waies that be more low, easie, and hollow. In which regard it behooveth that this libertic in fault finding, be tempered with a cettaine amiable affection, and accompanied with 50 the judgement of reason, which may take away the excessive vehemencie and sorce of sharpe words, like the over-bright shining of some glittering light, & for feare lest their friends being dazeled as it were and frighted with the flashing beames of their rebukes, seeing themselves so reprooved for ech thing, and blamed every while, may take fuch a griefe and thought thereupon, that for forrow they be ready to flie unto the shadow of some flatterer, and turne toward that which will not trouble them at all. For we must avoid all vice, (ô Philopappus) and seeke to correct the fame by the meanes of vertue (& not by another vice contrary unto it) as fome do; who for to shun foolish and rusticall bashfulnesse, grow to be overbold and impudent; for to eschew rude incivilitie, fall to be ridiculous jesters and pleasants; and then they thinke to be farthest off from cowardife and effeminate tendernesse, when they come neerest to extreme audacitie and boalting braverie. Others there be, who to proove the infelves not to be superstitious, become theere Atheists; and because they would not be thought and reputed idiots and fooles, proove artificiall conny-catchers. And furely in redreffing the enormities of their maners, they do as much as those, who for want of knowledge and skill to fet a peece of wood streight that twineth and lieth crooked one way, do curbe and bend it as much another way. But the most shamefull means to avoid & flum the fulpicion of a flatterer, is to make a mans felfe odious & troublefom without profit; and a very rude and rulticall fashion this is, of feeking to win favor, and that with favour of no learning, skill, and civilitie, to become unpleafant, harfh, and fowre to a friend, for 10 to shunne that other extreame, which in friendship seemeth to be base and servile; which is as much, as if a freed flave newly franchifed, should in a Comedie thinke that he could not use and enjoy his libertie of speech, unlesse he might be allowed licenciously to accuse another without controlment. Confidering then, that it is a foule thing to fall to flatterie, in studying to please, as also for the avoiding of flatterie, by immoderate libertie of speech, to corrupt and marre, aswell the grace of amitie and winning love, as the care of remedying and reforming that which is amisse: and seeing that we ought to avoid both the one and the other: and as in all things else, fo freespeaking, is to have the perfection from a meane and mediocritie; reason would, and by order it were requifit; that toward the end of this Treatife, we should adde somewhat in maner of a corollarie and complement, as touching that point.

For a finuch as therefore we fee that this libertie of language and reprehension hath many vices following it, which doe much hurt: let us affay to take them away one after another, and begin first with blinde selfe-love and private regards: where we ought especially to take heed that we be not seene to do any thing for our owne interest, and in respect of our selves; and namely, that we feeme not, for wrong that we have received our felves, or upon any griefe of our owne, to reproch, upbraid, or revile other men: for they will never take it as done for any love or good will that we beare unto them, but rather upon some discontentment and heart-burning that we have, when they fee that our speech tendeth unto a matter wherein we are interessed our selves; neither will they repute our words spoken by way of admonition unto them, but rather interpret them as a complaint of them. For furely the libertie of speech whereof we treat, as it respe-30 cheth the welfare of our friend, foit is grave and venerable; whereas complaints favour rather of felfe-love and a base minde. Hereupon it is that we reverence, honour and admire those who for our good deliver their minds frankly unto us: contrariwife, we are fo bolde as to accuse, chalenge and charge reciprocally, yea, and contemne those that make complaints of us. Thus we reade in Homer, That Agamemnon, who could not beare and endure Achilles, when he feemed to tell him his minde after a moderate maner; but he was well enough content to abide and suffer 11/y/[es, who touched him neere, and bitterly rebuked him in this wife:

befide w, by your hand Conducted were; fo that in field you did not us command.

As sharpe a checke as this was, yet being delivered by a wise man, proceeding from a carefull minde, and tendering the good of the common weale, he gave place thereto, and kicked not againe: for this ulysts had no private matter, nor particular quarell against him, but spake frankly for the benefit of all Greece: whereas Achilles seemed to be offended and displeased with him principally, for some private matter between them twaine. And even Achilles also himselfe, although he was never knowen for to be a man of a gentle nature and of a milde spirit, endured Patroclus patiently, and gave him not a word againe, notwithstanding he taunted and tooke him up in this wife:

But rather of a stomacke full, and one who would accuse A guiltlesse person for no cause, and him full soone abuse.

Thoumercilesse and cruell wretch, fir Peleus valiant knight Was never (sure) thy father true, ne yet dame Thetis bright Thy mother kinde: but fea so greene, or rocks so steepe and hard Thee bare, (thy heart of pittle hath of small or no recard.)

For like as Hyperides the Oratour required the Athenians (who complained that his orations were bitter) to confider of him, not onely whether he were sharpe & eager simply, but whether he were so upon no cause, nor taking any see; even so, the admonition and reprehension of a friend, being fyricere and cleanfed pure from all prinate affection, ought to be reverenced: it carieth (I fay) authoritie with it, and no exceptions can well be taken, nor a man dare lift up an eie 10 against it: in such fort, as if it appeare that he who chideth freely, and blameth his friend, doeth let paffe and reject all those faults which hee hath committed against him, and maketh no mention therof, but toucheth those errours & mildemeanors only which concerne others, and they fpare him nor, but pierce & bite to the quicke: the vehemency of fuch free speech is invincible, and can not be challenged, for the mildnes & good will of the chaftifer, doth fortific the aufteritie & bitternes of the chaftifement. Well therefore it was faid in old time; That when foever we are angry, or at some jarre & variance with our friends, then most of all we ought to have an cic unto their good, and to fludy how to do fornewhat that is either profitable unto them, or honorable for them. And no leffe materiall is this also to the maintenance of friendship, if they that thinke themselves to be despised and not well regarded of their friends, do put them in mind, and 20 tell them frankly of others, who are neglected by them, and not accounted of as they should be. Thus dealt Plato with Denys, at what time he was in difgrace, and faw how he made no reckoning at all of him: For he came unto the Tyrant upon a time, and requested that he might have a day of audience and leave to conferre with him: Denys graunted his request, supposing verily that Plate had a purpose to complaine and expostulat with him in his owne behalfe, and thereupon to discourse with him at large: But Plato reasoned and debated the matter with him in this manner: Sir (quoth he) ô Denys, if you were advertised and knew that some enemic or evill willer of yours were arrived and landed in Sicilie, with a full intention to do you some difpleasure, although he had no opportunitie or meanes to execute and effect the same, would you let him faile away againe & depart from Sicily, with impunity, and before he were talked with all? 30 I tro not ô Plato (quoth Denys) but I would looke to him well enough for that: For we ought to hate & punish not the actions onely, but the verie purposes and intentions also of enemies. But how and if (quoth Plate againe) on the contrarie fide; fome other being expressely and of purpose come for meere love and affection that he beareth unto you, and fully minded to doe you fome pleasure, or to advice you for your good, you will give him neither time nor opportunitie therfore; is it meet (think you) that he should be thus unthankfully dealt withal, or hardly entreated at your hands? With that Dionysius was formewhat mooved, and demanded who that might be? Aeschines (quoth Plato) is he, a man faire conditioned, and of as honest carriage and behaviour, as any one that ever came out of Socrates schoole, or daily and familiarly conversed with him; fufficient and able by his eloquence and pithic speech to reforme the maners of those 40 with whom he keepeth companie: This Aeschines (I say) having taken a long voyage over fea and arrived here, intending for to conferre with you philosophically is nothing regarded, nor fet by at all. These words touched Denys so to the verie quicke, that presently he not onely tooke Plato in his armes, embracing him most lovingly, and yeelding him great thankes for that kindnesse, highly admiring his magnanimity; but also from that time forward, entreated Aeschines right courteously, and did him all the honor that he could,

Secondly, this libertie of fpeech which now is in hand, we ought to cleere and purge cleane from all contumelious and injurious words, from laughter, fcoffes, and feurrile taunts, which are the hurtfull and unholefome fauces (as I may fay) wherewith many use to season their free language. For like as a Chirurgian, when he maketh incision and cutteth the sless of his patisoner, had need to use great dexteritie, to have a nimble hand and an even; yea and every thing near and sine belonging to this worke and operation of his; as for all dauncing, gesticulations besides of his singers, toyish motions, and superfluous agitation thereof, to shew the agilitie of his hand, he is to torbeare for that time: So this libertie of speech unto a friend, doth admit well a certaine kind of elegancie and civilitie, provided, alwaies that the grace thereof retaine still a decent and comely gravitie, whereas if it chaunce to have audacious braverie, saucie impuritie, and insolencie, to the hurt or hinderance of credit, it is utterly marred and looseth all authoritie. And therefore it was not an unproper and unclegant speech, wherewith a mustitian upon a time

stopped King Philips mouth that he had not a word to fay againe: For when he was about to have disputed and contested against the saide minstrell, as touching good fingering, and the found of the feverall strings of his instrument: Oh fir (quoth he) God forbid that ever you should fall to so low an estate, as to be more cunning in these matters than I. But contrariwise Epicharmus spake not so aptly and to the purpose in this behalfe: For when King, Hiero who a little before had put to death some of his familiar acquaintance, invited him not many daies after to supper. Yea marie sir, but the other day when you facrificed, you bad not your friends to the feast. And as badly answered Antiphon, who upon a time when there was some question before Denys the Tyrant, what was the best kinde of brasse: Marie that (quoth he) whereof the Athenians made the Statutes of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Such speeches as these, are tart, 10 and biting, and no good can come thereof, neither hath that fcurrilite and fcoffing manner any delight, but a kinde of intemperance it is of the toong, mingled with a certaine maliciousnes of minde, implying a will to do hurt and injurie, and shewing plaine enmitie, which as many as use, worke their owne mischiefe and destruction, dauncing (as the Proverb faith) a daunce untowardly about a pits brinke, or jefting with edged tooles. For furely it cost Antiphon his life, who was put to death by the faid Denys. And Timagenes loft for ever the favour and friendthip of Augustus Cafar, not for any franke speech and broad language that ever he used against him; but onely because he had taken up a foolish fashion at everie feast or banket, whereunto the Emperor invited him, and whenfoever he walked with him, eftfoones and to no purpose he would come out with these verses in Homer, pretending that the cause of that favour which he had with the Emperor, was the grace and gift that he had in flouring and reviling others: and even the verie comicall Poëts in old time, exhibited and represented to the Theaters, many grave, austere and serious remonstrances, and those pertaining to policy & government of State: but there be scurrile speeches intermingled among, for to moove laughter, which (as one unfavorie dish of meate among many other good viands) marre all their libertie of speech and the benefit thereof; so as it is vaine and doth no good at all: And even so the Authors and Actors of such broad jests get nothing thereby, but an opinion and imputation of a malicious disposition and impure scurrilitie: and to the hearers there 30 accreweth no good nor profit at all. At other times and in other places, I hold well with it, and grant, that to jell with friends and moove laughter is tolerable enough: but furely the libertie of speech then, ought to be serious and modest, shewing a good intention without any purpose to gall or fting. And if it do concerne weightie affaires indeed, let the words be so set and couched, the affection to appeare, the countenance be to composed, and the gesture so ordred, and the voice so tuned, that all concurring together may win credite to the speech, and be effectuall to moove. But as in all things els, fit opportunity overflipt and neglected doth much hurt; fo especially it is the occasion that the fruit of free speech is utterly lost, in case it be omitted and forgotten. Moreover this is evident, that we must take heed how we speake broad at a table where friends be met together to drinke wine liberally and to make good cheere: for he that 40 amid pleafant discourses and mery talke mooveth a speech that causeth bending and knitting of browes, or others, maketh men to frowne and be frowning, he doth as much as overcast faire weather with a blacke and darke cloud; opposing himselfe unto that God * Lyam, who by good right hath that name, as Pindarus the Poet faith,

For naught else but to make some sport Among the Greekeshe did resort.

For that the cord he doth untie Of cares that breed anxietie.

Befides, this neglect of opportunitie bringeth with it great danger; for that our minds and spirits, kindled once with wine, are easie enslamed with cholar; yea and oftentimes it falleth out, that a man after he hath taken his drinkewell, when he thinketh but touse his freedome of tongue for to give some wholesome advertisement and admonition, ministreth occasion of so great enmitie. And to say all in few words, it is not the part of a generous, confident, and resolute heart, but rather of a craven kind and unmanly, to for beare plaines speech when men are sober, and to keepe a barking at the boord, like unto those cowardly cur dogs who never snarle but about a bone under the table. And now of this point, needlesse it is to discourse any longer.

But forasinuch as many men neither will nor dare controll and reforme their friends when they do amisse, so long as they be in prosperitie; as being of opinion that such admonition can not have accessed nor reach into a fortunate state that standeth upright; and yet the same perfons when men are falling, are ready to lay them along, and being once downe, to make a football of them, or tread them under feet, or elfe keepe them fo when they be once under the hatehes, giving their libertie of speech full scope to run over them all at once; as a brooke-water which having been kept up perforce against the nature and course thereof, is now let go, and the sloud-gates drawen up; rejoicing at his change and infortunitie of theirs, in regard as well of their pride and arrogancie, who before dissained and despised them; as also of themselves, who are but in meane and lowestate: it were not impettinent to this place for to discourse a little of this matter, and to answere that verse of Euripides,

> When forsune doth upon men smile, What need have they of friends the while?

Namely, that even then when as they feeme to have fortune at command, they fland in most necessitie, and ought to have their friends about them, to plucke downe their plumes and bring under their haughtiness of heart, occasioned by prosperitie: for few there be who with their outward selicitie continue wise and sober in mind, breaking not soorth into insolence; yea & many there are who have need of wir, discretion and reason to be put into them from without, to abate and depresse them being fer a gog and pussed up with the favors of fortune: But say, that the Divine power do change and turne about, and overthrow their state, or clip their wings and diminish their greatnesse and authoritie, then these calamities of themselves are scourges sufficient, putting them in minde of their errors, and working repentance; and then in such diagons therefore there is no use at all either of friendsto speake unto them frankly, or of pinching and bitting speeches, to moless, and trouble them, but to say a truth, in these mutations

It greatly doth content our minds

To see the face of pleasant friends. who may yeeld confolation, comfort and strength to a distressed heart, like as Xenophon doth write, that in battailes and the greatest extremities of danger, the amiable visage and cheerefull countenance of Clearthus being once feene of the fouldiors, encouraged them much more to play the men and fight luftily: whereas he that ufeth unto a man diffressed, such plaine speech as may gall and bite him more, doth as much as one who unto a troubled and inflamed cie applieth some quicke eie-salve or sharpe drug that is proper for to electe the fight: by which 30 means he cureth not the infirmitie before faid, neither doth he mitigate or alay the paine, but unto forrow and griefe of mindealready addeth anger moreover, and doth exasperate a wounded heart. And verily so long as a man is in the latitude of health, he is not so testie, froward, and impatient, but that he will in some fort give eare unto his friend, and thinke him neither rough nor altogether rude and uncivill, in case he tell him of his loosenesse of life, how he is given too much either unto women or wine; or if he finde fault with his idlenesse and fitting still, or contrariwife his excessive exercise; if he reproove him for haunting so often the baines or hot-houses, and never lying out of them, or blame him for gourmandise and belly cheere, or eating at undue houres. But if he be once ficke, then it is a death unto him and a griefe infupportable, which doth aggravate his maladie, to have one at his bedfide founding ever in his 40 eares; See what comes of your drunkennesse, your idlenesse, your surfetting and gluttony, your wenching and leacherie, these are the causes of your disease. But what will the sicke man fay againe: Away good fir with these unseasonable words of yours: you trouble me much, and do me no good iwis: I am about making my last will and testament; my Physicians are busic preparing and tempering a potion of Scammonie, or a drinke of Castorium for me: and you come preaching unto me with your Philosophicall reasons and admonitions to chastise me: I have no need of them now, nor of fuch friends as you. Semblably it fareth with those who are fallen to decay & be downe the winde; for capable they be not of fententious fawes; they have no need as the case now stands of free reprehensions: then lenitie and gentle usage, aide and comfort are more meet for them. For even fo, kinde nurses when their little babes and infants so have caught a fall, run not by and by to rate or chide them, but to take them up, wash and make them cleane where they were berayed, and to still them by all meanes that they can; afterwards, they rebuke and chaltife them for looking no better to their feet. It is reported of Demetrius the Phalerian, when being banished out of his countrey, he lived at Thebes in meane estate and very obscurely, that at the first he was not well pleased to see Crates the Philosopher, who came to vifit him, as looking ever when he would begin with fome rough words unto him, according to that libertie of speech which those Cynicke Philosophers then used: but when he heard Crates once speake kindly unto him, and discoursing after a milde maner, of the state of his banishment: namely, That there was no miserie fallen unto him by that meanes, not any calamitie at all, for which he should vexe and torment himselfe; but rather that he had cause to rejoice, in that he was sequestred and delivered from the charge and management of such affaires as were ticklish, murable and dangerous; and withall exhorting him to plucke up his heart, and beer good cheere, yea, and repose all his comfort in his owne selfe and a cleere conscience. Then Demetrius being more lightsome, and taking better courage, turned to his friends and faid, Shame take those affaires and businesses; out upon those troublesome and restlesse occupations, which have kept me from the knowledge and acquaintance of such a worthy man: For

To discerne a flatterer from a friend.

If men be in diffresse and griefe, Sweet words of friends do bring reliefe: But foolsh sots in all their actions, Have need estsoones of sharpecorrections.

And verily this is the maner of generous and gentle friends; but other base minded and abject fellowes, who statter and fawne whiles fortune doth smile; like unto olde ruptures, spasses and cramps (as Demostheres saith) do then stirre and shew themselves, when any new accident hapneth unto the bodie, so they also sticke close to every change and alteration of fortune, as being glad thereof, and taking pleasure and contenument therein. For, say that a man afflicted, were to be put in mind of his fault and misgovernment of himselfe, by reason that he hath taken lews courses and followed ill counsell, and so fallen into this or that inconvenience, it were sufficient to say thus unto him,

You never tooke by mine advice this course, Against the same how oft did I discourse?

In what cases and occurrences then, ought a friend to be earnest and vehement? and when is he to use his libertie of speech, and extend it to the full? even then, when occasion is offered, and the time ferveth best to represse excessive pleasure, to restraine unbridled choler, to refraine intollerable pride and infolencie, to stay infatiable avarice, or to stand against any foolish habitude and inconfiderate motion. Thus solon spake freely unto king Crassu, when hee saw how he was cleane corrupted, and growen beyond all measure arrogant upon the opinion that he had of his felicitie in this world, which was vncertaine, advertifing him to looke unto the end. Thus Socrates clipped the wings of Alcibiades, and by convincing his vice and errour, caused 30 him to weepe bitterly, and altered quite the disposition of his heart. Such were the remonstrances and admonitions of Cyrus to Cyaxares, and of Plato to Dion, even when he was in his greatest ruffe, in the very height of his glory: when (I fay) all mens eies were upon him, for his worthie acts and great fuccesse in all affaires, willing him even then to take heed and beware of arrogancie and felfe-conceit, as being the vice that dwelleth in the fame house together with solitude, (that is to fay) which maketh a man to live apart from the whole world. And to the same effect wrote Speulippus also unto him, when he bad him looke to himselfe, and not take a pride and prefume much ypon this; That there was no talke among women and children, but of him; rather that he should have a care so to adorne Sieilie with religion and pietie towards the gods, with justice and good lawes in regard of men, that the schoole of the Academie might have honour 40 and credit by him. Contrariwife, Euctaw and Eulaw, two minions and favourites of king Perfem, who followed his veine and pleafed his humor in all things, like other courtiours of his, all the while that he flourished, and so long as the world went on his side: but after he had lost the field in a battell against the Romans, fought neere the citie Pydna, and was fled, they let flie at him groffe tearmes and reprochfull speeches, bitterly laying to his charge all the misdemeanors and faults that he had before committed, casting in his dish those persons whom he had evill intreated or despised; which they ceased not to doe so long, untill the man (partly for forrow, and partly for anger) was so mooved, that he stabbed them both with his dagger, and slew them in the place. Thus much in generall may fuffice, to determine and define as touching the opportunity of free speech to friends: meane while a faithfull and carefull friend must not reject such so occasions as many times are presented unto him by them, but to take hold thereof quickly, and make good use of them: for otherwhiles it falleth out, that a demand or question asked, a narration related, a reprehension or commendation of like things in other persons, open the doore and make way for us to enter, and giveth us leave to speake frankly. After this maner it is faid, that Demaratus tooke his vantage to utter his minde freely; who comming upon a time from Corinth to Macedonie, when as King Philip was in some termes of diffension with his wife and sonne, was friendly received by Philip and bidden kindly welcome. Now after salutations and other complements paffed betweene; the King asked him whether the Greekes were at accord and unitic one with another? Demaratus, as he was a friend verie inward with him, and one that loved him hartily, answered thus 3 It becommeth you well in deed fir to enquire of the concord and agreement betweene the Athenians and the Peloponnesians, when in the meane while you fuffer your owne house to be full of domesticall quarrels and debates. Well did Diogenes likewife, who being come into the campe of King Philip, when he had an expedition or journey against the Greekes, was taken and brought before the King, who not knowing what hee was, demaunded of him, If hee were not a spie: Yes marie (quoth hee) and come I am to fpie out your inconfiderate folly (ô Philip) and want of forecast, who being not urged nor 10 compelled by any man, are come thus farre to hazard in one hower the State of your kingdome and your owne life, and to lav all upon the chance and cast of a die. But some man peradventure will fay, This was a speech somewhat with the sharpest, and too much biting. Moreover, another fit time and occasion there is of admonition, when those whom we minde to reproove, having been ereproched and taunted already by others for fome faults which they committed, are become submiffe and cast downe to our hands. Which opportunitie a wife and skilfull friend will not omit, but make especial good use of: namely, by seeming in open place to check those that thus have slandered them, yea and to repulse and put backe such opprobrious imputations, but privatly he will take his friend apart by himfelfe, and put him in minde to live more warily and give no fuch offence, if for no other thing elfe; yet because his enemies should not 20 take vantage, and beare themselves infolently against him: For how shall they be able to open their mouthes against you, & what missword can they have to say unto you, if you would leave thesethings and cast them behinde you, for which you heare ill and are growen to some obloquie? In this fortif the matter be handeled, all the offence that was taken finall light upon the head of the first slanderer, and the profit shall be attributed unto the other that gave the friendly advertisement, and he shall goe away with all the thankes.

Somethere be more over who after a more cleanly and fine maner in speaking of others, admonish their owne familiar friends: for they will accuse strangers in their hearing for those faults which they know them to commit, and by this meanes reclaime them from the fame. Thus Ammonius our mafter perceiving when he gave lecture in the after-noone that some of us 30 his scholars, had taken a larger dinner, and eate more than was meet for students, commanded a fervant of his a franchifed, to take up his owne fonne and to boate him, and why fo? He cannot for footh make his dinner (quoth he) but he must have some vineger to his meat. And in saying fo, he cast his eie upon us, in such fort, that as many as were culpable, tooke themselves to be rebuked, & thought that he meant them. Furthermore, this good regard would be observed, that we never use this fashion of free speech, and reprooving our friend in the presence of many persons, but we must remember that which befell unto Plato: for when upon a time, Socrates in a disputation held at the table, inveighed somwhat too bitterly against against one of his familiars before them all: had it not beene better (quoth Plato) to have told him of this privately, but thus to shame him before all this companie? But Socrates taking him presently therewith. 40 And you also might have done better to have saide this to my selfe, when you had found me alone. Pythagoras by report gave fuch hard tearmes by way of reproofe to one of his scholars, and acquaintance in the hearing of many, that the yoong man for very griefe of heart was weary of his life and hanged himselfe. But never would Pythagor as after to his dying day, reproove or admonish any man, if another were in place. And to say a truth, as well the detection as the correction of a finne ought to be fecret, and not in publike place, like as the discoverie and cure also of some filthie and foule disease: it must not I say be done in the veiw of the world (as if some thew or pompe were to be exhibited unto the people) with calling witnesses or spectators thereto. For it is not the part of a friend, but a tricke of some Sophister, to seeke for glorie in other mens faults, and affect outward shew and vaine oftentation in the presence of others: much like 50 to these Mount-bank Chirurgians, who for to have the greater practise, make shew of their cunning casts, and operations of their art in publike Theatres, with many gesticulations of their handy-worke. Moreover, befides that there should no infamie grow to him that is reprooved (which in deed is not to be allowed in any cure or remedie) there ought also to be some regard had of the nature of vice and finne, which for the most part of it selfe is opinionative, contentious, stubborne and apt to stand to it, and make meanes of defence. For as Euripides faith,

We daily see, not onely wanton love Doth presset he more, when one doth it reprove. But any vice whatfoever it be and everie imperfection, if a man do reproove it in publike place before many, and spare not at all, putteth on the nature of impudence and turneth to be shamelesse: like as therefore Plato giveth a precept, that elder solke, if they would imprint shame and grace in their yoong children, ought themselves sirft to shew shamefast behavior among them; even so, the modelt and bashfull libertie of speech which one friend useth, doth strike also a great shame in another. Also to come and approach by little and little unto one that offendeth, and after a doubting maner with a kind of seare to touch him, is the next way to undermine the vice that he is prone and given unto, and the same, whiles he can not choose but offendethy disposed, who is so modeltly and gently entreated. And therefore it would be alwaies verie good in those reprehensions to observe what he did, who in like case reprooving a friend,

Held head full close unto his eare, That no man els but he might heare.

But leffe feemly and convenient it is for to discover the fault of the husband before his wife; of a father in the presence of his sonnes; of a lover before his love; or of a schoolmaster in the hearing of his scholars: that were enough to put them beside their right wits, for anger and griefe when they shall see themselves checked and discredited before those of whom they define to be best esteemed. And verily of this mind I am, hat it was not the wine so much that set king Alexander in such a chase & rage against Clitus who he reproved him, as for that he did it in the presence and hearing of so many. Aristomenes also, the master and tutor of king Prolomans, for that in the sight of an embassador he awaked him out of a sleepe, & willed him to give care unto the 20 embassage, who thereupon tooke occasion to seem discontented in the kings behalse, and thus to say: What if after so many travels that your Majestie doth undergo, and your long watching for our sakes, some sleep do overtake you otherwhiles; our part it were to tell you of it privatly, & not thus rudely to lay hand as it were upo your person in the presence of so many men. Whereupon Prolomans being mooved at these suggestions, sent unto the man a cup of poison, with comandement that he should drinkeit off. Aristophanes also, casteth this in Cleon his teeth,

For that when strangers were in place The towne with termes he did disgrace, and thereby provoke the Athenians & bring their high displeasure upon him. And therfore this 30 regard would be had especially above all others, that when we would use our libertie of speech. we do it not by way of oftentation in a vaine glorie to be popular, and to get applause, but onely with an intention to profit and do good, yea and to cute some infirmitie thereby. Over and befides that which Thueydides reporteth of the Corinthians, how they gave out of themselves and not unfitly, that it belonged unto them, and meet menthey were to reproove others; the fame ought they to have in them that will take upon them to be correctours of other persons. For like as Lyfander answered to a certeine Megarian who put himselfe forward in an assemblie of affociates and allies to speake frankely for the libertie of Greece: These words of yours (my friend) would befeeme to have beene spoken by some puissant State or citie; even so it may be faid to every one that will seeme freely to reprehend another, that he had need himselfe to be in 40 maners wel reformed. And this most truly ought to be inferred upon all those that wil seeme to chastice and correct others, namely, to be wifer and of better government than the rest: for thus Plato protested that he reformed Spensiopus by example of his owne life: and Xenocrates likewise casting but his eie upon Polemon, who was come into his schoole like a Ruffian, by his very looke onely reclaimed him from his loofe life: whereas on the contrary fide, if a light and lewd person, one that is full of bad conditions himselse, would sceme to finde fault with others and be buffe with his tongue, he must be fure alwaies to heare this on both sides of his eares, Himselfe all full of sores impure Will others seeme to heale and cure.

Howbeit, forassimuch as oftentimes the case standeth so, that by occasion of some affaires webe 50 driven to challice those with whom we converse, when we our selves are culpable and no better than they: the most cleanly & least offensive way to do it, is this, To acknowledge in some sort that we be likewise faulty and to include and comprehend our owne persons together with them: after which maner is that reproofe in Homer,

Sir Diomedewhat aileth w? how is it come about? That we should thus forget to fight, who ear st were thought so sout?
Also in another place:
And now we all unwoorthy are
With Hector onely to compare.

Thus Socrates mildly and gently would feeme to reproove yoong men, making semblance as if himselse were not void of ignorance, but had need also to be instructed in vertue, and professing that he had need with them to fearch for the knowledge of trueth: for such commonly do win love and credit; yea and sooner shallbe beleeved, who are thought subject to the same faults, and seeme willing to correct their friends like as they do their owne selves; whereas he who spreadeth and displainth his owne wings, in clapping other mens, justifying himselse as if he were pure, sincere, saultlesse, and without all affections and instruities, unlesse he much elder than we, or in regard of some notable and approoved vertue in farre higher place of authoritie and in greater reputation than our selves, he shall gaine no profit nor do any good, but be reputed a busse oby and troublesome person. And therefore it was not without just cause that good Phanix in speaking to Achilles alledged his owne missortunes, and namely how in a fit of choler he had like one day to have killed his owne father, but that sodeinly he bethought himselse and changed his minde,

Least that among the Greekes I fould be nam'd

A parrieide and ever after sham'd: hich he did no doubt to this end, because h

20 which he did no doubt to this end, because he would not seeme in chiding him to arrogate this praise unto himselfe, that he was not subject to anger, nor had ever done amisse by occasion of that infirmitie and passion. Certes such admonitions as these enter and pierce more effectually into the heart, for that they are thought to proceed from a tender compassion; and more willing are we to yeeld unto such as seeme to have suffred the like, than to those that despise and contemne us. But forasmuch as neither the cie when it is inflamed can abide any cleere and shining light, nor a passionate minde endure strake speech, or a plaine and bare reprehension, one of the best and most profitable helps in this case, is to intermingle therewith a little praise, as we reade thus in Homer,

Now (fure) me thinks you do not well, thus for to leave the field,
Who all are knowen for doughty knights, and be fi with speare and skield.

A coward if I saw to slee, him would I not reproove:
But such as you, thus for to shrinke, my heart doth greatly moove.
Likewise,
O Pandar, where is now thy bowe,

O Pandar, where is now thy bowe, where are thine arrowes flight: Where is that honour, in which none with thee dare strive in fight?

And verily such oblique reprehensions also as these, are most effectuall and woonderfull in reclaming those that be ready to run on end, and fall to some grosse enormities: as for example, What is become of wise Oedipus,

In riddles areeding who was so famous.

Also,

And Hercules, who hath endur'd fuch paine, Speakes he these words, so soolish and so vaine?

For this kinde of dealing doth not onely affwage and mitigate the roughnesse and comman50 ding power that is in a reprehension and rebuke, but also breedeth in the partie in such fort reprooved, a certeine emulation of himselse, causing him to be abashed and assamed for any follies and dissoness the pranks, when he remembresh and callests to minde his other good parts and commendable acts, which by this meanes he setteth before his cies, as examples, and to betweene him and others, to wit, his equals in age, his fellow-citizens, or kinsesoks; then his vice, which in the owne nature is stubburne and opinionative enough, becommets by that meanes more froward and exasperate, and often times he will not sticke in a sume and chase to sling away, and grumble in this wife, Why goe you not then to those that are so much better than I? why can you not let me alone, but thus trouble me as you do? And therefore we must take heed especially, that whiles we purpose to tel one plainly of his faults, we do not praise others, unlesse haply they be his parents: as Agamemnon did unto Diomedes,

Unlike himselse, and much growen out of kinde.
And ulysses in the Tragedic entituled Segris, Tou sir, whose father was a knight, the best that ever drew A sword, of all the Greeks, in steld, and many a capraine slew, Sit you heere carding like a wench,
and spinning wooll on rocke, Thereby the clorious light to quench

of your most noble stocke? But most unseemely it were and undecent of all other, if when one is admonished by his friend, he should fall to admonish him againe; and being tolde freely of his fault, ferve him the like, and quithim with as much: for this is the next way to kindle coales, and to make variance and discord; and in one word verily, such a rejecting & spurning againe as this, may seeme in effect to bewray, not a reciprocall libertie of rendring one for another, but rather a peevish minde that 20 can abide no maner of reproofe. Better therefore it is, to endure patiently for the time, a friend that telleth us plainly of our faults; and if himselfe afterwards chance to offend and have need of the like reprehension, this after a fort giveth free libertie unto him that was rebuked afore, to use the same libertie of speech againe unto the other: For calling to minde by this occasion, without any remembrance of old grudge and former injurie, that himfelfe also was woont not to neglect his friends when they did amisse and forgat themselves, but tooke paines to reproove, redreffe, and teach them how to amend, he will the fooner yeeld a fault, and receive that chaflifement and correction, which he shall perceive to be a retribution of like love and kindnesse, and not a requitall of complaint and anger. Moreover, like as Thucidides faith, That the man is wife and well advifed, who incurreth the envie of men for matters of greatest weight and impor-30 tance; even fowe fay: That if a friend will adventure the danger and heavy load and ill will for blaming his friends, hee must make choise of such matters as be of great moment and much consequence: for if he will take exceptions at every trifle and little thing indifferent; if he will feeme evermore to be finding fault, and cary himselfe not like a kind and affectionate friend, but a precise, severe and imperious schoole-master, to spie all faults, and correct every point and tittle; certes he shall finde afterwards, that his admonitions even for the greatest offences, shall not be regarded, nor any whit effectuall: for that he hath used already to no purpose, his franke reprehention (the foveraigne remedie for groffe and maine faults) in many others that are but flight, and not woorthy reproofe: much like unto a Physician, who hath emploied and spenta medicine that is strong and bitter, howbeit, necessary and costly, in small infirmities, and of no 40 reckoning to speake of. A friend therefore is to looke unto this; That it be not an ordinary matter with him to be alwaies quarrelfome, and defitous to finde one fault or other. And if peradventure he meet with fuch a companion as is apt to fearch narrowly into all light matters, to cavill and wrangle for every thing, and ready to raise calumniations like a petty Sycophant for toics and trifles, he may take the better advantage and occasion thereby for to reproove him againe, in case he chance to faile in greater and more grosse faults.

Philotimus the Physician answered pretily unto one, who having an impostume growen to suppuration about his liver, shewed unto him a finger that was fore, and troubled with some blifter or whitssaw, and desired his counsell for the same: My good friend (quoth he) the disease that you are to looke unto, is not a whitssaw nor about your naile roote; even so, there may be 50 occasion and opportunitie offered unto a friend, to say unto one that ever and anon is finding fault, and reprooving small errors not woorth the noting, to wit, sports and pastimes, feasting and merric meeting, or such like trifling trickes of youth: Good fir, let us finde the meanes rather, that this man whom you thus blame, may cast off the harlot that hekeeps, or give over his dice playing; for otherwise, he is a man of excellent and woonderfull good parts. For he that perceiveth how he is tolerated or winked at, yea and pardoned in small matters, will not be unwilling, that a friend should use his libertie in reprooving his greater vices: whereas he that is evermore urgent upon one, preffing and lying hard unto him; alwaies bitter and unpleafant, prying and looking into everie corner, and taking knowledge of all things: fuch an one (I fay) there is neither childe nor brother will endure; nay, he is intolerable to his verie fervants: But like as Euripides faith,

No more is the folly of friends to bad but that we may picke fome goodnes out of them: we ought therefore to observe diligently, not onely when they do amisse, but also when they doe well: and verily at the first to be willing and most readie to praise; but alterwards we must doe as 10 the Smithes who temper yron: For when they have given it a fire, and made it by that meanes (oft, loose and pliable, they drench and dip it in cold water, whereby it becommeth compact and hard, taking thereby the due temperature of stiffs steele; even so, when we perceive that our friends be well heat and relaxed (as it were) by hearing themselves praised by us, then we may come upon them by little and little with a tincture (as I may so say) of reproofe, and telling them of their faults. Then will it be a fit time to speake unto a friend thus: Howsay you, are these prants woorthic to be compared with those parts? See you not the fruits that come of vertue? Loe what we your friends require of you: these are the duties and offices which are besceming your person: for these hath nature made and framed you. As for those lewd causes, see upon them,

Send fuch away, sonfine them farre, unto the mountaine wild, Or into rowing feafrom land let them be quite exil'd.

For like as an honest minied and discreet Physitian, will choose rather to cure the maladie of his patient by rest and sleepe, or by good nutriture & dict, than by Casterium or Scammonium: even so, a kinde & courteous friend, a good father and gentle schoolemaster, taketh pleasure and joyeth more to use praises than reproofes, in the reformation of manners. For there is nothing that maketh the man, who boldly sindeth sault with his friends to bee so little offensive unto them, or to do more good and cure them better, than to be voide of anger, and to seeme after a milde fort in all love and affectionate good will to address himselse unto them, when they doe amisse. And therefore neither ought he to urge them overmuch, and seeme too eagerly to convince them if they denie the thing, ne yet to debarre them of libertie to make their answere and cleere themselves: but rather to helpe them out, and after a fort to minister unto them some honest and colourable pretenses, to excuse and justifie their facts: and when a man seeth them do amisse by reason of some woorse cause indeed, to lay the fault upon another occasion that is more tolerable: As Hestor when he said unto Paris.

Unhappie man alas, you do not well To beare in brest a heart fo fell.

As if his brothers retire out of battell and refulall to combat with Menelaus, had not beenea 40 meere flight and running away, but verie anger and a curft flomake. Likewife Nestor unto Agamemnon,

But you gave place unto your haughty mind: And feed those fits which come to you by kind.

For in mine advice a more milde reprehension is this than to have said: This was injuriously done of you, or this was a shamefull and vilanous part of yours? As also to say unto one, You could not tel what you did; you thought not of it; or you were altogether ignorant what would come thereof, is better and more civill, than bluntly to charge him and say: This was a meere wrong, and a wicked act of yours. Also thus, Do not contest and quarrell in this wise with your brother, is lesse offensive than to say: Deale not thus enviously and spitefully against your broso ther: Likewise it were a more gentle manner of reproofe to say unto a man: Avoid this woman that spoileth and abuseth you; than thus: Give over this woman, spoile and abuse her no more, Thus you see what meanes are to be used in this libertie of speech, when a friend would cure a maladie.

But for to prevent the same, there would be practifed a cleane contrarie course: for when it behoovesh to avert and turne our friends from committing a fault, whereto they are prone and enclined; or to withstand some violent and disordinat passion, which carrieth them a cleane contrarie way; or when we are desirous to incite and stirre them forward unto good things, being of themselves slow and backward: when, I say, we would give an edge unto them, who are otherwise dull, and heat them being cold, we ought to transferre the thing or act in hand to some abfurd causes, and those that be unseemely and undecent. Thus ulysses pricked on Achilles in a certaine Tragedic of Sophoeles, when he said thus unto him: It is not for a supper Achilles that you are so angrie, but

For that you have already seene The wals of Troy, your fearfull teene.

And when upon these words Arbilles tooke greater indignation, and chased more and more, faying, that he would not faile forward but be gone backeagaine, he came upon him a second time with this rejoynder:

I wote well why you gladly would depart: Tis not because at cheeks or taunts you chase, Bus Hector is not far: he kils your hart; For dread of him to stay it is not safe.

By this meanes when we scar a valiant and hardy man with the opinion of cowardise; an honest, chaste and civill person, with the note of being reputed loose & incontinent; also a liberall and fumptuous Magnifico, with the feare to be accounted a niggard or a mechanicall micher; we do mightily incite them to wel doing, and chase them from bad waies. And like as when a thing is done and past, and where there is no remedic, there should be borne a modest and temperate hand, in such fortthat in our libertie of speech we seeme to shew more commissration, pittie 20 and fellow griefe of minde for the fault of a friend, than eager reprehension; so contrariwise where it stands upon this point that he should not fault, where (I say) our drift is to fight against the motion of his paffions, there we ought to be vehement, inexorable and never to give over nor yeeld one jot into them. And this is the very time when we are to shew that love of ours and good will which is conflant, fetled, and fure, and to use our true libertie of speech to the full. For to reproove faults already committed, we see it is an ordinary thing among arrant enmics. To which purpose faid Diogenes very well; That a man who would be an honest man ought to have either very good friends, or most shrewd and bitter enimies: for as they do teach and instruct; so these are ready to finde fault and reproove. Now far better it is for one to abstaine from evill doing, in beleeving and following the found counsell of his friends, than to 10 repent afterwards of ill doing, when he feeth himselfe blamed and accused by his enimies. And therefore if it were for nothing els but this, great discretion and circumspection would be used in making remonstrances & speaking freely unto friends: and so much the rather, by how much it is the greater and stronger remedie that friendship can use, and hath more need to be used in time and place convenient, and more wifely to be tempered with a meane and mediocrity. Now forafmuch as I have faid fundry times already, that all reprehensions whatfoever are dolorous unto him that receiveth them; we ought in this case to imitate good Physicians and Chirurgians: for when they have made incifion or cut any member, they leave not the place in paine and torment still, butuse certeine fomentations and lenitive infusions to mitigate the anguish: No more do they that after a civill maner have chid or rebuked, run away prefently to 40 foone as they have bitten and pricked the partie, but by changing their maner of speech, entertainetheir friends thus galled and wounded, with other more mild and pleasant discourses; to aswage their griefe and refresh their hartagaine that is cast downe and discomforted; and I may well compare them to these cutters and carvers of images, who after they have rough hewen and fcabbled over certeine peeces of stone for to make their statures of do polish and smooth them faire, yea and give them a lightforme lustre. But if a man be stung and nipped once, or touched to the quickeby some objurgatorie reprehension, and so left rough, uneven, disquieted, swelling and puffing for anger, he is ever after hardly quieted or reclaimed, and no confolation will g and putting for anger, he is ever after fatting quieted of techanica, and no confidential ferve the turne to appeale and comfort him againe. And therefore they who reproove & admonish their friends, ought to observe this rule above all others; Not to for fake them immediately when they have fo done, nor to breake off their conference fodainly, or to conclude their fpeech with any word that might greeve and provoke them.

A MAN SHOVLD RE-

A TREATISE IN MANER of a Dialogue.

The persons that be the Speakers:
SYLLA and Fundanus.

The Summarie of the Dialogue.

Fier we are taught how to discerne a flatterer from a friend it seemeth that this Treatife, as touching Mildneffe and how we ought to bridle Anger, was fet heere in his proper place. For like as we may soone erre grosty in choise of those whom we are willing and well content to have about us, and in that respect are to be circumspect, and to stand upon our quard; so we have no lesse cause to consider how we should converse among our neighbours. Now of all those vices and imperfections which defame mans life, and cause the race & course thereof to be difficult & wondrow painfull to passe, anger is one of those which are to 20 be ranged in the first ranke; in such sort, that it booteth not to be provided of good friends, if this surious humor get the mastery over us: like as contrariwise flutterers & such other pestilent plagues have not so easie entrance into us nor such ready meanes to be possessed of us, so long as we be accopanied with a certaine wife and prudent mildneffe. In this discourse then, our authour doing the part of an expert Physician, laboureth to purge our mindes from all choler, and would traine them to modestie and humanitie, so farre foorth as Philosophie morall is able to performe. And for to attaine unto so great a benefit, he sheweth in the first place, that we ought to procure our friends for to observe and marke our impersections, that by long continuance of time we may accustome our selves to holde in our judgement by the bit of reason. After certaine proper similitudes serving for this purpose, and a description of the inconveniences and harmes that come by wrath, he prooveth, that it is an easie matter to restraine and 40 represse the same : to which purpose he setteth downe divers meanes, upon which he discourseth after his ufuall maner, that is to fay, with reasons and inductions, enriched with notable similitudes and examples: afterwards, having spoken of the time and maner of chastising and correcting those who are under our power and governance, he proposeth aswell certaine remedies to cure choler, as preservalives to keepe us from relapse into it againe: Which done, he represente thire lively, as in a painted table, to the end that those who suffer themselves to be surprised therewith, may be abashed and ashamed of their unhappy state: and therewith he giveth five notable advertisements for to attaine thereto, which be as it were prefervatives : by meanes whereof we (hould not feele our selves attaint any more with this maladie.

T feemeth unto me (ô Fundanus) that painters doe verie well and wifely, to view and confider their workes often and by times betweene, before they thinke them finished and let them go out of their hands: for that by fetting them fo out of their fight, and then afterwards having recourse thither agains to judge thereof, they make their cies (as it were) new judges, to fpie and discerne the least fault that is, which continuall looking thereupon, and the ordinarie view of one and the fame thing doth cover and hide from them. But forasmuch as it is not possible that a man should depart from himselfe for a time, and after a certaine space returne againe; nor 20 that he should breake, interrupt and discontinue his understanding and sense within (which is the cause that each man is a worse judge of himselfe than of others.') A second meanes and remedie therefore in this case would be used: namely, to review his friends fundrie times, and estfoones likewise to yeeld himselfe to be seene and beheld by them; not so much to know thereby whether he aged apace and grow foone old; or whether the constitution of his bodie be better or worse than it was before, as to survey and consider his manners and behaviour, to wit, whether time hath added any good thing, or taken away ought that is bad and naught. For mine owne part, this being now the fecond yeere fince I came first to this citie of Rome, and the fifth month of mine acquaintance with you, I thinke it no great woonder, that confidering your towardnes and the dexteritie of your nature, those good parts which were alreadie in you, have gotten so 30 great an addition and be so much increased, as they are : but when I see how that vehement inclination, and ardent motion of yours to anger, whereunto by nature you were given, is by the guidance of reason become so milde, so gentle and tractable, it commeth into my minde to say thereunto, that which I read in Homer,

O what a woondrous change is here? Much milder are you than you were.

And verily this gentlenes and meekenes of yours is not turned into a certaine floth, and generall diffolution of your vigour: but like as a peece of ground well tilled, lieth light and even, and besides more hollow than before, which maketh much for the sertilitie thereof; even so, your nature hath gotten in stead of that violent disposition and sudden propension un-p to choler, a certaine equalitie and profunditie, ferving greatly to the management of affaires, whereby also it appeareth plainely that it is not long of the decaying strength of the bodie, by reason of declining age; neither yet of the owne accord, that your hastinesse and cholericke passion is thus faded, but rather by meanes of good reasons and instructions well cured. And yet verily (for unto you I will be bold to fay the truth) at the first I suspected and could not well believe Eros our familiar friend, when he made this report of you unto me; as doubting that he was readie to give this testimonie of you in regard of affection and good will, bearing me in hand of those things which were not indeed in you, but ought to be in good and honelt men: and yet (as you know well ynough) he is not fuch a man, as for favour of any person, and for to pleafe, can be eafily persuaded and brought to say otherwise than he thinketh. But now as so he is freed and acquit from the crime of bearing falle witnesse: so you (fince this journey and travell upon the way affoordeth you good leafure) will (I doubt not) at my request, declare and recount unto us the order how you did this cure upon your felfe; and namely what medicines and remedies you used, to make that cholericke nature of yours, so gentle, so tractable, so soft and supple, so obeifant (I say) and subject wholy to the rule of reason?

Fundanus. But why do you not your felfe (ô Sylla) my decreft and most affectionate friend, take heed, that for the amitie and good will which you beare unto me, you be not deceived and fee one thing in me for another? As for Eros, who for his owne part hath not alwaies his anger stedfaltly stated with the cable and anchor of Homers Pei/a (that is, obedient and abiding firme in one place) but otherwhiles much mooved and out of quiet, for the hatted that he hath of vice and vicious men it may verie wel be, and like it is that unto him I feeme more milde and gentle than before: like as we fee in changing and altering the notes of prick-fong, or the Gam-ut in muficke, certaine Netæ or notes which are the base in one S, being compared which other Netæ morelow and bale, become Hypatæ, that is, the Trebles.

It is neither fo nor fo (ô Fundamu) but of all loves, do as I defire you, for my fake.

Fundanus. Since it is so (Sylla) among many good advertisements of Musonius which come to my minde, this is one; That who foever would live fafe and in health, ought all their life time to looke to themselves, and be as it were in continual Physicke. For I am not of this minde, neither doe I thinke it convenient that like as Elleborm, after it hath done the deed within a ficke mans bodie and wrought a cure, is cast up againe together with the maladie; so reason also should be sent out after the passion which it hath cuted, but it ought to remaine still in the mind for to keepe and preferve the judgement. For why? reason is not to be compared with medicines and purgative drugs, but rather to holefome and nourifhing meates, engendring mild-20 ly in the minds of them unto whom it is made familiar, 2 good complexion and fast habit together with some perfect health: whereas admonitions and corrections applied or ministred unto passions when they swell and rage, and bee in the height of their heat and inflammation, hardly and with much adoe worke any effect at all, and if they doe, it is with much paine. Neither differ they in operation from those strong odors which well may raise out of a fit those who are fallen and be subject to the Epilepsy or falling sicknes; but they cure not the discase, nor fecure the patient for falling againe: True it is that all other passions of the minde, if they be taken in hand at the very point and instant when they are in their highest furie, do yeeld in some fort, and they admit reason comming from without into the minde for to helpe and succour, but anger not onely, as Melanthius faith,

Commits lewd parts, and reason doth displace

Out of her feat, and proper resting place. but also turneth her cleane out of house & home, shutteth and locketh her out of doores for altogether; nay it fareth for all the world like to those who set the house on fire over their owne heads, and turne themselves and it together: it filleth all within full of trouble, smoke, and confused noises, in such fort that it hath neither eie to see, nor eare to listen unto those that would, & might affift and give aide: and therefore fooner will a ship abandoned of her master in the mids of the sea, and there hulling dangerously in a storme and tempest receive a pilot from some other ship without; than a man to seed with the waves of furic and anger, admit the reason and remonstrance of a stranger; unlesse his owne reason at home were before-hand well prepared: 40 But like as they who looke for no other but to have their citie befreged, gather together and lay up fafe their owne store and provision, and all things that might ferve their turne, not knowing nor expecting any aide or reliefe abroad during the fiege; even so ought we to have our remedies ready and provided long before, and the same gathered out of all parts of Philosophie and conveied into the minde for to withfland the rage of choler: as being affured of this, that when neede and necessitie requireth to use them, wee shall not easily admit the same, and suffer them to have entrance into us. For furely at fuch a time of extremitie, the foule heareth not a word that is faid unto it without, for the trouble and confusion within, unlesse her owne reafon be affiftant ready both to receive and understand quickly every commandement and precept, and also to prompt the same accordingly unto her. And say that she doth heate: looke 50 what is faid unto her after a milde, calme, and gentle maner, that the despiseth; againe, if any be more instant, and do urge her somewhat roughly, with those she is displeased, and the woorse for their admonitions : for wrath being of the owne nature proud, audacious, unruly, and hardly suffering it selfe to be handled or stirred by another, much like unto a tyrantattended with a strong guard about his person, ought to have something of the owne which is domesticall, familiar, and (as it were) in-bred together with it, for to overthrow and diffolve the same. Nowe the continuall custome of anger and the ordinary or often falling into a chase, breedeth in the minde an ill habit called wrathfulnesse, which in the end groweth to this passe, that it maketh a man cholericke and halty, apt to be mooved at every thing; and besides, it engendeeth a bitter humor of revenge, and a tellinesse implacable, or hardly to be appealed; namely, when the mind is exulcerate once, taking offence at every small occasion, quarteling and complaining for toies and trifles, much like unto a thin or a fine edge that entreth with the least force that the graver putteth it to. But the judgement of reason opposing it selfe streightwaies against such motions and fits of choler, and readie to suppresse & keepe them downe, is not onely a remedia for the present mischiese, but also for the time to come doeth strengthen and fortifie the mind, cauting it to be more firme and ftrong to refift fuch passions when they arise. And now to give some instance of my selfe: The same hapned unto measter I had twice or thrice made head aguinft choler, as befell fometimes to the Thebanes; who having ones repelled and put to flight 10 the Lacedamonians (warriors thought in those daies invincible) were never in any one battell afterward defeated by them. For from that time forward I tooke heart and courage, as feeing full well, that conquered it might be with the discourse of reason. I perceived moreover, that anger would not onely be quenched with cold water powred and cast upon it, as Arthotle hath reported unto us, but also that it would go out and be extinguished, were it never so light a fire before, by prefenting necre unto it fome object of feare: nay (I affure you) by a fudden joy comming upon it unlooked for, in many a man, according as Homer faith, choler hath melted, diffolved & evaporated away. And therefore this resolution I made, that anger was a passion not incurable, if men were willing to be cured: for furely the occasions and beginnings thereof are not alwaies great and forcible; but we fee that a jeft, a feoffe, fome fport, fome laughter, a winke of the cie, as or nod of the head, and fuch finall matters, hath fet many in a peling chafe: even as Lady Helena faying no more but thus unto her niece or brothers daughter at their first meeting,

Electra wirgin, long time fince 1 you faw &c. drawe her in such a fit of choler, that therewith she was provoked to breake off her speech with this answer,

Wife now at last, though all too late, you are I may well fay, Who whilom left your husbands houfe, andran with shame away.

Likewise Calisthenes mightily offended Alexander with one word, who when a great bole 39 of wine went round about the table, refused it as it came to his turne, saying: I will not (I trow) drinke so to your health Alexander, that I shall have need thereby of Arfulapius (i. a Physician.) A fire that newly hath caught a slame with hares or conies haire, drie leaves, hunds and light straw, stubble and rakings, it is an easte matter to pur out and quench; but if it have once taken to sound sewell and such matter as hath solidity, substance and thicknesse in it, soone it burneth and consumeth as Arfebylus saith:

By climbing up and mounting hie The stately works of Carpentrie.

Semblably, he that will take heed unto choler at the beginning, when he feeth it once to finoke or flame out by occasion of fome merry speech, flouting scoffes, and foolish words of no more ment, needs not to strive much about the quenching of it: for many times if he do no more but hold his peace, or make simall account or none at all of such matters, it is enough to extanguish and make it go out. For he that ministreth not sewell to fire, putteth it out; and who foever feedeth not his anger at the first, and bloweth not the coales himselfe, doth coole and represse the same. And therefore Hieromman the Philosopher, although otherwise he have taught us many good lessons and instructions; yet in this point he hath not pleased and fatisfied me, when he saith; That a man is not able to perceive in himselfe the breeding of anger, (so quicke and sodden it is) but onely when it is bred, then it may be felt: for furely, there is no vice or passion in us, that giveth such warning, or hath either so evident a generation or so manisest an augment whiles it is stirred and mooved, as anger, according as Homer himselfe right stilly, 50 and as a man of good experience, giveth us to understand, who bringeth in Achilles fore mooved to forrow and griefe of heart, even with a word, and at the very instant, when he heard the speeches of Maamemon: for thus reporteth the Poet of him:

Out of the king his fower eignes mouth, the word no fooner paft, But straight a blacke and mistic cloud of ire him over east.

But of Aguneimon himselfe, he saith, that is was long ere he was angrie; namely, after he had beene kindled with many hard speeches, that were dealt to and fro, which if any third person stepping betweene, would have staied or turned away, certes their quarrell and debate had not growen to such tearnies of extremity as it did. And therefore Socrates so often as he felt him. felfe somewhat declining and more mooved than he should, against any one of his friends, and avoiding as it were a rocke in the fea, before the tempelt came and the billowes arofe, would let fall his voice, thew a smiling countenance, and compose his looke and visage to mirth and lenitie, and thus by bending and drawing another away to that whereunto his affection enclined, and opposing himselfe to a contrary passion, he kept upright on his feet, so that he fell not, nor o was overthrowen. For there is (my good friend) a ready meanes in the very beginning, to breake the force of choler, like as there is a way to diffolve a tyrannicall rule and dominion, that is to fay, not to obey at the first, not to give eare and be ruled by her commandement, when the thal bid thee to speake & cry out aloud, or to looke with a terrible countenance, or to knocke or beat thy felfe; but to be still and quiet, and not to re-enforce and encrease the passion, as men do exasperate a sicknesse with strugling, striving, tossing and roaring out aloud. For those things which ordinary lovers and amourous young men practife, that is to fay, to go in a wanton and merry maske, to fing and daunce at the doores of their fweet hearts and miftreffes, to bedecke their windowes with coronets & floure-garlands, bring some ease and alleviation (such as it is) of their paffions, and the fame not altogether undecent and uncivill, according to that which 20 we reade in the Poet:

How to bridle anger.

And when I came, aloud I cried not, And asked who she was, or daughter whose? But kist my love full sweetly, that I wot: If this be sinne? but sinne I can not choose.

Also that which we permit those to doe who are in forrow, namely, to mourne, to lament and weepe for loffes or mithaps; certeinly with their fighs which they fetch, & teares that they flied, they do lend out and discharge a good part of their griese and anguish. But it is not so with the passion of anger: for furely, the more that they stirre and speake who are surprised therewith the more hote it is, and the flame burneth out the rather; and therefore the best way is, for a man to 30 be quiet, to flie and keepe him out of the way, or els to retire himselfe into some haven of furety and repose, when he perceiveth that there is a fit of anger toward, as if he felt an accesse of the falling evill comming. This (I fay) we ought to do, for feare left we fall downe, or rather runne and ruth upon some one or other. But who be they that we run upon ? Surely our very friends, for the greatest part, & those we wrong most. As for our affection of love, it standeth nor to all things indifferently, neither do we hate ne yet feare we everything alike: But what is it that ire fetteth not upon? nothing is there but it doth affaile and lay hands on; we are angry with our enemies; we chafe with our friends; with children, with parents are we wrath; nay, the very gods themselves we for beare not in our cholericke mood; we sie upon dumbe and brute beasts; we spare not so much as our utensile vessels and implements which have neither sense nor life at 40 all, if they stand in our way, we fare like Thampris the Musician,

Who brake his cornet, finely bound And tipt with golde: his late he hent, Well firung and sun a to pleafant found, And it anon to fitters rent.

Thus did Pandarm also, who cursed, and betooke himselse to all the siends in hell, if he did not burst his bowe and arrowes with his owne hands, and throw them into the fire when he had so done. As for Xerxes, he stucke not to whip, to lash and sourge the sea, and to the mountaine Abos he sent his minatoric letters in this forme; Thou wretebed and wicked Athos, that beare stup thy bead aloss into the skie; see thou bring soorth no great craggie stones, I advise thee, for my so works, and such as be hard to be cut and wronght: atherwise, if thou doe, I shall cut thee through and tumble thee into the maine sea. Many fearetull and terrible things there be that are done in anger, and as many for them againe, as foolish and ridiculous, and therefore of all passions that trouble the minde, it is both hated and despised most. In which regards expedient it were, to consider diligently as well of the one as the other: so mine owne part, whether I did well or ill, I know not; but furely, when I began my cure of choler in my selfe, I did as in olde time the Lacedemonians were woont to do by their llotes, men of base and servile condition: For as they taught their children what a soule vice drunkennesse was, by their example when they were drunke, fo I learned by observing others, what anger was, and what beaftly effects it wrought, First and formost therefore, like as that maladic according to Hippernaes, is of all others, woorst and most dangerous, wherein the visage of the sicke person is most dissingured and made unlikest it felles; so, I seeing those that were possessed of cholers and (as it were) beside themselves there by, how their sace was changed, their colour, their countenance, their gate and their voice quite altered, I imagined thereupon unto my selse accretine forme and image of this maladie, as being mightily displeased in my minde; is shaply at any time I should be seene of my friends, my wise and the little girles my daughters, so terrible and so farre mooved and transported beside my selse; not onely fearefull and hideous to beholde, and farre otherwise than I was woont, but also unpleasant to be heard; my voice being rough, rude and churlish: like as it was my hap to so so my familiar friends in that case, who by reason of anger could not reteine and keepe their ordinary fashions and behavior, their force of visage, nor their grace in speech, ne yet that affability and pleasantnesse in company and talke as they were woont.

This was the reason that Caius Gracehus the Oratour, a man by nature blunt, rude in behaviour, and withall over-earnest and violent in his maner of pleading, had a little flute or pipe made for the nonce, such as Musicians are woomt to guide and rule the voice gently by little and little up and downe, betweene base to treble, according to everie note as they would themselves, teaching their scholars thereby to have a tunable voice. Now when Gracehus pleaded at the barrest any time, he had one of his servants standing with such a pipe behinde him: who observing when his master was a little out of tune, would sound a more mild and pleasant note unto a him, whereby he reclaimed and called him backe from that loude exclaiming, and so taking downe that rough and swelling accent of his voice,

Like as the N cat-heards pipes foshrill made of the marrish reeds fo tight; The joints whereof with waxe they fill, refound a tune for their delight: Which while the heard ain field they keepe, Brings them at length to pleasant sleepe.

dulced and allaied the cholericke palition of the orator. Certes my felle, if I had a pretie page to attend upon me, who were diligent, necessarie and handsome about me, would not be offended at but verie well content, that when he saw me angrie he should by and by present a mirror or looking glasse unto me, such a one as they use to bring and shew unto some that newly are come out of the baine, although no good or profit at all they have thereby. But certainely for man to see himselfe at such a time, how disquieted he is, how farre out of the way and beside the course of nature, it were no small meanes to checke this passion, and to set him in hatted the tewith for ever after. They who are delighted in tales and fables, doe report by way of metric speech and passime, that once when Minerva was a piping, there came a Satyre and admonished bet, that it was not for her to play upon a slute; but she for the time tooke no heed to that advertisement of his, notwithstanding he spake thus unto her:

This forme of face becomes you not, lay up your pipes, take armes in hand: But fir it this would not be forgot, your cheekes to lay shat puft now fland,

But afterwards when she had seene her face in a certaine river, what a paire of cheekes she had gotten with her piping, she was displeased with her selfe and slung away her pipes: And yet this art and skill of playing well upon the pipe, yeeldeth some comfort and maketh amends for the deformitte of a disfigured visage, with the melodious tune and harmonie that it affoordeth; yea and afterwards, Marsyas the Minstrell (as it is thought) devised first with a certaine hood and muzzle sastened round about the mouth, as well to restraine and keepe downe the violence of the blast enclosed thus by force, as also to correct and hide the deformitie and undecent inequa-50 little of the visage;

With glittring gold both cheekes as farre as temples he did binde: The tender mouth with thongs likewife, fust knit the necke behinde.

But anger contratiwile, as it doth puffe up and firetch out the vilage after an unfeemely maner, fo much more it fendeth out undecent and unpleafant voice,

And stirs the strings at secret note of heart Which touched should not be, but by a part.

The fea verily, when being troubled and difquieted with bluftring winds, it caffeth up moffe, reits, and fuch like weeds (they fay) it is cleanfed andpurged thereby : but the diffolute, bitter, fourrile, and foolish speeches, which anger sendeth out of the minde when it is turned upside downe, first pollute and defile the speakers themselves, and fill them full of infamy, for that they be thought to have their hearts full of fuch ordure and filthinesse at all times; but the same lurketh there, untill that choler discovereth it: And therefore, they pay most decrely for their speech, the lightest matter of all others (as Plato faith) in that they suffer this heavie and grie-10 your punishment, to be held and reputed for malicious enemies, curfed speakers, and ill conditioned persons. Which I seeing and observing well enough, it falleth out that I reason with my felfe, & alwaies call to mind, what a good thing it is in a feaver, but much better in a fit of choler to have a tongue faire, even and fmooth: For in them that be ficke of an ague, if the tongue be not fuch as naturally it ought to be, an ill figne it is, but not a cause of any harme or indisposition within. Howbeit, if their tongues who are angry, be once rough, foule, and running diffolutely at random to abfurd speeches, it casteth foorth outragious and contumelious language, the verie mother and work-mistresse of irreconciliable enmitte, and bewraieth an hidden and fecret maliciousnes. As for wine, if a man drinke it, of it selfe undelaied with water, it putteth foorth no fuch wantonnesse, no disordinate and lewd speeches, like to those that proceed of ire. 20 For drunken talke ferveth to make mirth, and to procure laughter rather than any thing elfe : but words of choler are tempered with bitter gall and rankor. Moreover, he that fitteth filent at the table when others drinke merrily, is odious unto the companie and a trouble: whereas in choler there is nothing more decent and befeeming gravitie, than to be quiet and fay nothing: according as Sappho doth admonish.

> When furious choler once is up, disperst and spred in brest, To keepe the tongue then apt to barke, and let it lie at rest.

The confideration of these things collected thus together, serveth not onely to take heede 30 alwaies unto them that are subject to yre and therewith possessed, but also besides to know throughly the nature of anger: how it is neither generous or manfull, nor yet hath anic thing in it that favoreth of wifedome and magnanimitie. Howbeit the common people interpret the turbulent nature, thereof to be active and meet for action: the threats and menaces thereof, hardineffe and confidence, the peevish and froward unrulinesse to be fortitude and ftrength. Nay some there be who would have the crueltie in it, to be a disposition and dexteritie to atchieve great matters; the implacable malice thereof to be constancio and firme resolution: the morofitie and difficultie to be pleafed; to be the hatred of finne and vice; howbeit herein they do not well but are much deceived, for furely the very actions, motions, geftures, and countenance of cholerike persons do argue and bewray much basenesse and imbecilitie: 40 which we may perceive not onely in these brain-sicke fits that they fall upon little children, and them pluck, twitch, and mifule; flie upon poore feely women, and thinke that they ought to punish and beat their horses, hounds and mules, like unto Cresiphon that samous wrestler and professed champion, who stucke not to spurne and kicke his mule; but also in their tyrannicall and bloudly murders, wherein their crueltie and bitterneffe which declareth their pufillanimity &bale mind; their actions which shew their passions & their doing to others, bewraying a suffering in themselves, may be compared to the stings and bitings of those venemous serpents which be very angrie, exceeding dolorous and burne most themselves when they do inslict the greatest inflamation upon the patients, and put them to most paine: For like as swelling is a fympfome or accident following upon a great wound or hurtin the fleth: even fo it is in the 50 tenderest and softest minds, the more they give place and yeeld unto dolor and passion, the more plentie of choler and anger they utter foorthas proceeding from the greater weaknes. By this you may fee the reason why women ordinarily be more waspish, curst and shrewd than men; ficke folke more testiethan those that are inhealth; old people more waiward and froward than those that be in the floure and vigor of their yeeres; and finally such as be in adversitie and upon whom fortune frowneth, more prone to anger than those who prosper and have the world smiling upon them. The covetous mizer and pinching peni-father is alwaics most angrie with his steward that laieth foorth his monie; the glutton is ever more displeased with his cooke and cater; the jealous husband quickly falleth out and brawleth with his wife; the vaine glorious foole is foonest offended with them that speake anything amisse of him; but the most bitter and intollerable of all others, are ambitious persons in a citie, who lay for high places and dignities, fuch also as are the heads of a faction in a fedition; which is a trouble and mischiefe (as Pindares faith) conspicuous and honorable. Loe, how from that part of the mind which is wounded, greeved, fuffreth most and especially upon infirmitie and weakenesse, arifeth anger, which paffion refembleth not (as one would have it) the finewes of the foule, but is like rather to their stretching spreines and spalmatick convulsions, when it streineth and striveth overmuch in following revenge.

How to bridle anger.

Well, the examples of evill things yeeld no pleafant fight at all, onely they be necessary and I profitable, and for mine owne part supposing the precedents given by those who have caried themselves gently and mildly in their occasions of anger, are most delectable, not onely to behold, but also heare: I begin to contemne and despise those that fay thus:

To man thou hast done wrong : be fure At mans hand wrong for to endure.

Likewise

Downe to the ground with him, fare not his coate,

Spurne him and fet thy foote upon his throate, and other fuch words which ferve to provoke wrath and whet choler; by which fome go about to remoove anger out of the nurcery, and womens chamber into the hall where men do fit and 16 keepe; but heerein they do not well: For prowesse and fortitude according in all other things with juffice, and going fellow-like with her, me thinkes is at strife and debate with her about meekenesse and mildnesse onely, as if the rather became her, and by right apperteined unto her: For otherwhiles it hath beene knowne that the woorst men have gone beyond and surmounted the better. But for a man to erect a Trophee and fet up a triumphall monument in his owne foule against ire (with which as Heractinus faith the conflict is hard and dangerous: for what a man would have he buieth with his life) it is an act of rare valour and victorious puissance, as having in trueth the judgement of reason, for sinewes, tendons, and muskles to encounter and refift passions. Which is the cause that I studie, and am desirous alwaies to reade and gather the fayings and doings, not onely of learned clearks and Philosophers; who asour to Sages and wife men fay, have no gall in them, but also and much rather of Kings, Princes, Tyrants, and Potentates: As for example, such as that was of Antigonus, who hearing his fouldiors upon a time revile him behinde his pavilion, thinking that he heard them not, put forth his ftaffe from under the cloth unto them and faid: A whorfon knaves, could you not go a little farther off, when you meant thus to raile upon us. Likewise when one Arcadian an Argive or Achean never gave over reviling of King Philip, and abufing him in most reprochfull tearnes, yea and to give him warning

So far to flie, untill he thither came Where no man knew nor heard of Philips name.

And afterwards the man was seene (I know not how) in Macedoma; the friends and courtiers 40 of king Philip were in hand with him to have him punished, and that in any wife he should not let him go and escape: Philip contrariwise having him once in his hands, spake gently unto him, used him courteously, sending unto him in his lodging gifts and presents, and so sent him away. And after a certeine time he commanded those courtiours of purpose to enquire what words he gave out of him unto the Greekes: but when everie one made report againe and tellified that he was become another man, and ceafed not to speake woonderfull things in the praise of him; Lo (quoth Philip) then unto them: Am not I a better Phylician than all you, and can I not skill how to cure a foule tongued fellow? Another time at the great folemnitie of the Olympian games, when the Greekes abused him with verie bad language, his familiar friends about him faid they deserved to be sharply chastised and punished, for so miscalling and revi-so ling him, who had beene so good a benefactor of theirs: what would they doe and say then (quoth he) if I should deale hardly by them and doe them shrewd turnes? Semblably, notable and excellent was the carriage of Pilifratus to Thrafibulus : of king Porfenna to Mutius, and of Magas to Philemon, who in a publike and frequent Theatre, had mocked and scoffed at him in this maner,

Magas, there are some letters come unto you from a king

But letter Magas none can reade, nor write for any thing.

Now it chanced afterwards that by a tempest at sea he was cast upon the Port-towno Paratonium, whereof Magas was governor, and so fell into his hands, who did him no other harme, but commaunded one of his guard or officers about him, onely with his naked fword to touch his bare necke, and fo gently to goe his waies and do no more to him: marie afterwards, he fent unto him little bones for cock-all, and a pretie ball to play withall, as if he had beene a childe that had no wit nor discretion, and so fent him home againe in peace. King Prolomans upon a time gelting and fcoffing at a simple and unlearned Gramarian, asked him, who was the father of 10 Peleus: I will answere you fir (quoth he) if you tell me first who was the father of Lague: This was a drie flout and touched King Ptolomaus very neere, in regard of the meane parentage from whence he was descended: whereat, all about the King were mightily offended, and thought it was too broad a jest and from pintolerable. But Prolomaus, if it be not seemely for a King to take and put up a scorne: surely as little decent it is for his person to give a scorne *

Alexander the Great was more bitter and cruell (than otherwise his ordinarie manner was to that here and charmed a world could be a supply of the beautiful formerwhat others) towards Callifthenes and Clytus. But King Porus being taken prifoner by him in a bat-wanung. tell, befought that he would use him royally, or like a King. And when King Alexander demaunded moreover what he had more to fay, and what he would have elfe? No more (quoth he) for under this word Royally is comprised all. And therefore I suppose it is, that the Greeks 20 call the King of the gods, by the name of Miliehius, that is to fay, Milde and sweete as honic. And the Athenians named him Mumactes, which is as much as, Readie to helpe and fuccour: For to punish and torment, pertaineth to divels and the furious fiends of hel: there is no celeftiall, divine, and heavenly thing in it. And like as one faid of King Philip, when he had rafed & destroyed the citie Olynthus: Yea marie, but he is notable to fet up fuch another citie in the place: even so, a man may well say unto Anger; Thou canst overthrow, demolish, marre and pull downe: but to reare and erect againe, to fave, to pardon, and to endure; be the properties of meekneffe, clemencie, mildnes, patience, and moderation: they be the parts (I fav) of Camillus, Metellus, Aristides and Socrates: whereas to Hicke close unto the fleth, to pinch, pricke and bite, are the qualities of pifmires, flies and mice. Moreover and befides, when I looke unto Re-30 venge, and the manner thereof, I finde for the most part, that if men proceede by way of choler, they miffe of their purpose : for commonly all the heat & defire of revenge is spent in biting of lips, gnashing and grating of teeth, vaine running to and fro, in railing words with foolish threats and menaces among, that favour of no wit at all: By which meanes it fareth with them afterwards, as with little children in running of a race, who for feebleneffe being not able to hold out, fall downe before they come unto the goale, whereunto they made fuch ridiculous and foolish haste. And therfore in my conceit, it was not an improper answere which a certaine Rhodian made unto one of the Lictours and officers of a Romane Generall or Lord Proctor, who with wide mouth bauled at him, and made a glorious bragging and boafting. I paffe not (quoth he) one whit what thou failt; I care rather for that which he thinkerh there, that faith nothing, 40 In like manner Sophocles when he had brought in Eurypylus and Neoprolemus all armed, speaketh bravely in their commendation thus,

They dealt nothreates in vaine, no taunts they made, nor boasting words: But to t they went and on their skeelds they laid on load with fwords.

And verily, some barbarous nations there are who use to poison their swords, & other weapons of iron; but valour hath no need at all of the venim of choler, for dipped it is in reason & judgement; whereas whatfoever is corrupted with ire and furie is brittle, rotten, and easie to be broken into pieces. Which is the reason that the Lacedæmonians doe allay the choler of their 50 fouldiors, when they are fighting with the melodious found of flutes and pipes; whose manner is also before they goe to battell, to facrifice unto the Muses, to the ende that their reason and right wits may remaine in them still, and that they may have use thereof: yea, and when they have put their enemies to flight, they never pursue after nor follow the chase, but reclaime and hold their furious anger within compaffe, which they are able to weld and manage as they lift; no lesse than these daggers or courtlaces which are of a meane size and reasonable length. Contrariwife, anger hath beene the cause that many thousands have come short of the execution of vengeance, and milearried by the way. As for example, Cyrus and Pelopidas the Thebane among the reft. But Agathaeles endured patiently to heare himselfe reproched and reviled, by those whom hee besteged: and when one of them said: You Potter there? Heare you? Where will you have silver to pay your mercenarie souldiers and strangers their wages? Hee laughed againe and made answere; Even out of this citie when I have once forced it. Some there were also that mocked and scorned Anigonas from the verie walles, and twitted him with his deformitie and evill savoured face. But he said no more than thus, Why! And I tooke my selfe before to have beene verie faire and well savoured. Now when he had woon the towne he sold in open port-sale those that had so southed him, protesting withal unto them, that if from that time forward they mocked him any more, he would tell their masters of them and call them to account.

Moreover, I doe fee that hunters, yea, and oratours also commit many faults in their choler. And Ariftotle doth report, that the friends of Satyrus the Oratour, in one cause that he had to plead for them, stopped his eares with waxe, for feare lest that he, when he heard his adversaries to raile upon him in their pleas, thould marre all in his anger. And do not (I pray you) we our felves many times miffe of punishing our fervants by this meanes, when they have done fome faults: for when they heare us to threaten, and give out in our anger, that we will doe thus and thus unto them, they be so frighted that they runne away farre enough off from us. Like as nurfes therefore, are wont to fay unto their little children: Crie not, and you shall have this or that; fo we shall do very wels to speake unto our choler in this wife; Make no such haste, soft and faire, keepe not fuch a crying, make not fo loud a noife, be not fo eager and urgent upon the point; 20 fo shall you see every thing that you would have, sooner done and much better. And thus a father, when he feeth his childe going about to cut or cleave any thing with a knife or edge toole, taketh the toole or knife out of his hand, and doth it himselfe; even so he that doth take revenge out of the hands of choler, punisheth not himselfe, but him that deserveth it: and thus he doth furely, putting his owne person in no danger, without damage and losse, nay, with great profit and commodity. Now, whereas all passions whatsoever of the minde had need of use and cuflome, to tame (as it were) and vanquish by exercise, that which in them is unruely, rebellious and disobedient to reason: certes, in no one point besides had we need to be more exercised, (I meane as touching those dealings that we have with our housholde servants) than in anger: for there is no envy & emulation that arifeth in us toward the, there is no feare that we need to have 30 of them, neither any ambition that troublethor pricketh us against them; but ordinary and continual fits of anger we have every day with them, which breed much offence and many errours, causing us to tread awry, to slip and do amisse sundry waies, by reason of that licentious libertie unto which we give our felves, all the whiles that there is none to controll, none to flay, none to forbid and hinder us : and therefore being in fo ticklish a place, and none to sustaine and holde us up, soone we catch a fall, and come downe at once. And a hard matter it is (I may say to you) when we are not bound to render an account to any one, in fuch a passion as this, to keepe our felves upright, and not to offend; unleffe we take order before-hand to restraine and empale (as it were) round about, fo great a libertie with meeknesse and elemencie, unlesse (I say) we be well inured and acquainted to beare and endure many shrewd and unhappy words of our wives, 40 much unkinde language of friends and familiars, who many times do chalenge us for being too remisse, over-gentle, yea, and altogether carelesse and negligent in this behalfe. And this in tructh, hath bene the principall cause that I have bene quicke and sharpe unto my servants, for feare lest they might proove the woorse for not being chastised. But at the last, though lateit were, I perceived; First, that better it was by long sufferance and indulgence, to make them formewhat woorfe, than in feeking to reforme and amend others, to diforder and spoile my felfe with bitternesse and choler: Secondly, when I saw many of them often-times, even because they were not so punished, scarc and shame to do evil, and how pardon and forgivenesse was the beginning of their repentance and conversion, rather than rigour and punishment; and that I affure you, they would ferve fome more willingly with a nod or winke of the eie, and without a 50 word spoken, than others with all their beating and whipping: I was at last perswaded in my minde and refolved, that reason was more woorthy to command and rule as a master, than ire and wrath. For true it is not that the Poet faith:

Where ever is feare, Shame also is there:

but cleane contrary: Looke who are bashfull and ashamed; in them there is imprinted a certaine searce that holdesh them in good order: whereas continual beating and laying on without mercy, breedeth not repentance in fervants for evill doing, but rather a kinde of forecast and providence, how they should not be spied nor taken in their evill doing. Thirdly, calling to remembrance, and confidering evermore with my felfe, that he who taught us to shoot, forbad us notto draw a bowe or to shoot an arrow, but to misse the marke: no more will this be any let or hinderance, but that we may chaftife and punish our servants, if we be taught to do it in time and place, with moderation and measure, profitably, and decently as it apperteineth. And verily I do enforce my felfe, and strive to master my choler and subdue it principally, not denying unto them who are to be punished, the libertie and meanes to justifie themselves, but in hearing them to speake what they can for their excuse. For as time and space doeth in the meane time finde 10 the paffion occupied another way, and withall bring a certaine delay, which doeth flacke and les downe (as it were) the vehemencie and violence thereof; fo judgement of reason, all the while meeteth both with a decent maner and also with a convenient meane and measure of doing punifhment accordingly. And besides, this course and maner of proceeding, leaveth him that is punished, no cause, occasion or pretense at all, to resist and strive againe, considering that he is chastised and corrected not in choler and anger, but being first convinced, that he had well deferved his correction: and (which were yet woorfe than all the rest) the servant shall not have vantage to speake more justly and to better reason than his master. Well then, like as Phocion after the death of Alexander the great, having a care not to fuffer the Athenians to rife overfoone, or make any infurrection before due time, ne yet to give credit rafhly unto the newes of 20 his death: My mafters of Athens (quoth he) if he be dead to day, he will be dead to morow alfo and three dates hence to; even so thould a man (in mine opinion) who by the impulsion and infligation of anger, maketh hafte to take punishment, thus fuggest and secretly say to himselfe: If this servant of mine hath made a fault to day, it will be as true to morrow, and the next day after that he hath done a fault; neither will there be any harme or danger at all come of it, if hee chaunce to be punished with the latest: but believe me, if he be punished over-soone, it will be alwaies thought that he had wrong, and did not offend: a thing that I have known to happen full often. For which of us all is so curst & cruel, as to punish and scourge a servant, for burning the roalt five orten daies ago? or for that follong before he chanced to overthrow the table? or was somewhat with the flowest in making answer to his Master; or did his errand or other busi-30 nes not so soone as he should? and yet we see these & such like be the ordinary causes for which (whiles they be fresh and new done) we take on, we stampe and stare, we chase, we frowne, we are implacable and will heare of no pardon: And no marvaile, for like as any bodies feeme bigger through a mist; even so every thing appeareth greater than it is, through anger, And therefore at these and such like faults, we should winke for the time, and make as though we fawthem not, and yet thinke upon them nevertheleffe, and beare them in minde. But afterwards when the storme is well overblowen, we are with out passion, & do not suspect our selves, then we may do well to confider thereof: and then if upon mature deliberation, when our mind is staied and our senses settled, the thing appeare to be naught, we are to hate and abhor it, and in no wife either to for-let and put of, or altogether to omit and forbeare correction, like as 40 they refuse meats who have no stomacke nor appetite to eat. For certeinly it is not a thing so much to be blamed, for to punish one in anger, as not to punish when anger is past and alaied, and so to be retchlesse and desolute: doing as idle mariners, who so long as the sea is calme and the weather faire, loiter within the harbor or haven, but afterwards when a tempest is up, fpread failes and put themselves into danger. For even so we, condemning and neglecting the remissionesse and calmnesse of reason in case of punishment, make haste to execute the same during the heat of choler, which no doubt is a bluftring and turbulent winde. As for meat he calleth for it in deed, and taketh it naturally who is a hungrie; but furely he executeth punishment best, who neither hungreth nor thirsteth after it: neither hath he need to use choler as a fance or deintie di(h for to get him a ftomacke and appetite to correct: but even when he is farso thest off from desire of revenge, then of necessitie he is to make use of reason and wildome to direct him : for we ought not to do, as Aristotle writeth in his time the maner was in Tuskane; To whip fervants with found of flutes and hauthoies; namely to make a sport and pastime of punishing men, and to folace our felves with their punishment for pleasures sake, and then afterwards when we have done, repent us of it: for as the one is brutish and beastlike; so the other is as womanish and unmanly: but without griefe and pleasure both, at what time as reason and judgement is in force, we ought to let justice take punishment, and leave none occasion at all for choler to get advantage. But peradventure some one will say, that this is not properly the way to remedie or cure anger; but rather a putting by or precaution that we should not commit any of those faults which ordinarily follow that passion: Unto whom I answere thus; That the swelling of the Spleene is not the cause but a symptome or accident of a sever-showbeit if the said humour be fallen and the paine mitigated, the seaver also will be much eased, according as Hieronymus saith. Also when I consider by what meanes choler is engendred: I see that one falleth into it upon this cause, another upon that; but in all of them, it seemeth this generall opinion there is, that they thinke themselves to be despised and naught set by. And therefore we ought to meet with such as seeme to defend and mainteine themselves, as being angry for just cause, and to cure them after this maner; namely, by diverting and remooving from them, as fat as ever we cau, all sufficion of contempt and contumacie in those that have offended them and no oved their anger; in laying the fault upon inconsiderate follie, necessitie, sicknesse, infirmitie and miscrie, as Sophocles did in these verses,

For those my Lords whose state is in destresse, Have not their spirits and wits as heretosore: As sortune frownes, they waxen ever lesse, Nay gone are quite, though fresh they were besore.

And Agamemon, albeit he laid the taking away of Brifeit from Achilles upon Ate (that is to fay) forme fatall infortunitie, yet

He willing was and proft him to content,

And unto him rich gifts for to prefent. For to befeech and intreat, are figures of a man that despiseth not, and when the partie who hath given offence becometh humble and lowly, he remooveth all the opinion that might be conceived of contempt. But he that is in a fit of choler must not attend and waite until he see that, but rather helpe himselfe with the answer of Diogenes. These sellowes here said one unto him, do deride thee Diogenes; but I (quoth he againe) do not finde that I am derided; even so ought a man who is angry not to be perswaded that he is contemmed of another, but rather that himfelfe hath just cause to contemne him, and to thinke that the fault committed did proceed of infirmitie, error, heady-raffinesse, sloth and idlenesse, a base and illiberall minde, age or youth. And as for our fervants and friends we must by all meanes quit them hereof, or pardon them at leastwife: For furely they cannot be thought to contemne us, in regard that they thinke us 10 unable to be revenged, or men of no execution if we went about it: but it is either by reason of our remissenes and mildnesse, or else of our love and affection that we seeme to be smally regarded by them, whiles our fervants prefume of our tractable nature, easie to be pacified, and our friends of our exceeding love that cannot be soone shaken off, But now we are provoked to anger, not onely against our wives, or servitors and friends, as being contemned by them; but also many times in our choler we fall upon In-keepers, Mariners and Muliters, when they be drunke, supposing that they despite us. And that which more is, we are offended with dogs when they bay or barke at us; and with affes if they chance to fling out and kicke us. Like unto him who lifted up his hand to strike and beat him that did drive an affe; and when the man cried that he was an Athenian: But thou I am fure art no Athenian (quoth he) to the affe, and laid up-40 on the poore beaft as hard as he could, and gave him many a blow with his cudgell. Butthat which chiefly cauleth us to be angrie, and breedeth a continuall disposition thereto in out minds, caufing us to often to breake out into fits of choler, which by little and little was ingendred and gathered there before, is the love of our owne felves, and a kinde of froward furlineffe hardly to be pleafed, together with a certaine daintineffe and delicacie, which all concurring in one, breed and bring foorth a swarme (as it were) of bees, or rather a waspes neaft in us. And therefore there cannot be a better meanes for to carrie our felves mildly and kindly towards our wives, our fervants, familiars and friends, than a contented minde, and a fingleneffe or fimplicitie of heart, when a man resteth satisfied with whatsoever is present at hand, and requireth neither things superfluous nor exquisite,

But he that never is content
With rost or fod, but cooke is shent:
How over he be serv'd, I meane
With more with lesse, or in a meane:
He is not pleas d, nor one good word
Can give of viands set on board,
Without some snow who drinks no draughs,

Nor eatesh bread in market bought.
Who tasses meate, b'it never lo good,
Serv'd up in dish of earth or wood:
And shinkes no bed nor pillow soft,
Unlesse with downe like sea alost
Stird from beneath; if trut and swell;
For otherwise he sleepes not well.

who with rods and whips plieth and haftneth the fervitors at the table, making them to runne untill they fweat againe, crying and bawling at them to come away apace, as if they were not catorial rying diffuse of meat, but platters and cataplasmes for some instanmation or painfull importance: subjecting himselfe after a slavish manner to a service kinde of diet and life, full of discontenument, quarrels and complaints: little knoweth such an one how by a continual cough, or many concussions & distemperatures, he hath brought his soule to an ulcerous and rheumatike disposition about the seat and place of anger. And therfore we must use the body by frugalitie to take up and learne to be content with a competent meane (forasmuch as they who define but a little, can never be disappointed nor frustrat of much) finding no fault, nor keeping any stir at the beginning about meat, but standing satisfied without saying a word, with that which God sendeth whatsoever it be, not fretting, wexing and tormenting our selves at the table about everiething, and in so doing, serving both our selves and our companie about us of friends, with the most unsavorie messe of meat, that is to wit, choler:

A supper woorse than this I do not see

How poft bly one can devifed bee. Namely, whiles the fervants be beaten, the wife chidden and reviled for the meat burnt, for smoke in the parlor, for want of salt, or for the bread over stale and drie. But Arcestaus upon a time with other friends of his, feafted certaine strangers and hosts of his abroad, whose guest he had beene; and after the supper was come in, and meat fet upon the boord, there wanted bread, by reason that his servants had forgotten and neglected to buy any: for such a fault as this, which of us here would not have cried out that the walles should have burst withall, and beene readie to have throwen the house out of the window? And he laughing at the matter: He had 30 need be a wife man (quoth he) I fee well, that would make a feast and set it out as it should be. Socrates also upon a time, when he came from the wreftling schoole, tooke Enthydemin home with him to supper: but Xantippe his wife fel a chiding and scoulding with him at the boord, reviling him with most bitter tearmes, so long, until at last in an anger downe went table and all that was upon it: Whereupon Euthydemm arose, and was about to depart; but Socrates: Will you be gone (quoth he?) Why, do you not remember that the other day as we fat at supper in your house, there flew up to the boord a hen and did as much for you? and yet were not we offended nor angrie for the matter. And in verie truth, we must entertaine our friends and guests, with courtefic, mirth, a fmiling countenance, and affectionate love : and not to brow-beat them, nor yet put the fervitors in a fright, and make them quake and tremble with our frowning 40 lookes. Also we ought so to accustoine our selves that we may be content to be served with any kinde of veffels what foever, and not upon a daintine ffe to have a minde to this, rather then to that, but to like all indifferently. And yet there be some so divers, that although there be manie cups and goblets standing upon the boord, choose one from the rest, and cannot drinke forfooth but out of that one : according as the Stories doe report of Marine , who loved one mazar, and could drinke our of no other. Thus they doe by their oile cruets and currying combs or rubbers, when they are at the baines or flouphes, taking a fancie and affection to fome one above the reft; but if it chaunce that one of them be cracke, broken, or be loft and miscarie any way, then they are exceeding largerie and fall to beating of their fervants. Such men therefore as finde themselves to be cholerike, should do well to torbeare all rare and exquisite things, 50 to wit, pots, cups, feale rings of excellent workmanship and pretious stones. For that such costly jewels if they be marred or lost, breed more anger and fermen out of order, more than those which be ordinarie and easie to be comeby. And therefore when Nero the Emperour had caused to be made a certaine pavilion or rabernacle eight square, which was both for the beautie and cost, exceeding faire and sumptuous, and indeed an admirable piece of worke. In this Tabernacle (quoth Seneca) unto him, you have bewraied of Cafar that you are but a poore man: for if you lole this once, you shall never be able to recover and get the like againe. And to it fell out indeed, for the thip, wherein the fame Tabernacle was, chanced to be cast away upon the fea, and all was drowned. But Nero calling to minde the words of Senten, tooke the loffe more patiently.

Moreover, this contentment of mind, and eafineffe to be pleafed with any thing in the house, causeth a man also to be more gentle, milde, and better contented with his servants and people about him: now if it worke this effect in us toward our housholde fervants, evident it is that we shalbe likewise affected to our friends & those that be under our government. We see also, that flaves new bought, are inquifitive as touching him who hath bought them; not whether he be Superflitious and envious; but whether he be cholerike and hasty or no. And to be briefe, neither can husbands endure the pudicity and honesty of their wives; nor wives the love of their husbands; ne yet friends the mutual conversation one with another, if there doe an angry and 10 cholerike humor goe withall. Thus we see, that neither mariage nor amity be tollerable with choler. Contrariwife, if anger be away, even drunkennesse it selfe is tollerable and we can easily abide it: for the very ferula of god Bacchus is a sufficient punishment of drunkennesse, if so be there be not choler therewith, which may cause Baschus, that is, Strong wine, in stead of Lyam and Chorius, that is to fay, The Loofer of cares and Leader of daunces (which are his furnames) to be called Omesses and Manoles, which signific Cruell and Furious. As for simple madnesse of it selfe alone, the Ellebore growing in Anyeira, is sufficient to cure: but if it be mingled with choler, it causeth Tragicall fits, and those so strange, that a man would repute them for meete fables. And therefore we must not give place to anger, neither in sport and pastime; for in lieu of good will it breedeth enmitie: nor in conference and disputations; for it turneth the love and a crefire of knowledge into debate and contention; nor in deciding and judging causes; because to authority it addeth violence and infolency : nor in the teaching and inftruction of our children; for it maketh them desperate and haters of learning: nor in prosperity; for it encreaseth the envy and grudge of men: ne yet in adverfity, because it taketh away pitty and compassion, when they who are fallen into any misfortune, thew themselves testie, froward and quarellous to those who come to moane and mourne with them. This did Priamm, as we reade in Homer:

Avant (quoth he) you chiding quests; you odious mates be gone : Have you no forrowes of your owne, but you come me to monne?

On the other fide, faire conditions and milde behaviour, yeeldeth fuccour and helpe in some cases; composeth and ordereth matters aright in others; dulceth and alaieth that which is tart and fowre: and in one word, by reason of that kinde, meeke and gentle quality, it overcommeth anger and all waiward testinesse whatsoever. Thus it is reported of Euclides in a quarrell or variance betweene him and his brother: For when his brother had contested and said unto him; I would I might die; if I be not revenged of thee : he inferred againe; Nay, let me die for it, if I perswade thee not otherwise before I have done; by which one word he presently woon his brothers heart, fo that he changed his mind, and they parted friends. Polemon likewife, at a certaine time, when one who loved precious stones, & was sicke for faire & costly rings & such like curious jewels, did raile at him outragiously; answered not a word againe, but looked very wistly up-40 on one of the fignets that the other had, and well confidered the fathion and workemanship thereof: which when the party perceived, taking as it should seeme no small contentment, and being very well pleased that he so perused his jewell; Not so Polemon (quoth he againe) but looke upon it thus, betweene you and the light, and then you will thinke it much more beautifull. Aristippus fell out upon a time (I know not how) with Aeschines, and was in a great choler and fit of anger: How now Ariftippes (quoth one who heard him to high & at fuch hot words) where is your amity & friendship all this while? Mary, asteepe (quoth he) but I wil waken is anon. With that he stept close to Aeschines, and said : Thinke you me so unhappy every way and incurable, that I described not one admonishment at your hands? No marvell (quoth Aeschines againe) if I thought you (who for naturall wit in all things ols excel me) to see better in this case 50 also than I, what is meet and expedient to be done. For true it is that the Poet saith; we the

The boare so wilde, whose necke withbristles strong Is thicke befet, the tender hand and foft Of woman nice, yea and of infant yong, By stroking faire, shall bend and turne (full oft) Much sooner farre, and that with greater ease in ... Than wrestlers strong with all their force and peise.

And we out selves can skill how to tame wilde beasts, we know how to make yoong woolves gentle, yea, and lions whelps other-whiles we cary about with us in our armes: but fee, how we againe afterwards in a raging fit of choler, be ready to fling from us and cast out of our fight, our owne children, our friends and familiars, and all our houdhold fervants, our fellow citizens and neighbours, we let loofe our ire like fome favage and furious beaft, and this rage of ours we disguise and cloke for sooth with a colourable and false name, calling it Hatted of vice. But heerein (I suppose) we doe no otherwise than in the rest of our passions and diseases of the minde; tearming one, Providence and forecast; another Liberalitie; and a third Pietie and religion: and yet for all these pretentes of goodly names, we can not be cured of the vices which

10 they palliate; to wit, Timorousnesse, Prodigalitie and Superstition.

And verily, like as our naturall feed (as Zeno faid) is a certeine mixture and composition, derived and extracted from all the powers and faculties of the foule; even fo, in mine opinion, a man may fay that choler is a mifcellane feed (as it were) and a dregge, made of all the paffions of the mind: for plucked it is from paine, pleafure and infolent violence: Of envie it hath this qualitie to joy in the harmes of other men: it standeth much upon murder, but woorse it is fimply than murder: for the wrathfull person striveth and laboureth not to defend and save himselfe from taking harme; but so he may mischiefe and overthrow another, he careth not to come by a hurt and threwd turne himfelfe. It holdeth likewife of concupifcence and luft, and taketh of it the worfe and more unpleafant part, in cafe it be(as it is indeed) a defire and appetite 20 to greeve, vexe, and harme another. And therefore when we approach and comencere to the houses of luxurious and riotous persons, we heare betimes in the morning a minstrel-wench, founding and playing the Morrow-watch by breake of day: we fee the muddy-grounds and dregs(as one was wont to fay) of the wine, to wir, the vomits of those who cast up their stomacks: we behold the peeces and fragments of broken garlands and chaplets: and at the dore we finde the lackies and pages of them who are within, drunken and heavie in the head with tipling strong wine. But the signes that tell where hastie, cholericke, and angry persons dwell, appeare in the faces of their fervants, in the marks and wales remaining after their whipping, and in their clogs, yrons, and fetters about their feete. For in the honfes of haftie and angrie men, a man shall never heare but one kind of musicke; that is to say, the heavie note of wailing grones 30 and piteous plaints; whiles either the ftewards within are whipped and fcourged, or the maidens racked & put to torture, in fuch fort that you would pitte to fee the dolors & paines of yre which the fuffreth in those things that the lusteth after & taketh pleasure in. And yet as many of us as happen to be truly & justly surprised with choler oftentimes, for the hatred & detestation that we have of vices, ought to cut off that which is exceffive therein and beyond measure, together with our over-light beleefe and credulitie of reports concerning fuch as converse with us: For this is one of the causes that most of all doth engender and augment choler, when either he whom we tooke for an honest man proove th dishonest, and is detected for some naughtineffe, or whom we reputed our friend is fallen into fome quarrell and variance with us: as for my felfe, you know my nature and disposition, what small occasions make me both to love men ef-40 fectually, and also to trust them confidently; and therefore (just as it falleth out with them who go over a false floore where the ground is not fast, but hollow under their feete) where I leane most and put my greatest trust for the love that I beare, there I offend most and soonest catch a fall: there (I fay) am I grieved most also, when I see how I was deceived: As for that exceeding inclination and frowardnes of mind, thus to love and affect a man, could I never yet to this day weane my felfe from, so inbred it is and fetled in me: mary to stay my felfe from giving credit over-halfily and too much, I may peradventure use that bridle which Plato speaketh of, to wit, wary circumspection: for in recommending the Mathematician Helicon, I praise him (quoth he) for a man, that is as much to fay, as a creature by nature mutable and apt to change. And even those who have beene well brought up in a citie, to wit, in Athens, he saith that he is 50 afraid likewife of them, left being men, and comming from the feed of man, they do not one time or other bewray the weaknesse and infirmitie of humane nature: and Sophocles when he fpeaketh thus, feemeth to clip our wings, and disable us wonderfully. Howbeit this difficultie and caution in judging of men and pleasing our felves in the choise of friends, will cause us to be more tractable and moderate in our anger: for whatfoever commeth fodainly and unexpected, the fame

Who list to fearch through all deeds of mankind More badthen good he shall be sure to find.

some transporteth us beside our selves. We ought moreover as Panatius teacheth us in one place to practife the example of Anaxagoras, and like as he faid when newes came of his fons death; I know well (quoth he) that I begat him a mortall man; fo in every fault of our fervants or others that shall whetten our choler, ech one of us may fing this note to himselfe: I knew wel that when I bought this flave, he was not a wife Philosopher: I wist also, that I had gotten for my friend not one altogether void of affections and passions: neither was I ignorant when I took a wife, that I wedded a woman. Now if withall a man would evermore when he feeth others do amisse, adde this more unto the dittie as Plate teacheth us, and sing thus: Amnot I also such an other? turning the discursion of his judgement from things abroad, to those which are with! in himfelfe, and among his complaints and reprehensions of other men, come in with a cer- to teine caveat of his owne, and feare to be reproved himselse in the like; he would not haply be so quicke & forward in the hatred and detellation of other mens vices, feeing that himselfe hath so much need of pardon, But on the contrary fide, every one of us when he is in the heat of choler and punisheth another, hath these words of severe Aristides and precise Cato ready enough in his mouth : Steale not Sirrha: Make no more lies : Why art thou so idle then? &c. To conclude (that which of all others is most unseemely and absurd) we reproove in anger, others for being angry; and fuch faults as were committed in choler, those our selves will punish in choler; not verily as the Phylicians useto do, who

A bitter medicine into the body poure,

When bitter choler they meane to purge and scoure.

But we rather doe encrease the same with our bitternesse, and make more trouble than was before. And therefore when I thinke and discourse with my selfe of these matters, I endevour with all and assay to cut off somewhat from needlesse curiositie. For surely this narrow searching and streight looking into everie thing, for to spie and find out a fault; as for example to sift thy servant and call hum into question for all his idle houres; to prie into every action of thy friend; to see where about thy some goeth, and how he spendeth all his time; to listen what whispering there is betweene thy wise and another, be the verie meanes to breed much anger, daily braules, and continuall jarres, which grow in the end to the height of curstnesse and towardnes, hard to be pleased with any thing whatsoever. For according as Europides saith in one place, we ought in some fort to do:

All great affaires God ay himselfe directeth, But matters small, to Fortune he committesh.

For mine owne part, I do not thinke it good to commit any busines to Fortune; neither would Thave a man of understanding to be retchlesse in his owne occasions: But with some things to put his wife in trust; others to make over unto fervants, and in some matters to use his friends, Herein to beare himselfe like a Prince and great commaunder, having under him his Deputies, Governours, Receivers, Auditors, and Procurators; referving unto himfelfe and to the dispofition of his owne judgement, the principall affaires, and those of greatest importance. For like as little letters or a small print do more offend and trouble the eies then greater, for that the eies be verie intentive upon them; even fo, small matters doe quickly moove choler, which thereup- 40 on soone getteth an ill custome in weightier matters. But above all, I ever reckon that saying of Empedocles to be a divine precept and heavenly oracle, which admonished us To fast from sin. I commended also these points and observations, as being right honest, commendable, and befeeming him, that maketh profession of wisedome and philosophie, which we use to you unto the gods in our praiers: Namely, To forbeare both wine and women, and so to live sober and chaste a whole yeere together, and in the meane while to ferve God with a pure and undefiled heart: Alfo, to limit and fet out a certaine time, wherein we would not make a lie, observing precisely not to speake any vaine and idle word, either in earnest or in bourd. With these and such like observations also, I acquainted and furnished my foule, as being no lesse affected to religion and godlines, than fludious of learning and philosophic: Namely, first enjoined my selfe to passe a certaine sew so Holy-daies without being angrie, or offended upon any occasion what loever; no leffe than I would have yowed to forbeare drunkennesse, and abstaine altogether from wine, as if I sacrificed at the feast Nephalta [wherein no wine was spent] or celebrated the solemnitie Melisponda, [in which Honie onely was used.] Thus having made an entrance; I tried afterwards a moneth or two by little and little what I could do, and ever I gained more and more time, exercising my felfe still to forbeare sinne with all my power and might. Thus I proceeded and went forward daily, bleffing my felfe with good words and striving to be milde, quiet and voide of malice, pure and cleane from evill speeches and lend deeds: but principally from that passion which for a little pleasure, and the same not verie lovely, bringeth with it great troubles and shamefull repentance in the end. Thus with the grace of God, affishing me somewhat (as I take it) in this good resolution and course of mine, experience it selfe approved and confirmed my first the and judgement, whereby I was taught, That this mildnesse, clemency, and debonaire humanitie, is to none of our samiliars who live and converse daily with us, so sweete, so pleasant and agreeable, as thour selves who have these vertues and good qualities within us.

OF CVRIOSITIE.

The Summarie.

HE former Treatife hath sewed unto us, how many mischiefes and inconveniences Anger causeth, teaching us the meanes how to beware of it. Now Plutarch dealeth with another vice no lesse dangerous than it, which bendesh to the opposite eventy. For whereas ire doth so bereave aman of the use of reason during the accessed and six thereof, that the cholericke and suitous persons after not one from another, but in the theorem, that the cholericke and suitous persons after not one from another, but in the pace of time. This curioficie which now is in hand, being masked under the name of wifedome and habilitie of spirit is (to say a trueth) a covert and hidden furie, which carrieth the minde of the curious person past himselfe, for to gather and heape from all parts the ordere and suthingse of another, and afterwards to bring the same into himselfe, and to make thereof a verie store-house, for to infect his owne felfe first, and then others, according as the malignitic and malice, the follies, backbiting, and 30 flanders of these curious folke do sufficiently declare. To the ende therefore that everie man who loveth vertue should divert from such a maladie, our author sheweth that the principall remedie for to preserve us from it, is to turne this curiostic to our owne selves; namely, to examine our owne persons more diligently than others. Which point he amplifieth by setting downe on the contrary side, the blindneffe of those who are over-busic and curious. Then comment he to declare, why a curious person goesh foorth alwaies out of his owne house for to enter into another mans; to wit, because of his owne filthineste which by that meanes he cannot smell and perceive; but whiles he will needs go to stirre and rake into the life of others, he fnareth and entangleth himselfe, and so perisheth in his owne folly and indifcretion. Afterwards proceeding to preferibe the remedies for the cure of curiositie, when he had deciphered the villanies and indignities thereof, together with the nature of curious persons, and the 40 enormous vices which accompanie them, he requireth at our hands, that we should not be desirous to know things which be vile, base, lewdor unprofitable; that we should hold in our eies, and not cast them at random and aventure within the house of another, that we should not seeke after the bruite and rumours that are fread in meetings and companies; that we otherwhiles should forbeare even (uch things, whereof the use is lawfull and permitted: also to take heed that we doe not enter nor found too deepe into our owne affaires; Finally, not to be rash and heady in those things that we do, be they never so small. All these points premised, he advene to with inductions, simulitudes and choise examples, and kmitteth up all with one conclusion, which prooves by that curious solk ought to be ranged among the most mischievous and dangerous persons in the world.

OF CVRIOSITIE.

He best way haply it were altogether to avoid an house and not therein at all to dwell, which is close without fresh aire, darke, standing bleake and colde, or otherwise unhealthfull: Howbeit, if a man by reason that he hath beene long used to such an house, delight in that seat, and will there abide, he may either by altering the prospects and remooving the lights, or by changing the staires in to another place, or essentially opening the dores of one side, & shutting them upon another, make the house more lightsome, better exposed to the wind for to receive fresh aire, & in one word more holfome than before. And verily fome have much amended whole cities by the like alterations: as for example, men fay that one Charon in times past turned my native citie and place of nativitie Charonea to lie castward, which before looked toward the westerne winde Zephyrus, and received the funne fetting from the mount Pernaffus. And Empedocles the natural Philofopher, by flopping up the mouth or deepe chinke of a certeine mountaine between two rocks, which breathed out a noisome and pestilent southerne winde upon all the champian countrey and plaine underneath, was thought to have put by the plague, which by occasion of that wind a reigned ordinarily before in that countrie. Now for a finuch as there be certeine hurtfull and pelliferous passions, which fend up into our soule tempestuous troubles and darknesse, it were to be wished, that they were chased out quite, and throwne downe to the very ground; whereby we might give our felves a free prospect, an open and cleere light, a fresh and pure aire; or if we be not so happie, yet at least wife endevour, we ought by all meanes possible to change, alter, translate, transpose and turne them so about, as they may be found more fit and commodious to serve our turnes. As for example, and to go no farther for the matter, Curiositie, which I take to be a defire to know the faults and imperfections in other men, is a vice or difease which feemeth not cleere of envie and maliciousnesse: And unto him that is insected therewith may very well be faid, avert thine cies a little from things without, and turne thy much medling and curiofity to those that be within. If thou take so great a pleasure and delight to deale in the Knowledge and Historie of evill matters, thou halt worke enough iwis at home, thou shalt finde plentie thereof within to occupie thy selfe;

Most spignsfull and envious man, why doest shou ever finde Wishpiercing cies thy neighbours faults, and in thine owneart blinde?

For looke what water run's along an 18thus or Islewe see, Or leaves lie spred about the Oke, which numbred cannot be.

Such a multitude shalt thou finde of sinnes in thy life, of passions in thy soule, and of overfights in thy duties. For like as Xenophon saith, That good stewards of an houshold have one proper roome by it selfe for those utensiles or implements which serve for sacrifice; another for vessell that cometh to the table; in one place he laieth up the instruments & tooles for tillage and husbandry, and in another apart from the rest, he bestoweth weapons, armour, and furniture for the wars; even so shalt thou see within thy selfe a number of manifold vices how they are digested: some proceeding from envie, others from jealousse; some from idlenesse, others from nigardise: take account of these (I advise thee) survey and peruse them over well: shut all the dores so and windowes that yeeld prospect unto thy neighbors: stop up the avennes that give accesse and windowes that yeeld prospect unto thy neighbors: stop up the avennes that give accesse and other lodgings for men, into thy wives cabinet & the nourcery, into the roomes where thy fervants keepe: There shalt thou meet wherewith to amuse and busic thy selfe: there may curiositie and desire to know every thing be emploied in exercises, neither unprofitable nor malicious: nay, in such as be commodious, holsome and tending to salvation: namely, whiles every one calleth himselse to account, saying thus,

Where

Where have I beene, what good I have done, or what have I missione? Where have I slipt, what duty begun is left by me undone?

But now according as fables make report, that Lamia the Witch whiles the is at home is starke blind, & doth nothing but sing, having her cies thut up close within a little boxe; but when the meanes to go abroad, the takes them foorth, and setteth them in their right place, and seeth well enough with them; even so, every one of us when we go foorth; fet unto that evill meaning and intention which we have to others, an cie to looke into them, and that is curiosity and overgo much medling; but in our owne errors, saults and trespasse we thunble and faile through ignorance, as having neither cies to see, nor light about them whereby they may be seene. And therefore it is, that a busic sellow and curious medler, doth more good to his enimies than to himself; for their faults he discoveres & bringesh to light, to them he shewesth what they ought to beware of, and what they are to amend; but all this while he overseeth, or rather seeth not the most things that are done at home; so deeply antised he is and busic in spying what is amiste abroad. Howheir wise using would not abide to speake and confer with his owne mother; before he had enquired of the Prophet those things for which he went downe into hel; and when hee had once heard them; then he turned to his mother and other women also, asking what was Tyro? what was Chloris? and for what was the occasion and cause that Eperaste came by her of the starts.

Who knit her necke within a deadly string, And so from beame of losty house did hing.

But we quite contrary, fitting still in supine idlenesse, and ignorance, neglecting and never regarding that which concerneth our felves, goe to fearch into the genealogie and pedigrees of others; and we can tell readily, that our neighbours grandfather was no better than a base and fervile Syrian; that his nourse came out of barbarous Thracia; that such an one is in debt, and oweth three talents, and is behinde hand befides, and in arrerages for non-paiment of interest for the use thereof. Inquisitive also we are in such matters as these: From whence came such a mans wife? what it was that such a one and such a one spake when they were alone together in o an odde corner? Socrates was cleane of another quality; he would goe up and downe enquiring and casting about what were the reasons wherewith Pythagoras perswaded men to his opinion. Aristippus likewise, at the solemnitie of the Olympian games, falling into the companie of Ifchomachus, asked of him, what were the perswasions that Socrates used to yong folk, wherby they became so affectionate unto him; and after he had received from him some small seeds (as it were) and a few famples of those reasons & arguments, he was so mooved and passionate therewith, that prefently his body fell away, he looked pale, poore and leane, untill he having failed to Athens in this woonderfull thirst and ardent heat, had drunke his fill at the fountaine and wellhead it selfe, knowen the man, heard his discourses and learned his Philosophie; the summe and effect whereof was this: That a man should first know his owne maladies, and then the meanes o to be cured and delivered of them. But some there be, who of all things can not abide to see their ownelife, as being unto them the most unpleasant fight of all others; neither love they to bend and turne their reason as a light to their owne selves : but their minde being full of all sorts of evill, searing and ready to quake for to beholde what things are within, leapeth foorth (as one would fay) out of doores, and goeth wandring to and fro, searching into the deeds and words of other men, and by this meanes feedeth and fatteth (as it were) her owne malicious naughtinesse. For like as a hen many times having meat enough within house set before her, loveth to go into some corner, and there keepeth a pecking and scraping of the ground,

To finde perhaps one feely barley corne As she was woont on downg hill beertoforne;

so even for these busine Polypragmons, passing by those ordinary speeches and matters which are exposed and open for every man; not regarding (I say) the reports and narrations which are free for each one to discourse of, and which neither any man hash to doe, to forbid and warne them for to aske and enquire of, nor will be displeased if peradventure hee should be demanded and asked the question of them, goe up and downe in the meane time to gather and learne all the secret and hidden evils of every house. Certes, a prety answere it was of an Aegyptian, and pertinent to the purpose, who when one asked him, what it was that he caried covered all over, and so enwrapped within a cloth: Mary (quoth he) covered it is even for this cause, that thou shouldest not know what it is : And thou likewise, that art so busie, why does thou inter. meddle in that which is concealed ? Be fure, that if there were no evill therein, keptclosen should not be. And verily, it is not the maner and custome for any body to enter boldly into the house of another man, without knocking at the doore; for which purpose we use Porters in these daies; whereas in olde time there were rings and hammers which served the turne, and by rapping at the gates, gave warning to those within, to the end that no stranger might meet the miltreffe at unawares in the hall or mids of the house; or come suddenly upon a virgin or yong damofell her daughter, and find her out of her chamber; or take fome of the fervants a beating, or the wenches and chambermaids chiding and fooulding aloud: whereas a bufie fellow loveth a-life to step secretly into a house, forto see and heare such disorders; and you shall never know him willingly to come and fee an honeft house and well governed (though one should call and pray him never fo faire,) but ready he is to discover and set abroad in the view of the whole world fuch things; for which we use locks, keies, bolts, barres, portals and gate-houses. Those windes (faith Ariston) are we most troubled and offended with, which drive open our cloaks and garments that cover us, or blow and whiske them over our heads: but buffe Polypragmons doth lay abroad and display not the cloaks of their neighbours nor their coats; but discovereth their walles, setteth wide open their doores, and like a winde, pierceth, creepeth and entrethso farre, as to the tender bodied and foft skinned maiden, fearching and inquiring in every bacchi. nall, in all dauncings, wakes and night fealts, for some matter to raise flanders of her. And as one Clean was noted by an olde Comicall Poet upon the Stage,

Whose hands were both in Actolic,

But heart and minde in Clopidic; Even so the spirit of a curious and busic person, is at one time in the stately palaces of richard mighty men, in the little houses of meane and poore folke, in Kings Courts, and in the bedchambers of new wedded wives; it is inquisitive in all matters, searching aswell the affairesof strangers and travellers, as negotiations of Lords and Rulers, and other-while not without danger of his owne person. For much like as if a man upon a kinde of wanton curiositie, will needs be talting of Aconite or Libard baine, to know (for footh) the quality of it, commeth by a milchiefe, & dieth of it before he can know any thing therof; fo they that love to be prying into the faults of great persons, many times overthrow themselves before they come to any knowledge. For fuch as can not be content with the abundant raies and radiant beames of the Sunne which are spread so cleere over all things, but will needs strive and force themselves impudently to looke full upon the circle of his body, and audaciously will presume and venture to pierce his brightnesse, and enter into the very minds of his inward light, commonly dazzle their eies, and become starke blinde. And therefore well and properly answered Philippides the writer of Comedies upon a time when King Lysimachus spake thus unto him; What wouldest thou have me to impart unto thee of my goods, Philippides? What it pleafeth your Maiesty (quoth he) so it be nothing of your fecrets. For to fay a truth, the most pleasant and beautifull things simply, which belong to the estate of Kings, do show without, and are exposed to the view and sight of every man; to wit, their fumptuous feafts, their wealth and riches, their magnificent port and 40 and pompe in publike places, their bountifull favours, and liberall gifts: But is there any thing fecret and hidden within. Take heed I advise thee how thou approchand come neers, beware (I fay) that thou do not stirre and meddle therein.

The joy and mirth of a Prince in prosperitie can not be concealed; shee cannot laugh when he is disposed to play and be merry but it is seene; neither when he mindeth and doth prepareto shew some gracious favour or to be bountifull unto any is his purpose hidden; but marke what thing he keepeth close and secret, the same is terrible, heavie, stearne, unpleasant, yea ministring no access on cause of laughter: namely the treasure house (as it were) of some ranckor and session of the sowne some sor distinction of project of trevenge; Jealousie of his wife, some suspicion of his owne some jor distincted and distrust in some of his minions, sayorites and friends. Flie some this blacke cloud that gathereth so thicke; for when soever that which is now hidden shall breake foorth, thou shalt see what cracks of thunder and stashes of lightning will ensue thereupon. But what be the meanes to avoid it? mary (even as I said before) to turne and to withdraw thy curiositie another way; and principally to see his minions, the creatures in heaven, in earth, in the aire, & in the sea, Art thou delighted in the contemplation of great or small things if thou take pleasure to behold the greater, busse thy selfe about the Sunne; seeke where he go eth downe, and from whence he rifeth? Search into the cause of the mutations in the Moone, why it should so change and alter as it doth, like a man or woman? what the reason is that the looseth so conspicuous a light? and how it commeth to passe that the recovereth it againe?

How is it, when she hath beene out of sight
That fresh she seemes and doth appeer with light?
First yoong and faire whiles shat she is but new Till yound and full we see her lovely hew:
No sooner is her beautic at this height
But fade she doth anon, who was so bright,
And by degrees she doth decrease and waine
Untill at length she comes to naught againe.

And these truly are the secrets of nature, neither is the offended and displeased with those who can find them out. Distrustest thou thy selfe to atteine unto these great things then search into smaller matters, to wit, what might the reason be that among trees and other plants, some he alwaies fresh and greene, why they flourish at all times, and be clad in their gay clothes, thewing their riches in every featon of the yeere; why others againe be one while like unto them in this their pride and glorie; but afterward you thall have them againe like unto an ill husband in his house; namely, laying out all at once, and spending their whole wealth and substance at onetime, untill they be poore, naked, and beggerly for it? Also what is the cause that some 20 bring foorth their fruit long wife, others cornered, and others round or circular? But peradventure thou halt no great mind to busie thy selfe and meddle in these matters, because there is no hurt nor danger at all in them. Now if there be no remedie, but that Curiofitie should ever apply it selfe to fearch into evill things after the maner of some venemous serpent, which loveth to feed to live and converse in pestilent woods, let us lead & direct it to the reading of histories, and prefent unto it abundance and ftore of all wicked acts, leawd and finfull deeds. There shall Curiofitie finde the ruines of men, the walting and confuming of their flate, the spoile of wives and other women, the deceitfull traines of fervants to beguile their mafters, the calumniations and flanderous furmifes raifed by friends, poisoning calts, envie, jealousie, shipwracke and overthrow of houses, calamities and utter undoing of princes and great rulers: Satisfie thy selfe herewith to the full, and take thy pleafure therein as much as thou wilt; never shalt thou trouble or grieve any of thy friends & acquaintance in fo doing. But it should seeme that curiosity delighteth not in fuch naughtiethings that be very old and long fince done; but in those which befresh, fire new, hot and lately committed, as joying more to beholde new Tragedics. As for Comedies and matters of mitth, the is not greatly defirous to be acquainted with fuch. And therefore, if a man do make report of a mariage, discourse of a solemne sacrifice, or of a goodly shew or pompe that was set foorth, the curious busie-bodie (whom we speake of) will take small regard thereto and heare it, but coldly and negligently. He will fay that the most part of all this he heard alreadie by others, and bid him who relateth fuch narrations, to passe them over or be briefe, and cut off many circumstances. Marie if one that fits by him chance to set tale on end, o and begin to tell him there was a maiden defloured, or a wife abufed in adulterie : if he recant of fome processe of law or action commenced, of discord and variance betweene two brethren; you shall see him then not to yawne and gape as though hee had list to sleepe; you shall not perceive him to nod; hee will make no excuse at all that his leisute will not serve to heare out the tale.

And close he holds his earetherefore.

So that this sentence,

How somer much are ill nemes under the

How sooner much are ill newes under stood, And heard by men (also) than tiding s good!

50 is well and truely verified of these curious Polypragmons. For like as cupping glasses, boxes, and ventoses, draw the woorst matter out of the stells; even so, the cares of curious and busic folke, are willing to receive and admit the most lewd and haughtiest speeches that are: or rather, to speake more properly, as townes and cities have certaine curied and unluckie gates, at which they send out malesactors to execution carrie and throw foorth their dung, ordure, filthines, and cleansings whatsoever, but never commeth in or goeth out that way, any thing that pure is and holy; semblably, the cares of these curious intermediers be of the same nature; for thereentreth and passeth into them nothing that is honest, civill, and lovely; but the bruit and rumours of cruell murders have acceffe unto them, and there make aboad, bringing therewith wicked, abominable, profane and curfed reports: and as one faid:

The onely bird that in my house doth ever sing Both night and day, u dolefull moane, much sorrow and wailing.

So this is the Mule, Syrene, & Mere-maid alone, that Busie folke have; neither is there any thing that they heatken to more willingly: for Curiofitie is an itching defire to heare fecrets and hidden matters: and well you wot that no man will lightly conceale any good thing that he hath; confidering that manie times we make semblance of good parts that be not in us. And therefore the buffe intermedler who is so desirous to know and heare of evils, is subject to that which the Greekes call in Jugerrania, a vice, coosen germaine or sister rather to envie and eie-biting, 10 Forasmuch as envie is nothing else, but the griefe for another mans good: and the foresaide Em gaugerania, the joy for his harme: and verily both these instrmities proceed from an untoward roote, even another untamed vice and favage disposition, to wit, malignitie or malice. And this we know well, that so irkesome and odious it is to everie man for to bewray and reveale, the fecrets, evils and vices which he hath, that many men have chosen to die, rather than to discover and open unto Phylicians any of their hidden maladies, which they carrie about them. Now suppose that Heraclitus or Erosistratus the physicians; nay AEsculapius himselfe whiles he was a mortall men, should come to an house furnished with drugs, medicines and instruments requisite for the cure of diseases, and aske whether any man their had a Fistula in Ano, that is, an hollow and hidden ulcer within his fundament? Or if the be a woman, whether the have a can-to kerous fore within her matrice: (albeit in this art fuch inquifitive curiofitie is a speciall meanes, making for the good and the health of the ficke) each one I suppose would be readie to hunt and chase away from the house such a Physician, who unsent for, and before any neede required, came upon his owne accord and motion in a braverie to enquire and learne other folks maladies. What shall we say then to these busic medlers, who enquire of another the selfesame infirmities and worfe too? Not of any minde at all to cure and heale the same, but onely to detect and fet them abroad; In which respect they are by good right the most odious persons in the world. For we hardly can abide Publicanes, Customers, and Tol-gatherers, but are mightily offended with them, not when they exact of us, and cause us to pay toll for any commodities or wares that are openly brought in; but when they keepe a firetting and fearthing for fuch 30 things as be hidden, and meddle with the wares and carriages of other men: notwithstanding that law granteth and publike authoritie alloweth them fo to do; yea and if they doe it not, they fustaine losse and dammage themselves. But contrariwise, these curious sellowes let their owne businesse alone, and passe not which ende go forward, caring not to hinder themselves, whiles they be intentive to the affaires of other men. Seldome go they into the countrie, for that they cannot endure the quietnes and still silence of the wilde and solitarie fields. But if haply after long time they make a cast thither, they cast an eie to their neighbours vines, rather than to their owne; they enquire how many beeves or oxen of his died or what quantity of wine fowred under his hand? and no fooner are they full of these newes, but into the citie they trudge and make haste againe. As for the good farmer and painefull husbandman indeed, he is not verie4 willing to give eare unto those newes, which without his heatkning after come from the citie of the owne accord, and are brought unto him, for his faying is:

My ditcher will anon both tell and talke upon what points concluded was the peace, For now the knave about fuch newes doth walke, And bussie he sto listen doth not cease.

But in tructh, the source of living, which bringeth forth no great and tragicall matter, intrude and thrust themselves into the high courts of Justice, the tribunal seats, the market place and publike pulpits where speeches be made unto the people, great assemblies, and the most frequented quarter of the haven where the ships ride at ankor, what: No newes? saith one of them. How now? Were you not this morning at the market or in the common place? What then: How thinke you, is not the citie mightily changed and transformed within these three hourses? Now if it channee that some one or other make a overture, and have something to say as touching those points, downe he alights on foot from his horse, he embraceth theman, kissen him, and there stands attending and giving eare unto him. But say that the partie whom he thus encountreth and meeteth upon the way, tell him that he hath no newes to report: what failt thou? (will be infer againe and that in displeasure and discontentment:) Wert not thou in the market place of late? Didft not thou paffe by the Princes court? Hadft thou no talke or conference at all with those that came out of Italie? In regard of such therefore as these, I hold well with the Magistrates of the citie Loeri, and commend a law of theirs: That if any citizen had heene abroad in the countrey, and upon his returne home demanded what newes? he should have a fine fet on his head. For like as Cookes pray for nothing, but good store of fatlings to kill for the kitchin, and Fishmongers plentie of fishes; even so curious and busic people with for a world of troubles and a number of affaires, great newes, alterations and changes of State: to the ende that they might evermore be provided of gaine, to chase and hunt after, yea and to to kill. Well and wifely therefore did the Law-giver of the Thurians, when he gave order and forbad expressely, That no citizen should be taxed, noted by name, or scoffed at upon the Stage in any Comedie, save onely adulterers and these busie persons. For surely adulterie may be compared well to a kinde of curiofitie, fearching into the pleafures of another: feeking (I fay) and enquiring into those matters which are kept secret, and concealed from the view of the whole world, And as for curiofitie, it teemeth to be arefolution or loofenes, like a palfie or corruption, a detection of fecrets and laying them naked: For it is an ordinarie thing with those who be inquisitive and desirous of many newes, for to be blabs also of their tongues, and to be pratting abroad; which is the reason that Pythagor as injoyned young men five yeeres silence, which he called Echemychia, Abstinence from all speech, or holding of their tongue. Moreover, it can not otherwise be chosen, but that foule and cursed language also should accompany curiofity; for looke what thing foever bufie bodies heare willingly, the fame they love to tell and blurt out as quickly; and fuch things as with defire and care they gather from one, they utter to another with joy: Whereupon it commeth to paffe, that over and above other inconveniences which this vice ministreth unto them that are given to it, an impediment it is to their owne appetite. For as they defire to know much, so every man observeth them, is beware of them, and endevoureth to conceale all from them. Neither are they willing to doc any thing in their fight, nor delighted to speak ought in their hearing, but if there be any question in hand to be debated, or bufineffe to be confidered and confulted of, all men are content to put off the conclusion and resolution unto another time; namely, untill the curious and busic 30 person be out of the way. And say, that whiles men are in sad and secret conserence, or about fome serious businesse, there chance one of these busie bodies to come in place, presently all is husht, and every thing is remooved aside and hidden, no otherwise than solke are woont to let out of the way victuals where a cat doth haunt, or when they fee her ready to run by; infomuch as many times those things which other men may both heare and see fasely, the same may not be done or faid before them onely. Therefore also it followeth by good consequence, that a bulic and curious person is commonly so farre out of credit, that no man is willing to trust him for any thing; in such fort, that we commit our letters missive and signe manuell, sooner to our fervants and meere strangers, than to our friends and familiars, if we perceive them given to this humor of much medling. But that woorthy knight Bellerophontes was so farre from this, that 40 he would not breake open those letters which he caried, though they were written against himfelfe, but forbare to touch the Kings epiftle, no leffe than he abstained from the Queen his wife, even by one and the same vertue of Continence. For surely, curiosity is a kinde of incontinency, aswel as is adultery; and this moreover it hath besides, that joined there is with it, much folly and extreame want of wir: For were it not a part (thinke you) of exceeding blockish senselesseneffe, yea, and madneffe in the highest degree, to passe by so many women that be common, and every where to be had; and then to make meanes with great cost and expense, to some one kept under locke and key, and befides furnptuous: notwithstanding it fall out many times that fuch an one is as ill-favored as she is foule? Semblably, and even the same do our curious folke: they omit and cast behinde them many faire and goodly sights to beholde, many excellent le-30 ctures woorth the hearing, many disputations, discourses, honest exercises and pastimes ; but in other mens letters they keepe a puddering, they open and reade them, they stand like cavesdroppers under their neighbours walles, hearkening what is done or faid within, they are readie to intrude themselves to listen what whispering there is betweene servants of the house; what fecret talke there is among feely women when they be in fome odde corner, and, as many times they are by this meanes not free from danger; fo alwaies they meet with shame and infamie. And therefore very expedient it were for fuch curious folke, if they would shift off and putby this vice of theirs, eftloones to call to mind (as much as they can) what they have either knowen or heard by fuch inquifition: for if (as Simonides was woont to fay) that when hee came (after fome time betweene) to open his desks and coffers, he found one which was appointed for gifts and rewards alwaies full, the other ordeined for thanks and the graces void and empty: fo, a man after a good time past; fee open the store-house of curiofity, and looke into it what is therein, and see it toppe full of many unprofitable, vaine and unpleasant things; peradventure the very outward fight and face thereof will discontent and offend him, appearing in every respect to lovelesse and toyish as it is. Goe to then: if one should fet in hand to turne over lease by lease the books of ancient writers, and when he hath picked forth and gathered out the woors, make one volume of all together, to wit, of those headlesse and unperfect verses of Homer, which haply beginne with a short syllable, and therefore be called exaa: or of the solutions and incongruities which be found in Tragedies: or of the undecent and intemperate speeches which alocking trained against women, wherby he defamed and shamed himselse: were he not (I pray you) woorthy of this Tragicall curse:

A Foule ill take thee, thou lewd wretch, that love st to collect The faults of mortall men now dead, the living to infect.

but to let these maledictions alone, certes this treasuring and scoring up by him of other mens errors and misdeeds, is both unseemly, and also unprofitable: much like unto that city which Philip built of purpose, and peopled it with the most wicked, gracelesse, and incorrigible persons that were in his time, calling it Point populs when he had so done. And therefore these curious meddlers in collecting and gathering together on all sides the errours, imperfections, defaults, and solveismessas I mays fo say) not of verses or Poëmes, but of other mens lives, make of their memorie a most unpleasant Archive or Register, and uncivile Record, which they ever catie about them. And like as at Rome, somethere be who never caste ic toward any sine pictures, or goodly statures, no nor so much as make any account to cheapen beautifull boies and faire wenches which there stand to be fold, but rather go up and downe the market where monsters in nature are to be bought, seeking and learning out where be any that want legs, whose armes and elbowes turne the contrary way like unto cats; or who have three eies apeece in their heads, or be headed like unto the Oftrich: taking pleasure (I say) to see if there be borne 30

Amungrell mixt of divers forts, False births, unkinde or strange aborts.

But if a man should bring them to see such sights as these ordinarily, the very thing it selfe would soone give them enough, yea and breed a lothing in them of such ugly monsters; even so it fareth with those who busic themselves and meddle in searching narrowly into the impersections of other mens lives; the reproches of their stocks and kinned, the saults, errors, are troubles that have hapned in other houses, if they call to mind what like desects they have found and knowen before time, they shall soone finde that their former observations have done them sintall pleasure, or wrought them as little profit.

But the greatest meanes to divert this vicious passion, is use and custome; namely, if webe 40 gin a great way off, and long before to exercise and acquaint our selves in a kind of continencie in this behalfe, and so learne to temper and rule our selves; for surely use it was and custome that caused this vice to get such an head, encreasing daily by little and little, and growing from worse to worse. But how and after what maner we thould be inured to this purpose, we shall see and

First and formost therefore, begin we will at the smallest and most slender things, and which most quickly may be effected. For what matter of difficultie is it for a man in the way as he travelleth, not to enuse and busse his ead in reading Epitaphes or inscriptions of Sepulchres? or what paine is it for us as we walke along the galleries, to passe over with our eies the writings upon the walles; supposing thus much secretly within our selves, as a maxime or generall rule; so That there is no goodnes, no pleasure, nor profit at all in such writings for there you may reade, That some one doth remember another, and make mention of him by way of hearty commendations in good parts or such a none is the best friend that I have, and many other such like more toes, are there to be seen and read, full of toies and vanistes, which at first seeme not to do any lurt if one reade them, but in trueth, secretly they do much harme, in that they breed in us a custome and desire to seeke after needlesse and impertinent matters. For like as hunters suffer not their hounds to range out of order, nor to follow everies sent, but keepe them up and hold them in by their collars, referving by that meanes their fmelling pure and neat, altogether for their proper worke, to the end that they should be more eager and hot to trace the footing of their game, and as the Poetfaith,

With sent most quicke of nosethrils after kind, The tracts of beast so wild inchase to find;

even so, we ought to cut off these excursions and soolish traines that curious solke make to heare and see everie thing; to keepe them short(I say) and turne them another way to the seeing and hearing onely of that which is good and profitable. Also, as we observe in Eagles and Lions, That whiles they go upon the ground they draw their talons and clawes inward, for seare to less they should all the sharpe edge and weare the points thereof; so considering that curiositie hath a certaine quicke conceit and fine edge (as it were) apt to apprehend and know many things, let us take heed that we do not imploy and blunt the same in the woorst and vilest of all others.

Secondly, we are to accustome our felves as we passe by another mans doore, not to looke in, not to cast our eies to any thing whatsoever that there is: for that the eie is one of the hands that curiositie useth. But let us alwaies have in readinesse and thinke upon the Apothegme of Xemerates, who was woont to say, That it skilled not, but was all one, whether we set our teet, or eies within the house of another man. For it is neither meet and just, nor an honest and pleasant sight, according to the old verse,

My friend or stranger, what ever you be, You shall within, all things deformed see.

And what be those for the most part which are seene in houses? dishes, trenchers, and such like utenfiles and finall veffels lying on the bare ground, of one upon another diforderly: the wenches fet and doing just nothing: and lightly a man shall not finde ordinarily ought of importance or delight. Now the verie cast of the eie upon such things, doth therewith turne away the minde; the intentive looking thereupon is unfeemely, and the using thereof starcke naught. Diogenes verily upon a time feeing Dioxiopas, when he entred in his triumphant chariot into the citie for winning the best prife at the Olympian games, how as he rode he could not chuse but set his cie upon a certaine faire damozell, who was in place to behold this pompe and so. 30 lemne entrance of his, but evermore his cie followed her, whether the were before or behinde him: Behold (quoth he) our victorious and triumphant champion, how a yoong wench hath him fure enough by the necke, and doth writhe him which way she list! Semblably, see you not how these curious folke have their neckes bended aside at everie foolish sight, and how they turne about with each vanitie that they heare and fee, after once they have gotten an habit or custome, to looke everie way and to carie a rouling eie in their heads? But in mine opinion, it is not meet that our fenses should gad and wander abroad, like a wilde and untaught girle, but when reason hath sent it foorth to some businesse; after it hath beene there emploied and done the errand about which it was fer, to returne speedily agains unto her mistresse the soule, and make report how the hath sped and what the hath done? and then afterwards to stay at home 40 decently like a modeft waiting maiden, giving attendance upon reason, and readic alwaies at her command. But now hapneth that which Sophoeles faith,

The headstrong jades that will no bit abide, Hate him persorce who should them reine and guide.

The senses awing perjoit e with good instructions (as I said before) not beene trained to right waies, tunne before reason upon their owne accord, and draw with them many times the understanding, and send it headlong after such things as are not seemely and decent. And therefore sails is that which is commonly reported of Democrisms the Philosopher: namely, that willingly he dimmed and quenched (as it were) his owne sight, by fixing his cies sast upon a fiery and ardent mirror, to take the reverberation of the light from thence, to the end that they should not disturbe the minde, by calling out essential the light from thence, to the end that they should not within, and to be emploied in objects intellectuall, as if the windowes that regard to the secret and high way were shut up. Howbeit most true it is, that those who for the most part occupie their understanding have least use of their senses: which is the reason that in olde time they both builded the temples of the Muses, that is to say, houses ordained for students, which they named Assigna, as sarre as they could from cities and great towness; and also called the night Emphrone, as one would say, a friend to sage advice and counsell; as supposing that quiet rest, repose, and stilnes from all disturbance make verie much for contemplation, and invention of those things that we studie and seeke for.

Moreover, no harder matter is it nor of greater difficultie than the rest, when in the open market place or common hall, men are at high words, reproching & reviling one another, not to approch and come neere unto them. Also if there be any great concurse and running of people together upon some occasion, not to stirre at all but sit still, or if thou art not able to containe and rule thy felfe, to rife up and goe thy waies. For furely gaine thou shalt no good at all by intermedling with fuch buffe and troublefome perfons; but contrariwife, much fruit maift thou reape by turning away fuch curiofitie, in repressing the same and constraining it by use and custome to obey reason. Having made this good entrance & beginning, to proceed now unto to farther and stronger exercise, it were verie good, when soever there is any play exhibited upon the Stage in a frequent Theater, where there is affembled a great audience to heare and fee fome woorthic matter for to passe by it, and to put backe thy friends who follicite thee to goe thither with them, for to see either one daunce excellent well, or to act a Comedie; nor so much as to turne backe when thou hearest some great shout and outcrie, either from out of the race or the grand-cirque, where the horse-running is held for the prize. For like as Socrates gave counsell to forbeare those meates which provoke men to eate when they are not hungrie, and those drinkes which incite folke to drinke when they have no thirft; even fo, we ought to avoide and beware, how we either fee or heareany thing whatfoever, which may either draw or hold us thereto, when there is no need at all thereof. The noble Prince Cyrus would not fo much as see 20 faire Ladie Panthea, and when Araspes one of his courtiours and minions made report unto him, that the was a woman of incomparable beautie, and therefore woorthie to be looked on: Nay rather (quoth he) for that cause I quest to forbeare the fight of her; for if by your perswafion I should yeeld to goe and see her, it may peradventure fall out so, that she her selfe might tempt and induce me againe to repaire unto her; even then haply when I shall not have such leafure, yea and fit by her and keepe her company, neglecting in the meane time the weightic affaires of the State. In like manner Alexander the Great, would not come within the fight of King Darius his wife, notwithstanding that she was reported unto him for to be a most gallant and beautifull Ladie: Her mother an auncient Dame and elderly matrone he did not sticke to vifite, but the young gentlewoman her daughter (fresh, faire and young) he could not be 30 brought so much as once to see. As for us, we can cast a wanton eie secretly into the coatches and horse litters of wives and women as they ride, we can looke out of our windowes, and hang with our bodies halfe foorth, to take the full view of them as they paffe by: and all this while we thinke that we commit no fault, suffering our curious eie and wandring minde to slide and run to everiething.

Moreover, it is meet and expedient for the exercise of justice, otherwhiles to omit that which well and justly might be done; to the end that by that meanes a man may acquaint himselse to keepe farre off from doing or taking any thing unjustly. Like as it maketh much for temperance and chastitie, to abstaine otherwhiles from the use of a mans owne wife, that thereby he might be never mooved to lust after the wife of his neighbour; taking this course likewisea-40 gainst curiosity, strive and endevour sometimes to make semblance as though thou didst neither heare nor fee those things that properly concerne thy selfe: And if a man come and bring thee a tale of matters concerning thine owne housholde, let it passe, and put it over, yea, and those words which seeme to have beene spoken as touching thine owne person, cast them behinde, and give no care thereto. For default of this discretion, it was the inquisitive curiosity of King Oedipus, which intangled and enwrapped him in exceeding great calamities and miseries: for when he would needs know who himselse was, as if he had beene not a Corinthian, but a ftranger, and would needs goe therefore to the Oracle for to be refolved, he met with Laise his owne father by the way, whom he flew, and so espoused his owne mother, by whose meanes he came to be King of Thebes: and even then when he seemed to be a most happy man, he could so not fo ftay, but proceeded further to enquire concerning himfelfe, notwithftanding his wife did what the possibly could to dissinade him from it; but the more earnest she was with him that way, the more instant was he with an old man who was privie to all, using all meanes to enforce him for to bewray that fecret: at length when the thing it felfe was fo pregnant, that it brought him into farther fuspicion, and withall when the faid old man cried out in this maner,

Alas, how am I at the point perforce

To utter that which will cause remorfe?

the king furprifed ftill with his humor of curiofitie, notwithstanding he was vexed at the veric heart, answered,

And I likewise for my part am as neere To beare as much, but yet I must it heare.

Sobitter-sweet is that itching-smart humor of curiositie, like unto an ulcer or fore, which the more it is rubbed and scratched, the more it bleedeth and bloodieth it selfe. Howbeit he that is delivered from this disease and besides of nature milde and gentle, so long as he is ignorant and knowth not any evill accident, may thus say,

O bleffed Saint, when evils are past and gone How fage and wife art thou, oblivion.

And therefore we must by little and little accustome our selves to this, that when there be anie letters brought unto us, we do not open them presently and in great haste, as many do, who if their hands be not quicke enough to doe the feat, fet their teeth to, and gnaw in funder the threds that fewed them up fast. Also if there be a messenger comming toward us from a place with any tidings, that we run not to meete him, nor fo much as once rife and flir for the matter; and if a friend come unto thee faying, I have some newes to tell you of : yea mary (must you fay againe) but I had rather that you brought me fomething indeed that were profitable, fruitfull and commodious. I remember upon a time when I declaimed and read a lecture at Rome, 20 that Oratour Rustius whom afterwards Domitian put to death for envie that he bare to his glory, hapned to be there to heare me: Now in the mids of my lecture there came into the place a Soldiour with letters from the Emperour, which he delivered to Rustim aforefaid, whereupon there was great filence in the schoole, and I my felfe made some pause, whiles he might reade the letter, but he would not reade it then, nor fo much as breake it open before I had made an end of my discourse, and dismissed the auditory: for which all the company there present, highly praised and admired the gravitie of the man. Now if one do feed and nourish all that he can, (beit but in lawfull and allowable things) this veine and humor of curiofitie, fo as thereby it becommeth in the end mighty and violent, it will not be an eafie matter to restraine and hold it in when it shall breake out & run on end to such things as be unlawful & forbidden, by reason that 30 it is so used already to intermeddle & be doing. But such men as these, breake open and unseale letters (as I faid) intrude themselves into the secret counsels of their friends; they will needs discover and see those facred mysteries, which it is not lawfull for to see; in place whereunto there is no lawfull acceffe they love to be walking; enquire they do into the secret deeds and words of kings and princes; and notwithstanding there be nothing in the world that causeth tyrants, who must of necessitie know all, so odious as this kinde of people, who be called their cares; (promoters I meane, and spies) who heare all and bring all unto their eares. The first that ever had about him these Otaconstes (as a man would say, Princes eares) was Dartus the yoonger; a prince distrusting himselfe, suspecting also and fearing all men. As for those which were called Profagogidæ, that is to fay, Courries, Spies, and Enformers, the Diony fu, tyrants of 40 Sicilie, intermingled fuch among the Syracufians : wherupon, when the State was altered, those were the first that the Syracusians apprehended and massacred. Also those whom we call Sycophants, are of the confraternitie, house and linage of these curious persons, save onely this difference there is, that Sycophants enquire what evill any man hath either deffeigned or committed; whereas our Polypragmons hearken after and discover the very calamities and misadventures of their neighbours, which happen even against their will and purpose; and when they have so done, set them abroad to the view of the whole world. Furthermore, it is said, that the name Aliterius came up first by occasion of this over-much medling, called Curiosity. For when there was (by all likelihood) a great famine at Athens, they that had corne, kept it in and would not bring it abroad to the market, but privily & in the night, ground the same into meale o within their houses: Now these sellowes, named Alitery, would go up and downe closely hearkening where the querne or mill went, and thereupon tooke the faid name. Semblably, as it is reported, the name of Sycophants arose upon the like occasion: for when there was a law made, forbidding that any figges should be carried foorth out of the land, such promoters as bewrated the delinquents, and gave information against those that conveied figges away, were also thereupon called Sycophants. To conclude therefore, it were not unprofitable for the securious Polypragmons (of whom we have discoursed all this while) to know thus much; That they might be assumed in themselves to be noted for maners and profession to be like unto those who are accounted the most odious and hatefull persons in the world.

OF THE TRANQVILLITY AND CONTENTMENT OF MINDE,

The Summarie.

N this Treatife a man may fee the excellent discourses and most sound arguments of Morall Philosophie; the scope whereof is to make the scholars and students therein refolute, and to keepe them from wavering and tottering to and fro; not with standing we that either the skie were ready to fall upon their heads, or the earth to chinke and open and under their feet. True it is, that in this place Plutarch sheweth sufficiently what blust under their feet. True it is, that in this place Plutarch sheweth sufficiently what blust.

nesset bereis in humane wisedome, when the question is to pronounce and speake precisely, Wherein con sifteth true repose and assin ed felicitie? For to teach a man whom he calleth vertuous to search for con. tentment and quiet rest in his owne reason, were as much as to fetch light out of darknes, and life out of death it selfe. And therefore (for this time) needle fe is to treat long upon this point, considering that we minde not to dispute or declare how insufficient humaine learning and Philosophy is in comparisonof true Divinity & Theology. For the present shinmay suffice shat seeing he was no better than a pagas, who bash diffured of this theame, let us receive both this difcourfe and other fuch, wherein he endevous reth to withdraw us from vice, and bring us unto vertue, as written and penned by a man, guided and conducted by a dimme and darke light : in which not with flanding appeare certaine farks of the truth, which as they are not able to shew the way sufficiently, so they give them to under stand, who be sane remote from the true light, how miferable and wretched they are every way. Prooved he had befor, that Flattery, Choler, and Curiostie are vices that overturne the soulcup-side downe, and transfort it so surre of that it is not at home, nor mistresse of herselse : and after he had taught how a man might reclaime and reduce her agains to her owne house, be treateth now of those meanes, wherebyshemay be kept quiet peaceable joious and contented within. For the effecting hereof, at the very entry of the Treassle, he proposet hone expedient meane to attaine thereto, requiring that a man frout a fortific and defend his minde with reasons against the evils and dangers to come : then he consureth the Epica reans, who for to fet amanin peace, would make him blockish, fenfeleffe and good for nothing : he an ap fivereth likewife to those who are of opinion that a man may finde a certaine kinde of vacation and impassibilisie without all trouble and molestation: which done he sheweth that reason well ruled & orde red, is the foundation and ground of our tranquillity: and all in one and the same traine, he teached how a man may be furnished & assisted with this reason. Having thus sufficiently in general tearnes als coursed of these premisses, he doth particularise and descipher the same point by point, groing fifteen severall counsels, whereby a manimay attaine to this contentment and repose of Spirit; the which we have distinguished particularly, and shewed in ech one the substance of them, which I shought not good to infers in this place, because the Summary should not exceed over-much. Furthermore, the said consels be enriched with notable examples, similitudes and sentences; which (no doubt) would have bent much more forcible and effectuall, if the principall in deed had bene joined therewith, to wis, true pitti 9 andreligion : which hat b beene cleane omitted by the authour, who in deed never knew what was the onely true and perfect tranquillitie of the soule. Howbest, woonderfull it is, how he should proceed so farre as he docth, having no other helpe and meanes but his owne felfe: which may so much the bet ter serve our turnes, considering that we have aides and guides farre more excellent to bring up farre, as to make entrie, and take assured possession of that soveraigne good and felicity, whereof his here speaket b. OF

PLUTARCH to PACCIUS Sendeth greeting:

Verlate it was before I received your letter; wherein you requested me to write somehat as touching the Tranquillity of the Soule, and withall of certaine places in Platoes Dialogue Timans, which seeme to require more exact exposition: but so it happened, that at the very same time, your friend and mine Eros, had occasion to faile with speed to Rome, upon the receit of certeine letters from that right worthipfull gentleman Fundams, by vertue whereof he was to depart suddenly and to repaire unto him with all expedition. By which occasion having not sufficient time and leasure to performe your request in such maner as I purposed, & yetunwilling that the man coming from me, should be seene of you emptie-handed; I have collected certaine notes, cholen out of those commentaries, which for mine owne memorie & private use I had compi-20 led long before, concerning this argument, to wit, The Tranquillity & contentment of fpirit: supposing that you also demaund this present discourse, not for any pleasure that you take to read a treatife penned curioufly, and affecting or hunting after fine phrases and exquisite words; but onely in regard of some doctrine that may serve your turne and helpe you to the framing of your life as you ought; knowing withall full well (for the which I doe congratulate and rejoice heartily on your behalfe) that not with standing your inward acquaintance, friendship and favor with the best and principall persons of the citie, and that for eloquence you come behind none that plead causes at the bar in open court, but are reputed a singular Oratour, yet for all that, you do not as that Tragicall Merops, fuffer your felfe foolishly and beyond the course of nature to be carried away as he was with the vaine-glorie and applause of the multitude, when 30 they do admire and account you happie therefore; but still you keepe in memorie that which oftentime you have heard from us; That it is neither a rich Patritians shooe that cureth the gout in the feet; nor a costly and pretious ring that healeth the whitslaw or felon in the fingers; nor yet a princely diademe that eafeth the head-ach. For what use is there at all of goods and riches to deliver the foule from griefe and forrow, or to lead a life in rest and repose without cares and troubles? What good is there of great honors, promotions, and credit in court? unlesse they that have them know how to use the same well and honestly; and likewise if they be without them, can skill how to finde no miffe of them, but be alwaies accompanied with contentment; never covering that which is not? And what is this else but reason accustomed and exercifed before hand, quickly to reftreine and efficiences to reprehend the paffionate and unreafo-40 nable part of the foule, which is given oftentimes to breake out of her bounds; and not to fuffer her to range and vague at her pleasure, and to be transported by the objects presented unto her? Like as therfore Xenophon giveth us good counfell: Alwaies to remember the gods, and most of all to worthip and honor them when we are in prosperitie, to the end that when soever we stand in neede, we may more boldly invocate and call upon them, with full affurance that they will supply our necessities, being thus before hand made propirious and gratious unto us; even so, wifemen and fuch as are of good conceit, ought alwaies to be furnished and well provided of reasons sufficient to serve their turne for to encounter their passions before they arise, to the end that being once laide up in flore, they may doe most good when time serveth. For as curst and angric maltives by nature, which are very mode that they heare keepe an eager baying and to barking as if they were affrighted, become quier and appealed by one onely voice which is familianing othern, and wherewith they have beene acquainted; foir is no finall paine and trouble to still and compose the passions of the mindes skittish as they be and growne wilde) unlesse a man have ready athand proper and familiar teafons to represse the fame to soone as ever they begin to flir and grow out of orders and resemble all and lighter publisher in a marak Now as touching those who affirme that if a man would live intranquillity and rest, he ought

Now as roughing those who affirme that if a man would live in tranquillity and reft, he ought not to meddle nor deale in many affaires, either in publike or private: First and formost thus I say, that they would make us pay deere for tranquillitie of minden when they would have us buy 148

when he was bidden to stand up, but cavilled with him after a mocking and jesting maner, what (quoth he) and if you fold a fifth would you bid it rife up ? Likewife Socrates discoursed familiarly with his fellowers and followers as touching Philosophie, even when he was in prison. Wheras Phaethon, notwithstanding he was mounted up into heaven, wept for anger and despight that no man would give him the rule and regiment of the charriot-fleeds belonging to the funne his father. And as a floc is wrested and turned according to the fashion of a crooked or splay-soot, but never doth the foot writhe to the forme of a shoe; even so it is for all the world with the dif. politions of mensminds; they frame their lives and make them like thereto. For it is not use and cultome that causeth the best life to be pleasant also unto them that have made choise thereof, as some one haply is of opinion; but wisedome rather and discretion maketh that life. which is best to be also sweetest and most pleasant. Since that therefore the source and sountaine of all tranquillitie and contenment of spirit is in our selves, let us cleanse and purifie the fame fpring, as cleane as possibly we can, that all outward and casuall occurrences whatsoever, may be made familiar and agreeable unto us knowing once how to use them well.

If things go croffe, we ought not, iwis, To fret; for why? fuch choler will not boot : But he that know's when ought is done amiffe, To let all Araight, hall chieve full well, I wot.

Plato therefore compared our life to a game at Tables; wherein the plaier is to wish for the luckieft cast of the dice, but whatsoever his chance is, he must be sure to play it well, and make 10 the best of it: Now of these two points, the former, to wit, a good throw, is not in our power and choise; but the other resteth in us, namely, whatsoever our lot is, to take in good woorth, and to dispose every thing in that place where it may profit most if it fortuned well: and contraand contrariwife, if it fell out croffe, where it may doe least harme. This (I fay) is our part and duety to performe, if we be as wife as we should be. As for brain-sicke sooles, and such as know not how to carrie themselves in this life (like unto those that have crasse and diseased bodies, who neither can abide burning heat nor chilling colde) as in prosperity they spread and set up their failes too high, fo in adversitie they strike them as low. Troubled they are mightily with both extremities; or to speake more truely, with themselves, as much in the one as the other, and no leffe in that state which yeeldeth those things that we call and repute Goods. Theodorm to that infamous Philosopher, who for his profane opinion was furnamed Atheos, that is to fav, The Atheift, was woont to fay: That he delivered his speeches with the right hand to his auditours and scholars, but they tooke the same with their left; even so ignorant and untaught perfons many times when fortune presenteth herselfe unto them on the right hand, receive her awkly, turning to the left fide undecently, and by that meanes commitmany untoward & lewd parts. But those that be wife doe farre better : for as Thyme yeeldeth unto Bees the quickest and drieft hony; even so they out of the most unfortunate accidents that be, can skill often-times to get somewhat which is agreeable and commodious unto themselves. This is then the first and principall point, wherein a man ought to be trained and exercised, upon this must be study and meditate. And like as that fellow, when he flung a stone at a curst bitch, missed her, and chan-40 ced to hit his step-mother, faying withall: It makes no matter; for it hath not light amisse seven fo we, may turne all our fortune to our owne purpose, and make the best use of it, in case things fall out otherwise than we would or meant. Diagenes his hap was to be banished and driven out of his owne countrey; yet this exile of his prooved not ill to him; for by that meanes and thereupon he beganne to studie and professe Philosophie. Zeno the Cittiwan had but one frigator flie-boat left him, and hearing newes that both it and all therein was cast away, drowned and perished in the midsof the sea : o Fortune (quoth he) thou hast done well, to drive us againeto put on our poore and simple scholars habit, and to send us to our galletie and schoole of Philofophie. What should hinder us then, but that we may follow the examples of these men. At thou deprived and put out of some publike office or magistracie which thou didst exercise 2. Go 50 and live in the countrey; there follow thine owne businesse; and plie thy private affaires. Half thou made fute and great meanes to be entertained in the Court, and to winde into speciallavour with some Prince and Potentate, and after all thy travell suffered repulse? Well, thou shak live privately at home, without danger, without trouble. Againe, Art thou entred into action, and doest thou manage State affaires, wherein thou hast cares enough, and no time to breathe

The holfome waters and hot baines

Do not fo much alay our paines: And if our limmes be dull or ficke, Refresh the same and make them quicke: As when aman him elfe doth fee Advanc't to bonour and high degree, His glory, care and paine doth eafe, No travell then will him difplease.

as pindarus faith very well: Art thou in some disgrace, and cast out of favour with reproch, by reason of some flanderous calumniation or envie? Thou hast a gale of fore-wind at the poope, to which will foone bring thee directly to the Muses and to the Academic; that is to say, to follow thy booke, and study Philosophic: for this was Platoes helpe, when he was in disfavour with Demy the tyrant. And therefore one meanes this is (of no small importance) to worke contentment in a mans mind; namely, to looke backe unto the state of famous and renowmed persons, and to fee whether they (haply) have not fuffered the like at any time; as for example: Art thou discontented with thy childlesse estate, for that thy wife hath brought thee no children? Doe but marke the Kings of Rome, how there was not one of them that left the crown unto his fonne. Is it povertie that pincheth thee, so as thou art notable to endure it ? Tell mee which of all the Bootians wouldest thou chuse to resemble, sooner than Epaminondas? or what Romane wouldest thou be like unto rather than Fabricius? But fay thy wife hath plaied false by thee, and made 20 thee weare hornes? Didst thou never reade that Epigram of King Agis at Delphos?

'Υγρας κું * τεαφεράς βασιλούς Αγις μ' ανέθνικεν. Agis, of fea and land a crowned king, Gave me sometime a sacred offering.

moly printed,

And yet as mighties Prince as he was , you have heard (I am fore) that Aleibiades by with his to which Endated have hather all wife Tunea, and the would not bath to call the fonne that the had by him in adulteric, Alcibia-latedit, and des, especially amongst her women & waiting-maidens, whispering and speaking as much softly madeno sense unto them: But what of all that? This crooked croffe was no bar unto K. Agis, but that he proof But in Homer ved the greatest and most renowmed personage of all the Greeks in his time. No more was it the same maany hinderance to Stilpo, but that he lived all the daies of his life most merrily, and no Philoso as used Hood 2 30 pher like to him in those daies, notwithstanding he had a daughter that plaied the harlot : and in diseases when Metroeles the Cynick reproched him therewith; Is this (quoth he) my fault or hers? To dispersely which when Metrocles answered againe: The fault is indeed hers, but the infortunity and mishad is yours: What now, (replied Stilpo again) how can that be? Are not (I pray you) all faults and lea. rightly named Slips or falles? Yes truely, faid the other: And are not falles (quoth Stilpo) mifchances or misfortunes? Metrocles could not denic it: Why then (inferred Stilpo at laft) what are mischances or misfortunes, other than infortunities and mishaps to them whose mischances they are. By this milde kinde of Sorites and Philosophicall reasoning thus from point to point, he shewed that the reprochfull language of this Cynicall Metrocles, was nothing els, but a vaine and foolish baying and barking of a cur-dogge. But on the contrary side, the most part to of men are provoked and troubled not onely for the vices of their friends, familiars, and kinffolke, but also of their very enimies. For reprochfull taunts, anger, envie, malice, and spightful jealousies, are the mischiefes and plagues (I must needs say) of such especially that have them; howbeit they molest and vexe those also that are witlesse and without discretion, no otherwise than the halty and cholericke fits of our neighbors, the peevish and froward dispositions of our familiar acquaintance, and fome shrewd demeanors of our servants in that they go about: with which me thinks you also troubling and disquieting your selfe as much as with any thing else, like unto those Physicians of whom Sophoeles thus writeth; Who buter choler clense and scoure With Drugs as bitter and as foure.

so do unseemely and not iwis for the credite of your person, thus to chase and fret at their passions and imperfections beyond all reason, and shew your selfe as passionate as they. For surely the affaires and negotiations wherewith you are put in truft, and which be managed by your direction, are not executed ordinarily by the ministerie of such persons whose dealings be plaine, simple and direct, as instruments most incer and fit for such a purpose; but for the most part by crooked, rough, and crabbed pieces. To reforme and amend these enormities, I would not have you thinke that it is either your worke and dutie, or an enterprise otherwise easily performed. But if you making use of these, being such by nature as the Chirurgians do of tooth-drawing

pincers, and those instruments wherewith they doe bring the edges of a wound together; will Thewyou felfe milde, moderate, and tractable in every respect, according as the present occa. fion will give leave; furely you shall not receive so much discontentment and displeasure at the untoward and unhappie dealings of others, as joy in the conscience of your owne good disposition, as making this account, that such ministers of yours do but their kind, like as does when they barke: But if you feed and cheriff this pufillanimitie and weakneffe of yours, as other follies, you shall be fure to heape up many troubles and follies of other men ere you be aware, which will be ready to fall and run as into fome low ground and hollow trench, unto that weake netic of yours. For what should I say, that some Philosophers reproove the pittie and commiferation which we have for them that are in distresse & miserie, acknowledging that it is a good to and charitable deed to helpe and fuccour fuch as be in calamitie, but not commending that condolence and fellow-feeling with our neighbours, as if we yeelded with them unto Fortune? And more than fo, the same Philosophers will not permit and give us leave, in case we be sub. ject to some vice and ill disposed, for to be seene and knowen for to grieve and sorrow there. fore: but rather to correct and amend what is amisse, without any shew at all of sad cheere and heavinesse; which being so, consider then how little reason and small cause we have, nay how abfurd it were, that we thould fuffer our felves to be troubled, vexed and angry, in case all those who commerce and converse with us, deale not so well and kindly as they should? But above all things my good friend Paccius, let us fee to this, that our felfe love deceive and feduce us not; let us beware (I fay) that we do not fo much shewan hatred and detestation of wickedneffe and finne in generall; as bewray fome private and particular regard of our owne, in that we feeme so to abhorre and dread the naughtinesse of those that have to do with us. For to be exceeding much mooved and beyond all measure affectionate at some time to such and such affaires; to covet (I fay) and purfue the fame over hotly, and otherwise than is meete and befee ming; or contrariwife, to loth, despite, and abhor the same, must needs breed discontentments. fulfpitions, and offences in those persons by whom we seeme either to have beene prevented & disappointed of some things, or to have runne and fallen too some upon other: But he that is used to carie himselfe cheerefully and with moderation in his affaires, (fall out as they will) and can frame to their events, he will soone learne to negotiate and converse with any man in all dexteritie and gentle behaviour. Well then, let us fet in hand againe to discourse of those matters which we have intermitted for a while: for like as in a feaver all things that we tafte feeme at the first bitter and unsavorie; but when we see others take without any shew and signification of diflike the same which we spit out, then we blame no more either meats or drinks, but lay the fault upon our disease; even so, when we perceive that other menhave entred upon and gone through the fame affaires with great alacritie, and without any paine at all, whereof we complained and made much adoe; let us for shame cease to find fault and bee offended so much at the things. And therefore if at any time there shall befall unto us some adverse and crooked accident against our wils, it will be very good for the working of our contentment in minde, not to passe over but to regard such things as at other times have hapned to our minds and as we could with them; but to conferre them together, and by a good medly of them both to darken a and dor the worst with laying the better to. But now, whereas we are wont when our cies be dazzeled and offended with beholding that which is too bright &glittering, we refresh & comfort our fight againe with looking upon pleasant colours of flowers, and greene graffe; herein contrariwise wee direct our mindes and cogitations upon heavie and dolorous objects, and violently force our thoughts to be amuzed upon the remembrance of calamities and adverse fortunes, plucking them perforce as it were from the confideration of better. And heere in this place me thinks I may very fitly applie that sentence to our present purpose, which was said to a busic and curious person,

Ab pirefull minde and most envious hart Why others faults do'st thou fo quickly flie With eagles light, but in thine owne thou art Starke blinde or elfe do'st winke with howlets eie?

Even so good sir, How is it that you regard and advise so wistly your owne miserie and calamitie, making it alwaies apparent and fresh in remembrance, but upon your present prosperitie you let not minde? And like as ventoles, cupping glasses or boxes draw the must corrupt humors to them out of the flesh; even so you gather against your selfe the worst things you have, being no better than the merchant of Chies, who when he fold to others a great quantity of the best wine, fought up and downe tasting every vessell untill he met with that for his owne dinner, which began to fowre and was little better than starke naught. This man had a servant who ranne away, and being demaunded what his man had done unto him, for which hee should shew him a paire of heeles? Because (quoth hee) when hee had plentie of that which was good, he would needes feeke for naught. And most men verily are of the same nature, who paffing by good and defireable things, which be (as a man would fay) the pleafant and potable liquors that they have, betake themselves to those that bee harsh, bad, and unsavourie. But Aristippus was of another humour; for like a wise man and one that knew his owne good, hee was alwaies disposed to make the best of everie occurrence, raito fing and lifting up himselfe to that end of the ballance which mounted aloft, and not to that which went downeward. It fortuned one day that he loft a faire mannor or Lordship of his owne, and when one of his friends above the rest made most semblance to lament with him, and to be angrie with Fortune in his behalfe; Heare you (quoth he) know you not that your selfe have but one little farme in the whole world, and that I have yet three houses more left, with good lands lying to them? Yes marie do I (quoth the other:) Why then (quoth Aristipus againe) wherefore doe not we rather pittie your case, and condole with you? For it is meere madneffe to grieve and forrow for those things that are lost and gone, and not to rejoice for that which is faved. And like as little children, if a man chance to take from them but one of their gauds, among many other toies that they play withall, throw away the rest for verie curst-20 heart, and then fall a puling, weeping and crying out aright; semblably, as much folly and childishnesse it were, if when fortune thwarteth us in one thing, we be so farre out of the way and disquieted therewith, that with our plaints and moanes we make all her other favours improfitable unto us. But wil fome one fay, What is it that we have? Nay, What is it that we have not? might he rather fay: One man is in honour, another hath a faire and goodly honse; one hath a wife to his minde, and another atrustie friend.

Antipater of Tar/us the Philosopher, when he drew toward his end and the houre of his death, in recounting and reckoning up all the good and happie dates that ever he faw in his life time, left not out of this roll fo much as the Bon-voiage that he had when he failed from Cilicia to Athens. And yet we must not forget nor omit those bleffings and comforts of this life 30 which we enjoy in common with many more, but to make some reckoning & account of them. and namely to joy in this, that we live; that we have our health; that we behold the light of the funne; that we have neither warre abroad nor civill fedition and diffension at home; but that the land yeeldeth it felfe arable and to be tilled, and the fea navigable to everie one that will, without feare of danger; that it is lawful for us to speake, and keepe filence at our pleasure; that we have libertie to negotiate and deale in affaires, or to rest and be at our repose. And verily the enjoying of these good things present, will breed the greater contentment in our spirit, if wee would but imagine within our felves that were absent; namely, by calling to minde eftioones, what a miffe and defire those persons have of health, who bee sicke and diseased? How they wish for peace, who are afflicted with warres? How acceptable it is either to a stranger or 40 a meane person and unknowen, for to bee advaunced unto honour, or to bee friended in fome famous and puissant citie? And contrariwise, what a great griefe it is to forgoe these things when a man once hath them? And furely a thing cannot bee great or precious when we have lost it, and the same of no valour and account all the while wee have and enjoy it: for the not being thereof, addeth no price and woorth thereto. Neither ought wee to holde these things right great and excellent, whiles wee stand alwaies in seare and trembling to thinke that we shall be deprived and bereft of them, as if they were some woorthie things: and yet all the time that they be fure and fafe in our possession, neglect and little regard them as if they were common and of no importance. But we ought to make tile of them whiles they be ours, and that with joy, in this respect especially, that the losse of them if it shall so fall out, wee 30 may beare more meekly and with greater patience. Howbeit, most men are of this opinion (as Arcefilans was woont to fay) that they ought to follow diligently with their eie and cogitation the Poemes, Pictures, and Statues of others, and come close unto them for to behold and peruse exactly each of them; yea, and consider everie part and point therein from one ende to the other: whiles in the meane time they neglect and let alone their owne lives and manners; notwithstanding there be many impleasant fights to be spied and observed therein: looking evermore without, and admiring the advancements, welfare and fortunes of others: much like as adulteters who have an eie after their neighbours wives, but loath and fet naught by their owne.

And verily this one point also is of great consequence, for the selling of amans minde in sure repose; namely, to consider principally himselse, his owne estate and condition; or at least wise (if he do not so) yet to looke backe unto those that be his inferiours and under him; and not as the most fort do, who love alwaies to looke forward and to compare themselves with their betters and superiors. As for example, slaves that are bound in prison and lie in irons, repute them happy who are abroad at libertie; such as be abroad and at libertie, thinke their state blessed who be manumised and made free; being once a franchised, they account themselves to be in verie good case if they were citizens; and being citizens they esteem rich men most happie; the rich imagine it a gay matter to be Lords and Princes; Lords and Princes have a longing desire to be Kings and Monarchs; Kings and Monarchs aspire still higher and would be Gods; and so yet they rest not so, unlesse they may have the power to slash lightnings and shoot thunderbolts, aswell as Jupiter. Thus whiles they evermore come short of that which is above them and coverstill after it, they enjoy no pleasure at all of shose things that they have, nor be thankfull therefore.

The treasures great I care not for of Gyges King so rich in gold;
Such accarice I do abhor, nor money will I touch untold.
I never long'd with gods above, in their high works for to compare:
Grand seignories I do not love, far from mine cies all such things are.

A Thrafian he was that protested thus. But some other, that were a Chian, a Galatian or a Bithynian (I dare warrant you) not contenting himsels with his part of honor, credit & authoritie in his owne countrie and among his neighbours and sellow-etrizens, would be ready to weepe and expossulate the matter with teares, if he might not also weare the habite and ornaments of a Patritian or Senatour of Rome. And say it were graunted and allowed him to be a noble Senatour, he would not be quiet untill he were a Romaine Lord Pretor: Be he Lord Pretor, he will assure to a Consulship; and when he is created Consuls, whine he will and crie if he were not nominated and pronounced the former of the twaine, but elected in the second place. And I pray you yo what is all this? What doeth a man herein but gather pretended excuses of ingratitude to Fortune, in punishing and chastising himselse after this manner? But the man who is wise and of found judgement, in case some one or two among so infinite thousands of us mortall men

be either more honoured or richer than himselfe, will not therefore be cast downe straight way, and fit mourning and lamenting for forrow: but rather in the way as he goeth, and whenfoever he commeth abroad, falute & bleffe with praise and thanksgiving, that good fortune of his and bleffed angell that guideth his life, for that his lot is to live farre better, more at hearts case, and 40 in greater reputation than many millions of millions of other men. For true it is, that in the folemne games at Olympia, no champion may choose his concurrents with whom he is to wrestle or enter into combat for a prize: but in this life, our state standeth so, and our affaires bee in that manner composed, that everie man hath meanes to match, yea and excell many others, and so to beate himselfe aloft, that he be rather envied than envious; unlesse haply he be fuch an one, as will prefume to deale with Briareus or Hereules for the Mastrie. Well, when thou shalt behold some great Lord or honorable personage borne alost in a litter upon mens shoulders, stand not wondring so much at him, but rather cast thine eies downea little lower, & looke upon the poore porters that carrie him. Againe, when thou shalt repute that great Monarch Xerxes a right happy man, for that he made a bridge of thips over the Streights of Helle front; $0 confider withall, those painfull flaves who under the verie whip and for feare of scourging, digged thorough the mountaine Atlas, and made passage that way for an arme of the sea; as also those miserable wretches, who had their eares cropt and their noses cut off, for that the foresaid bridge by a mightie tempest was injointed and broken; and therewith imagine with thy selfe what those seely soules might thinke, and how happie they would repute thy life and condition in comparison of their owne. Socrates upon a time when one of his familiar friends seemed to complaine and fay: What a costly place is this? How deere are things sold in this citie? The wine of Chios will cost a pound; purple is fold for three, and a pinte of honie is held at five dragmes: Tooke him by the hand and led him to the Meale-hall. Loe (quoth he) you may buy here halfe a fexture of good meale for an half-penie. The market (God be thanked) is cheape: from thence he brought him into an Oile-cellar, and where they fold Olives: Here you thall have (quoth he) a measure called Chanix, for two brasen dodkins (a good market believe me.) He tooke him then with him to the Brokers shops that fold clothes, where a man might buy a fuite of apparell for ten dragmes. You see (quoth he) that the peni-woorths are reasonable, and things be bought and fold good cheape throughout the citie; even fo we, when we shall heare other men fay; Our state is but meane, we are exceeding bare, & our condition is passing base: to For why? We can not come to be Confuls, we shall never be rulers & governors of Provinces, nor rife to the highest places of authoritie. We may verie well answere in this wise; Nay maric.but our case is right good; we live gallantly, and lead a blessed and happie life: we beg not; we go not from doore to doore to crave folks almes; we are no porters; we beare no burdens; neither like parasites and smell-seasts, do we get our bread by flatterie. But forasmuch as we are for the most part growen to this folly, that we are accustomed to live rather according to others than our felves, and our nature is fo far corrupted with a kinde of jealous affectation and envie, that it joyeth not so much in her owne proper goods, as grieveth at the welfare of another) I would advise you not onely to regard those things that be resplendent, glorious and renowmed in those whom you admire and esteeme so happie; but also to set open and lift up the vaile 20 a little, and to draw (as it were) that glittering courtaine of outward flew, apparance and opinion that men have of them which covereth all, and so to looke in. Certes, you shall finde that they have within them many matters of trouble, many grievances and discontentments. That noble Pittaem, fo famous for his valor and fortitude, and as much renowmed alfo for wifedome and justice, feasted upon a time certaine of his friends that were strangers: and his wife comming in at mids of the dinner, being angry at fomewhat els, overthrew the table, and there lay all under foot. Now when his guests and friends were woondcrously dismaied and abashed hereat: Pitracus made no more ado at the matter, but turning unto them. There is not one of usall (quoth he) but he hath his croffe, and one thing or other to exercise his patience: and for mine owne part this is the onely thing that checketh my felicitie: for were it not for this shrow 30 my wife, I were the happiest man in the world: So that of me may these verses be well verificd:

This man who while he win street or publike place is happiet hought, No sooner sets in house his seet but wo is him: and not for nought. His wife him rules and that's a singlet She chides, he sights, from morne to night.

Well my mafters, you have many occations (I am fure) that vexe you: as for my felfe I grieve at nothing. Many fuch fecret fores therebe that put them to anguifh and paine who are rich 40 and it high authoratic, yea and trouble Kings and Princes themfelves; howfoever the common people fee no fuch matter; and why, their pompe and outward glorie covereth and hideth all. For when we read thus in Homer,

O happy King, fir Agametanon hight The foune of Atreus that mount by knight Borne in good howre, and that din fortunes lap, World Most puffant, rich, and thrall to no milhap.

This is a tehearfall furely of an outward beatitude onely, in regard of his armes, horses, and men of war about him: for the voices which are breathed out and uttered from his passions, which do fallisse that opinion of him; and beare witnesse of the contrarie: as may appeare by this testisomonic of himsels in Homer,

The Great Jupiter god Saturnes sonne, and Hathplung'd me deepe in the begon.

Empides allo to the like effect;

to be Your fate, old fir, I happy deeme, old and him oleffe I do admire who leabil life anknowne unseene,

from danger far, from vaine de fire,

By these and such like meditations, a man may by litle & litle spend & diminish that quaressome and complaining discontentment of the minde against Fortune, in debasing and casting downe his owne condition with the wonderfull admiration of his neighbors state. But there is nothing that doth so much hurt unto our tranquillitie of minde as this, when our affection and will to a thing is disproportioned unto our might and power; as if we set up greater failes then our vessel will beare, building our hopes and defires as castles in the aire without a found foundation, and promiting our felves more than reason is; for afterwards when by proofe we see, that we can not reach thereto, and finde that the successe is not answerable to our conceit, we grumble by and by against fortune, and we blame our destinie; whereas we should accuse our owne sollie and raftines. For neither he that would feeme to shoote an arrow out of a plough; or ride upon to an Oxe backe to hunt the Hare; can fay that he is unluckie; nor hee that goeth about to catch the Hart and Hinde with fithers drag-nets, or with grins, fnares and traps, may justly finde fault with his fortune, and give out that fome wicked angel doth croffe him, or malignant spirit haunt him, if he faile and miffe of his purpose: but furely such are to condemne their owne foolishneffe and inconfiderate temeritie, in attempting things impossible. And what might be the cause of such errors and groffe overfight? furely our fond and blinde selfe love. This is it that causeth men to affect ever to be foremost; this mooveth them to strive and contend for the highest place; this maketh them opinonative in every thing, aiming and reaching at all things unfatiably, and never rest contented. For it suffices them not to be both rich and learned; eloquent withall and mightie; good fellowes at the table and pleafant companions; minions and 20 tavorites of Kings and Princes; rulers of cities and governors of provinces; unleffe they maybe masters also of the swiftest and hotest hounds for running; the principall horses for service and stomacke; quailes and cocks of the best game for fight; If they faile in any of these, they be call downe, and their hearts are done. Denys the elder of that name, not being contented and fatisfied in minde that he was the most mighty and puissant tyrant in his time; but because hee was not a better Poet than Philoxenus; nor able to discourse and dispute so learnedly as Plato; in great choler and indignation, he cast the one into a dungeon within the Stone quarries, where malefactors, felons, and flaves were put to punishment; and confined the other as a caitife, and fent him away into the Isle Aegine. Alexander the great was not of that disposition, who when Brifon the famous runner in the race contended with him for the best game in foot-man 10 ship, and for the nonce to please the King, seemed to faint and lag behinde, and so to yeeld the honour of the course unto him; being advertised thereof, was mightily offended and displeafed with him for it. Very wifely therefore and aptly to this purpose the Poet Homer when he had given this commendation of Achilles,

Like unto him there is not one in field
Of all the Greekes that ferve with speare and shield.
He inferred presently upon it,
In seats of armes: but for to speake and plead Others there be who can him teach and lead.

Megabyzus the Persian, a great lord, went up one day into the shop of Apelles, where he used to 40 paint; and when he was about to speake (I wot not what) as touching painting-craft, Apellesnot enduring to heare him talke fo foolifhly, thaied him and stopped his mouth, laying precily thus unto him: So long fir as you held your tongue, you were taken to be some great man, by reason of your chaines, corquans, and brooches of gold; your purple robes also, which together with your filence commended your person: but now the very prentise boies here, who grinde oker and fuch like colours, are ready to laugh at you, hearing you talke fo foolithly, you knownot what. And yet some there be who thinke that the Stoicks do but mocke and jest when they heare them hold this opinion: That the wife man (fuch as they imagine to themselves) is not onely Prudent, Just and Valiant, but ought also to be called an Oratour, a Captaine and a Poet, a rich and mightie man, yea and a very King, whiles they themselves will needs be invested in 10 these titles, and if they be not, then they are displeased and miscontent by and by; what reason they have so to be let them answere. Sure I am that among the gods themselves, some have power one way, and some another; and thereupon tooke their fundry denominations accordingly,&rest contented therewith: as for example, one is, surnamed Engalism, i. the god of was, another Mantous, i. the prefident of Prophefies; and a third Cerdons, which is as much to fays as the patron of those that gaine by trafficke. And heercupon it is that lapiter in Homer for bidding Venus to meddle in warlike and martiall affaires, as nothing pertinent unto her, fendeth her to weddings and bride-chambers, and bids her attend them. Moreover fome qualities and things there be, that we feeme to affect and wifh; the which are in nature contrary, and will not concurand fort well together: as for example, the profession of eloquence, and the studie of Arts Mathematicall require rest and quietnesse, neither have the students therein neede tobe emploied in any affaires. Contrariwife, policie and managing of the State and weale publicke, the favors of princes and potentates, are not compaffed without much adoo; neither can a man be idle at any time, who either is emploied in the service of his countrey, or attendant in the Court. Much feeding upon flesh and liberall drinking of wine, maketh (I must needs fay) the bodie able and ftrong, but the minde feeble and weake. Likewife, the continuall o and excellive care both in getting and keeping goods, may well augment riches and increase our substance: but surely it is the contempt and despisement of worldly wealth, that is a great helpe and meanes to learning and Philosophy. And therefore wee may well conclude; that every man is not fir for every thing: but heerein ech one must be ruled by the sage sentence of Pythius Apollo, and first learne, To know himselfe; then marke and observe to what one thing he is most framed and enclined; and thereto both apply and employ his wits, and not to offer violence to nature, and draw her perforce, as it were, against the haire, to this or that course of life, which the liketh not.

The horfe serv's best in chariot at the thill, The oxe as plough, the ground to eare and sill: Ships under saile the dolphins when they sight Asoft froistly then do swim their sides sail by: Who would in wood the wilde bore chase and slay, Must bring with him the hardie hound away.

Now if there be one that thall bee angry with himfelfe and displeased, that he is not at once both a savage lion of the forrest, bolde and venturous of his owne strength, and with all a daintie fine puppie of Malta, cherished and softered in the lappe and bosome of some delicate dame and rich widdow; commend me to him for a senseless foole of all sooles, and to say a sooth, I holde him also as very an affe and doltish sop, who will needs bee such an one as Empedocles, Plato and Democritus; namely, to write of the world, of the nature and true effence of all things therein, and with al, to keepe a rich olde trot and sleepe with her every night, as Euphorius did; or els like unto those who kept company with Alexander the great, in drinking and gaming (as one Medius did) and yet thinke it a great abuse and indignity (torsooth) if he may not be as much admired for his wealth as Isomerius, and esteemed no lesse for his vertue than Epaminondus. We see that the runners in a race be not discontented at all, if they weare not the garlands and coronets of wrestlers, but rest pleased with their owne rewards, and therein delight and rejoice, It is an olde said saw, and a common proverbe: Sparta is thy lor and Province, looke well to it, and adorne the same. For it is a saying also of wise Solon;

And yet we will not change our boone With them, for all their wealth and golde: Goods passe from man to man full soone, Ours versue is, a sure free bolde.

Strato the naturall Philosopher, when he heard that Menedemus his Concurrent had many more scholars by far than he: What marvel is that (quoth he) if there more that defire to be wathed and bathed, than are willing to be anointed & rubbed. Ariffetle writing to Antipater : It is not meet (quoth he) that Alexander alone should thinke highly of himselfe, in that he is able to command so many men; but they also have good cause to be aswell conceited of themselves, who have the grace to believe of the gods as they ought. For furely, they that thus can make the best use of their owne estate, shall never be vexed, nor at their neighbours wel-farepine away for very envie. Which of us now doeth require or thinke it fit, that the vine-tree should beare figges, or the olive grapes? and yet we our felves, if we may not have all at once, to wit, the superiority and preeminence among rich men, among eloquent orators and learned clearks, both athome and abroad, in the schooles among Philosophers, in the field among warriors; aswell among flattering claw-backs as plaine spoken and tel-troth friends: to conclude, unlesse we may goe before all pinching peny-fathers in frugalitie; yea, and furpalle all spend-thrists in riot and prodigallity; we are out of our little wits; we accuse our selves daily like sycophants; we are unthankeful; we repine and grumble as if we lived in penury and want. Over and belides, do we not lee that Nature herfelfe doeth teach us fufficiently in this point? For like as she hath provided for fundry kinds of bruit and wilde beafts, divers forts of food: for all feed not upon fieth, all pecke not upon feeds and graines of plants, neither doe all live upon roots which they worke from under the ground; even fo the hath bestowed upon mankinde many meanes to get their living, while some live by graffing and feeding of cattell, others by tillage, some be Fowlers, others Fishers: and therefore ought every man to chuse that course of life which sorten best with his owne nature, and wholly to apply and set his minde thereto; leaving unto others that which pertaineth to them, and not to reprove and convince Hessiam when he thus speaketh, although not to the full and sufficiently to the point:

The Potter to Potter doth beare envie, One Carpenter to another hath a spightfull eie.

For jealous we are not onely of those who exercise the same art, and sollow that course of life which we do; but the rich also do envie the learned and eloquent; noble men the rich; advocates and lawiers, captious and litigious fophisters; yea, and (that which more is) gentlemen freeborne, and descended from noble and auncient houses, envie Comedians when they have acted well and with a good grace upon the stage in great Theaters; danneers also and jesters in the court, whom they see to be in favor and credite with Kings and Princes; and whiles they do admire thefe, and thinke them happie for their good speed and successe in comparison of their owne doings, they fret and grieve, and out of measure torment themselves. Now, that evene one of us hath within himselfe treasuries laid up of contentment and discontentment, and certeine tunnes of good things and evil; not bestowed as Homer said: Unto the doore-fill and entrie of Jupiters house; but placed in each of our owne mindes, the divers passions whereunto we are hibject do fufficiently proove and thew. For fuch as are foolish and unadvised doe neglect and let go the very good things that prefently they have, and never care to enjoy them, to intentive and earneftly bent are their mindes and spirits alwaies to that which is comming, and future expectation: whereas wife men on the contrary fide, call to their fresh remembrance those things that are past, so as they seeme to enjoy the same as if they were present, yea and in make that which is no more, to be as beneficiall unto them, as if they were ready and at hand, For furely that which is present, yeelding it selfe to be touched by us but the least moment of time that is, & immediately passing our senses, seemeth unto sooles to be none of ours, nor any more to concerne us. But like as the Roper which is painted in the teple of Pluto, or description, of Hell, suffereth an affe behind him to gnaw & cate a rope as fast as he twisteth it of the Spartbroome; even so the unthankfull and tenselesse oblivion of many ready to catch and devoureal good things as they paffe by, yea and to diffipate and cause to vanish away every honest and no table action, all vertuous deeds, duties, delectable recreations and pleafant pastimes, all good fellowship and mutuall societie, and all amiable conversation one with another, will not pennit, that the life be one and the same, linked (as it were) and cheined by the coppulation of things paffed and prefent; but deviding yesterday from to day, and this day from the morrow, as if they were fundry parts of our life, bringeth in fuch a forgetfulnesse, as if things once past had never beene. As for those verily who in their disputations and Philosophicall discourses admit 110 augmentation of bodies, affirming that every substance continually fadeth and vanisheth, would as make us beleeve in word, that each one of us every howre altereth from himfelfe, and no man is the same to day, that he was yesterday: but these for fault of memorie not able to reteine and keepe those things that are done and past, no nor to apprehend and estsoones call them against to minde, but fuffer every thing to passe away and runne as it were through a sieve, doe not in word but in deed and effect, make themselves voide and emptie every day more than other, depending onely upon the morrow, as if those things which were done the yeere past, of late, and yesterday, nothing appertained unto them, nor ever were at all. This is therefore one thing that hindreth & troubleth that equanimity & repose of spirit which we seeke for : & yet there is another that doth it more; and that is this; Like as flies creeping upon the smooth places of glasses or mirrors, cannot hold their feet but must needs fal down, but cotrariwise they take hold where they meet with any roughnes, & flick fast to rugged flawes, that they can find even so the semen gliding & glanfing over al delectable & pleafant occurrences, take hold of any adverse & heavy calamities, those they cleave unto & remember very wel; or rather as (by report) there is about the city Olynthus a certain place, into which if any fliescalled Beetles enter in once, they cannot get forth againe, but after they have kept a turning about, and fetching compaffes round tono purpose a long time, they die in the end, wherupon it tooke the name of Cantharolethron; senblably, men after they fal to the reckoning up & commemoration of their harmes & calamities palt, are not willing to retire backe, nor to breath themselves and give over multiplying thereupon still. And yet contratiwise, they ought to do after the maner of Painters, who when they paint a table to lay upon the ground, or by a course of dead and duskish colours such as be fresh, gay and gallant, for to palliat & in some sort to hide the unpleasantnes of the other, they ought I fay) to fmother and keepe downe the heavinesse of the heart occasioned by some crosse milhaps, with those that have fallen out of their minde, for to obliterate and wipe them out of their minde quite, and to be freed cleane from them it is not possible: and furely the harmonic of this world is reciprocall and variable, compounded (as it were) of contraries, like as we do fee in an harpe or bow; neither is any earthly thing under the cope of heaven, pure, fimple, and to fincere without mixture. But as Musicke doth consist of base and treble sounds; and Grammar of letters, which be partly vocall, & partly mute, to wit, vowels and confants, and he is not to be counted a Grammarian and Mulician, who is offended and displeased with either of those contrarie elements of the arte, but he that affecteth the one as well as the other, and knoweth how to use and mixe both together with skil for to serve his purpose; even so considering that in the occurrences of mans life there be fo many contrarieries, and one weigheth against another in maner of counterpoile; for (according to Eurypides)

Is cannot stand with our affaires, that good from had should parted bee: A medley then of mixed paires doth well, and serves in each degree.

It is not meet that we should let our hearts fall and be discouraged with the one fort when soever it hapnest, but we ought according to the rules of harmonie in Musicke, to stop the point alwaies of the woorst, with strokes of better, and by overcasting missfortunes (as it were) with a vaile and cuttaine of good haps, or by setting one to the other, to make a good composition and a pleasant accord in our life, sitting and sorting our owneturnes. For it is not as Menander said.

Each man so soone as he is borne, one spirit good or angell hath, Which him assists both even and morne, and quides his steps in every path.

but rather according to Empedacles: No fooner are we come into the world, but each one of us hath two angels, called Damones: two Destinies (I say) are allotted unto us, for to take the charge and government of our life, unto which he attribute th divers and fundry names,

Here Chthonic was a downward looket hat hath, Heliope eke, who turneth to the sunne, And Deris shee, that loves in blood to bath, Harmonic smiles ever and anon, Califto faire and Aeschre soule among, Thoola frie, Dinca stout and strong, Nemertes who is lovely white and pure, But Asaphic with fruit black and observe.

Infomuch, as our Nativitie receiving the feeds of each of all thefe paffions blended and confufed together, and by reason thereof the course of our lise not being uniforme, but full of disordered and unequall dispositions, a man of good and sound judgement ought to wish and desire at Gods hand the better, to expect and looke for the woorse, and to make an use of them both, namely by abridging and cutting off that which is excessive and too much: For not he onely (as Epicurus was woont to say) shall come with most delight and pleasure to see the morrow-sunne, who made least account thereof on the eeven; but richesalso, glorie, authoritie and rule doth most rejoice their hearts who least search the contrarie; for the whennent and ardent desire that a man hath to any of these things, doth imprint likewise an exceeding seare of forgoing and loosing the same, and thereby maketh the delight of enjoying them to be feeble and nothing stream and constant; even as the blase and stame of the fire which is blowen and driven to and fro with the wind. But the man who is so much affisted with reason, that he is able without seare and trembling to say unto Fortune:

ห็บ) เม่ง ฉทัก ธุระทุธ, อังโรคง 5" ฉัวส ทั้ง รักรกับสหุร. Wel come to me, if good shou bringe st ought, Andif shou fuile, I will take little thought.

Or thus: Well maist shou take from me some jey of mind, But little griefe, thou fralt me leave behind.

hath this benefit by his confidence and resolution: that as he taketh most joy of his good fortimes when they are prefent; so he never feareth the losse of them, as if it were a calamitie insupportable. And herein we may aswell imitate as admire the disposition and affection of Anaxa. goras, who when he heard the newes of his fons death I know full well (quoth he) when I begot him that die he must: and after his example, when soever any infortunitie hapneth, to be readie with these & such like speeches: I know that riches were not permanent, but transitorie and for a day: I never thought other, but that they who conferred these dignities upon me both might to and could deprive me of them I wift: that I had a good wife and vertuous dame, but withall a woman and no more: I was not ignorant that my friend was a man(that is to fay) a living creature by nature mutable, as Plato used to fay. And verily, such preparations and dispositions of our affections as these, if peradventure there shall be fall unto us any thing against our intent and minde, but not contrarie to our expectation, as they will never admit fuch paffionate words as these (Ineverthought it would have fallen out so, I was in great hope of other matters, and little looked I for this) fo they thall be able to rid us of all fudden pantings and leapings of the hart, of unquiet & disorderly beating of the pulses, and soone stay and settle the furious & tronblefome motions of impatience. Carnesdes was woont in time of greatest prosperitie to put men in minde of a change; for that the thing which hapneth contrarie to our hope and expect to tation, is that which altogether and wholy doth breed forrow and griefe. The kingdome of the Macedonians was not an handfull to the Romaine Empire and dominion; and yet king Perfew when he had loft Macedonie, did not only himfelfe lament his owne fortune most piriously, but in the ciesalfo of the whole world he was reputed a most unfortunate and miserableman, But behold Paulus Aemelius whose hap it was to vanquish the said Perseus, when he departed our of that Province, and made over into the hands of another his whole atmie, with fo great commaund both of land and sea, was crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and so did sacrifice unto the gods with joy and thankf-giving in the judgement of all men, woorthily extolled and reputed as happie. For why? when he received first that high commission and mightie power withall, he knew full well, that he was to give it over and refigne it up when his time was expired; whereas Perfeus on the contrarie fide, lost that which he never made account to lose. Certes even the Poet Homer hath given us verie well to understand, how forcible that is, which hapneth belides hope and unlooked for, when he bringeth in ulyfes upon his returne, weeping for the death of his dog; but when he fate by his owne wife who shed teares plentifully, wept not at all; for that he had long before at his leafure against this comming home of his, prevented and broughtinto subjection (as it were) by the rule of reason, that passion which otherwise heeknew well enough would have broken out; whereas, looking for nothing leffe than the death of his dog, he fell fuddenly into it, as having had no time before to repreffe the fame. In fumme, of all those accidents which light upon us contrarie to our will; fome grieve and vexe us by the course and instinct of nature; others (and those be the greater part) we are woont to be offended and difcontented with, upon a corrupt opinion and foolith custome that we have taken: and therefore we should do verie well, against such temptations as these, to be ready with that sentence of Me-

No harme nor losse thou dost sustaine: But that thou list so for to faine. And how (quoth he) can it concerne thee? For if no flesh without it wound,

Nor soule within, then all is sound. As for example, the base parentage and birth of thy father; the adulterie of thy wife; the lost or repulle of any honor, dignitie or preeminence: for what should let, not with standing all these croffes, but that thy bodie and minde both may be in right good plight and excellent effate? And against those accidents which seeme naturally to grieve and trouble us, to wit, maladic, paines and travels; death of deere friends and toward children, we may oppose another saying of Euripides the Poët:

Alas,alas and well a-day: But why alas, and well away? Nought elfe to us hath yet beene delt,

But that who daily men have felt. For no remonstrance nor reason is so effectuall to restraine and stay this passionate and sensus Por no remoundance when it is readic to flip and be carried headlong away with our affections, as that which call also remembrance the common and naturall necessitie; by meanes whereof and in regard his bodie, being mixed and compounded, doth expose and offer this handle amanusce and vantage whereby fortune is to take hold when the wreftleth against him; for otherwife, a the greatest and most principall things, he abideth fast and sure. King Demetrim ometwing freed and woon the citie Megara, demanded of Stilpo the wife Philosopher, whether naving oftany goods in the fackage and pillage thereof? Sir (quoth he) I faw not fo much as no man carrying any thing of mine away; femblably, when fortune hath made what spoile one can, and taken from us all other things, yet fomewhat there remaineth fill within our felves,

Which Greeks do what they can or may, Shall neither drive nor beare away.

In which regard we ought altogether fo to depreffe, debase and throw downe out humaine nature, as if it had nothing firme, stable and permanent, nothing above the reach and power of fortune: but contrariwife, knowing that it is the leaft and woorst part of man, and the same sraile, brittle, and subject to death, which maketh us to lie open unto fortune and her affaults; whereas in respect of the better part we are masters over her, and have her at command, when there be-20 ing feated and founded most furely the best and greatest things that we have, to wit, found and honest Opinions, Arts and Sciences, good discourses tending to vertue, which be all of a subflance incorruptible, and whereof we can not be robbed: we (I fay) knowing thus much, ought in the confidence of our felves to cary a minde invincible and fecure against what foever shall happen, & be able to fay that to the face of Fortune, which Socrates addressing his speech indeed covertly to the Judges, feemed to speake against his two accusers, Anytus and Alehtus: Well may Anytus and Melitus bring me to my death, but hurt or harme me they shall never be able. And even so Fortune hath power to bring a disease or sicknesse upon a man, his goods she can take away, raife the may a flander of him to tyrant, prince or people, and bring him out of grace and favour; but him that is vertuous, honest, valiant and magnanimous, she can not make wic-30 ked, dishonest, base-minded, malicious & envious : and in one word, she hath not power to take from him a good habitude, fetled upon wifdome and diferetion, which wherefoever it is alwaies present, doth more good unto a man for to guide him how to live, than the pilot at sea for to direct a thip in her courfe; for furely the pilot, be he never to skilfull, knoweth not how to still the rough and furging billowes when he would, he can not allay the violence of a tempett, or bluftering winde, neither put into a fafe harbor and haven, or gaine a commodious bay to anker in at all times and in every coast, would be never so faine, nor resolutely without feare and trembling when he is in a tempest, abide the danger and under-goe all; thus farre foorth onely his art ferveth, folong as he is in no despaire, but that his skill may take place;

To strike main-saile, and downe the lee To let ship hull, untill he see The foot of mast no more above The fea: while he doth not remove, But with one hand in other fast Quaketh and panterball agast.

But the disposition and staied minde of a prudent man, over and besides that it bringesh the body into a quiet and calmeestate, by diffipating and dispatching for the most part the occasions and preparatives of diseases, and that by continent life, sober diet, moderate exercises, and travels in measure; if haply there chance some little beginning or indisposition to a passion, upon which the minde is ready to runne it felfe, as a thip, upon fome blinde rocke under the water, 50 it can quickly turne about his nimble and light croffe-faile yard, as Afelepiades was woont to fay, and so avoid the danger.

But fay there come upon us some great and extraordinary accident, such as neither we lookedfor, nor be able by all the power we have, either to overcome or endure 3 the haven is neere at hand, we may fwim fafely thither out of the body, (as it were) out of a veffell that leaketh and taketh water, and will no longer holde a passenger: as for foolish folke, it is the seare of death, and not the love of life that caufeth them to cling and flicke so close to the body, hanging and clasping thereunto no otherwise than ulysses to the wilde figge tree, why hee feared with great horror, the gulfe Charybdes roaring under him;

Whereas the winds would not permit to stay, Nor suffer him to rowe or saile away:

displeased infinitely in the one, and dreading fearefully the other. But he that fome measure (be it never so little) knoweth the nature of the soule, and casteth this with him life: That by death there is a paffage out of this life, either to a better state, or at least-wife not a woorse; certes he is furnished with no meane way faring provision to bring him to the security of mind in this life, I meane the feareleffe contempt of death: for he that may (fo long as vertue adthe better part of the foule (which indeed is proper unto man) is predominant) live pleafantly; a when the contrary passions, which are enemies to nature, doeprevaile, depart resolutely and without feare, faying thus unto himfelfe:

> God will me suffer to be gone When that I will my felfe, anon,

What can we imagine to happen unto a man of this resolution, that should encumber, trouble or terrifichim ? for whofoever he was that faid: I have prevented thee (ô Fortune) I have ftop. ped up all thy avenewes, I have intercepted and choked all the waies of accesse and entry; surely he fortified himfelfe, not with barres and barricadoes, not with locks and keies, ne yet with mures and walles, but with Philosophicall and fage lessons, with sententious fawes, and with discourses of reason, whereof all men that are willing, be capable. Neither ought a man to discredit the, tructh of these and such like things which are committed in writing, and give no beleefe unto them, but rather to admire, and with an affectionate ravishment of spirit embrace and imitate them; yea, and withall to make a triall and experiment of himfelfe; first in smaller matters, proceeding afterwards to greater, untill he reach unto the highest, and in no wife to shake off such meditations, nor to flift off and feeke to avoid the exercife of the minde in this kinde, and info doing, he thall haply finde no such difficultie as he thinketh. For as the effeminate delicacy and niceneffe of our mind, amused alwaies and loving to be occupied in the most easie objects, and retiring eft-foones from the cogitation of those things that fall out erosse, unto such as tend unto greatest pleasure, causeth it to be soft and tender, and imprinteth a certaine daintinessenot able to abide any exercise; so if the same minde would by custome learne and exercise it selse in, apprehending the imagination of a maladic, of paine, travell, and of banishment, and enforceit felfe by reason to withstand and strive against ech of these accidents, it will be found and seene by experience, that fuch things which through an erronious opinion were thought painefull, grievous, hard and terrible, are for the most part but vaine in deed, deceitfull and contemptible: like as reason will show the same if a man would consider them each one in particular. Howbeit the most part mightily feare and have in horror that verse of Menander, as not knowing how material litis to the exempting and freeing of a man from all griefe and forrow, to meditate before-hand, and to be able to looke open-eied full against fortune, and not 40 to make those apprehensions and imaginations in himselfe soft and effeminate, as if hee were fostered and nourished in the shadow, under many foolish hopes which ever yeeld to the contrarie, and bee not able to refift fo much as any one. But to come againe unto Menander, we have to answer unto him in this maner: True it is indeed, there is no man living able to fay: This or this shal never happen unto me; howbeit, thus much may a man that is alive fay and affirme: So long as I live I will not do this, to wit, I will not lie; I will never be a cousiner, nor circumvent any man; I will not defraud any one of his owne; neither will I fore-lay and furprise any man by a wile. This lieth in our power to promife and performe, and this is no fmall matter, but a great meanes to procure tranquillitie and contentment of minde. Whereas contrariwife, the remorfe of confcience when as a man is privite to himfelfe, and must need sconfesses and fay: These and these wicked parts I have committed, sestereth in the soule like an ulcer and fore in the flesh, and leaveth behind it repentance in the foule, which fretteth, galleth, gnaweth, and fetteth it a bleeding fresh continually. For, whereas all other forrowes, griefes, and anguishes, reason doth take away; repentance onely it doth breed and engender, which together with shame biteth and punisherh it selfe; for like as they who quiver and shake in the seavers called Epioli; or contrariwife burne by occasion of other agues, are more afflicted and more at ease than those who suffer the same accidents by exterior causes, to wit, winters cold or summers heat; even fo all mischances and casuall calamities, bring with them lighter dolors and paines ascomming from without. But when a man is forced thus to confesse,

My seife I may well thanke for this, None els for it blame woorthy is.

which is an ordinary speech of them who lamentably bewaile their sinnes from the bottome of their hearts, it causeth griefe and forrow to be so much more heavy, and it is joyned with thame and infamie: whereupon it commeth to passe, that neither house richly and finely surnithed, nor heapes of gold and filver, no parentage or nobilitie of birth, no dignitic of estate and autho-10 ritie how high foever, no grace in speech; no force and power of eloquence; can yeeld unto a mans life fuch a caline (as it were) and peaceable tranquillitie; as a foule and confcience cleere from wicked deeds, finfull cogitations and leaud defleignes, which having the fource & founraine of life (I meane the inward disposition of the heart) not troubled & polluted, but clere and clented; from whence all good and laudable actions do flowe and proceed, and the fame doe give a lively, cheerefull, and effectuall operation, even by fome divine inflinet and heavenly inipiration, together with a bold courage and haughty minde, and with all yeeld the remembrance of a vertuous and well led life, more sweete, pleasant, firme and permanent, than is that hope . Or Rose. whereof Pindarus writeth, the nurse and fostresse of old age: for we must not thinke, that (as marie banks Carneades was wont to fay) the * Cenfers or perfuming pannes wherin fiveet incenfe is burned, after they be 20 reteine and render the pleasant odor along time after they be emptie, and that the vertuous and left word, deeds of a wife and honest man, should not alwaies leave behinde them in the foule an amiable, as some exdelightful, and fresh remembrance thereof; by meanes whereof, that inward joy being watered, pounds is ever greene, buddeth and flourisheth still, despising the shamefull errour of those who with their plaints, moanes, and wailings, diffame this life of ours; faying: It is a very hell and place of torments, or else a region of confined and exiled foules, into which they were fent away and banithed forth of heaven. And heere I cannot choose but highly commend that memorable saying of Diogenes, who feeing once a certeine stranger at Lacedamon dressing and trimming himfelfe very curioufly against a feastivall & high day: What meanes all this (quoth he) my good friend? to a good and honest man is not everie day in the yeere a feast and holy day? yes verily, 30 and if we be wife we should thinke all daies double feasts, and most solemne gaudie daies for furely this world is a right facred and holy temple, yea and most divine, befeeming the majestie of God, into which man is inducted and admitted at his nativitie, not to gaze and looke at flatues and images cut and made by mans hand, and fuch as have no motion of their owne, but to behold those works and creatures which that divine spirit and almightic power in woonderfull wifedome and providence hath made and fhewed unto us fenfible; and yet (as Plato faith) representing and resembling intelligible powers, from whence proceed the beginnings of life and mooving, namely the lunne, the moone, the starres; what should I speake of the rivers which continually fend out fresh water still; and the earth which bringeth foorth nourishment for all living creatures, and yeeldeth nutriment likewife to every plant? Now if our life be the 40 imitation of fo facted myfteries, and (as it were) a profession & entrance into so holy a religion of all othersmost perfect, we must need sesteeme it to be full of contentment & continuall joy: neither ought we (as the common multitude doth) attend & wait for the feafts of Saturne, Bacchus, or Minerva, and fuch other high daies wherein they may folace themselves, make metric and laugh, buying their mirth and joy for money, giving unto plaiers, jefters, dauncers, & fuch like their hire and reward for to make them laugh. In which fealts and folemnities, we use to fit with great contentment of minde, arraied decently according to our degree and calling, (for no man useth to mourne and lament, when he is professed in the mysteries of Ceres, and received into that confraternitie; no man forroweth when he doth behold the goodly fights of the Pythian games; no man hungreth or fafteth during the Saturnals:) what an indignitic and 50 shame is it then that in those feasts which God himselfe hath instituted, and wherein (as a man would fay) he leadeth the daunce, or is perfonally himselfe to give institution and induction, men should contamminate, pollute and profane as they do, dishonoring their life for the most part, with weeping, wailing, fighing and groning, or at the leastwife in deepe thoughts & penfive cares. But the greatest shame of all other is this; that we take pleasure to heare the organs and instruments of musicke found pleafantly; we delight to heare birdes singing sweetly; we behold with right good will, beafts playing, sporting, dauncing, and skipping featly; and contratiwise wee are offended when they houle, roare, snarle, and gnash their teeth, as also when they shew a fierce, sterne, and hideous looke; and all this while seeing our owne lives heavie, fad, travailed and oppreffed with most unpleasant passions, most intricate and inexplicable affaires, and overwhelmed with infinite and endleffe cares; yet we will not affoord our felves fome reft and breathing time; nay (that which more is) we will not admit the speech and remonstrances of our friends and familiars, whom if we would give eare unto, we might without fault finding receive the present, remember with joy and thanksgiving that which is past, and without diffrust, suspition and searc, expect with joyfull and lightsome hope that which is to come.

FVLNESSE.

The Summarie.

Lithough st be needlesse to stand curiously upon the concatenation and coherence of these matters handled by Plutarch, how they be knit and linked together, considering that he penned these discourses of his at sundree times; and both they who have reduced them into one volume; and those also who have translated them out of Greekeinto other languages, have not all followed one order: yet I thinke verily that this present

Treatise, as concerning Naughtie Bashfulnes, is fitly joined next to the former, as touching the repose and tranquillitie of the spirit. For one of the greatest shaking cracks that our soule can receive in her tranquillitie, in when he fecretly and by stealth may be lifted from her feat, for to drive a man to those things which may trouble him immediately, and much more afterwards. Now this evill bashfulnesse bath this vicious and dangerous qualitic, to know how to feduce and draw us by faire femblant, and nevertheleffe to trouble & confound after a strange fastion the contemment of our spirits, as appereth plainely in this little booke, which deserveth to be well perused and considered by all forts of people. Now after he hath flewed what this evill shamefastnes is; he declareth that it is no lesse permicious and hurtfull then impudencie; adding moreover that wee ought to take good heed, lest in avoiding it, we fall into contrarie extremities, as they do who are envious. I hamelesse, obstinate, idle and dissolute. Then he proceedeeh to teach us, that the first a. A principall preservative against this poison is to holde it for to be most dangerous and deadly, which he doth verifie and proove by notable examples. Which 40 done, he describeth particularly and from point to point, the incommodities, perils, and mufortunes that come by naughty ball fulnes, applying thereto good and proper remedies, giving withall many fage and wife counsels drawen out of Philosophie, tending to this stop and marke; that neither the regard of our friends, kinsfolke and familiars, nor yet therespect of any thing else besides, ought to draw from our thought, our mouth or hands, any thing contrarie to the dutie of an honest man: which both for the present, and also all the rest of our life may leave in our soule, the cicatrice or skar of repentance forrow and heavineffe. In conclusion, to the end that we should not commit those deeds in haste, which afterwards we may repent at leafure; he freweth that we ought to have before our eies the hurts and inconveniences caused before by evil ball fulneffe, that the consideration thereof might keepe us from falling into fresh and new

OF UNSEEMELY AND naughtie bashfulnesse.

Mong those plants which the earth bringeth foorth, some there are which not onely by their owne nature bee wilde and favage, and withall bearing no fruit at all; but (that which woorse is) in their growth doe hurt unto good feeds and fruitfull plants: and yet skilful gardiners and husbandmen, judge them to be arguments and fignes, not of bad ground, but rather of a kinde and fat foile; semblaby the passions and affections of the minde, simply and in themselves are not good, howbeitthey spring as buds and flowers from a towardly nature, and fuch as gently can yeeld it felfe to be wrought, framed, and brought into order by reason. In this kinde I 163

may raunge that which the Greekes call Autoria, which is as much to fay, as a foolifh and rufticall shamefastnes; no evill signe in it selfe, how beit the cause and occasion of evill and naughtinesse. For they that be given to bash and shame over-much and when they should not, commitmany times the fame faults that they doe, who are shamelesse and impudent: heere onely is 20 the difference, that they, when they trespasse and do amisse, are displeased with themselves, and grieve for the matter, whereas thefe take delight & pleasure therin : for he that is gracelesse and palt shame, hath no sense or feeling of griefe when he hath committed any foule or dishonest act; contratiwife, who foever be apt to bath & be afhamed quickly, are foone moved & troubled anon, even at those things which seeme onely dishonest, although they be not indeed. Now, lest the equivocation of the word might breed any doubt. I meane by Dy/opia, immoderate bathfulneffe, whereby one blutheth for thame exceedingly and for every thing, whereupon fuch an one is called in Greeke Dyloperm, for that his vilage and countenance together with his mind changeth, falleth and is cast downe: for like as Karifein in Greeke is defined to be a facred heavinesse, which causeth a downe-looke; even so, that shame and dismaiednesse which maketh 30 us that we dare not looke a man in the face as we should and when we ought, the call Automatic. And hereupon it was that the great Oratour Demosthenes said of an impudent fellow, that he had inhis cies not weeks, but mercus, i. harlots, playing pretily upon the ambiguity of the word weeks, which fignifieth both the round apple in the cies, and alfoa maiden or virgine : but contrariwife the over-bashfull person (whom wee speake of) sheweth in his countenance a minde too fort, delicate and effernmente, and yet he flattereth himselfe therein, and calleth that fault (wherein the impudent person surpaffeth him) Shamefaltnesse. Now Cato was woont to say, That he loved to fee yoong folke rather to bluth than to looke pale; as having good reason to acquaint and teach youth to dread shame and reproch more than blame and reproofe; yea, and suspition or obloquie, rather than perill or danger.

Howbeit, we must abridge & cut off the excesse and over-much, which is in such timidity and feare of reproch; for that often-times it commeth to passe in some, who dreading no lesse to heare ill and be accused, than to be chastised or punished; for false hearts are frighted from doing their duty, and in no wife can abide to have an hard word fooken of them. But as we are not to neglect these that are so tender, nor ought to feed them in their seeblenesse of heart; so againe, we must not praise their disposition who are stiffe and instexible: such as the Poet describeth, when he faith:

Who feareleffe is, and basheth not all men fast to beholde; In whom appeares the dogged force of Anaxarchus bolde:

but we ought to compound a good mixture and temperate medley of both extremities, which may take away this excessive obstinacie which is impudence, and that immoderate modestie which is meere childithnesse and imbecilitie. True it is that the cure of these two maladies is difficult; neither can this excelle both in the one and the other be cut off without danger. For like as the skilfull husbandman when he would rid the ground of some wilde bushes and fruitleffe plants, he laieth at them mainely with his grubbing hooke or mattocke, untill he have fetched them up by the roote; or else sets fire unto them and so burneth them; but when he comes to proine or cut a vine, an appletree, or an olive, he carrieth his hand lightly for feare of woun. ding any of the found wood, in fetching off the fuperfluous and ranke branches, and so kill the heart thereof; even so the Philosopher, entending to plucke out of the mind of a yoong man, either envie, an unkind and favage plant, which hardly or unneth at all may be made gentle and brought to any good use; or the unseasonable and excessive greedines of gathering good, or diffolute and difordinate lust; he never feareth at all in the cutting thereof, to draw blood, to presse and pierce hard to the bottom, yea and to make a large wound and deepe skarre. But when he fetteth to the keene edge of remonstrance and speech, to the tender and delicate part of the foule, for to cut away that which is excessive or overmuch, to wit, wherein is seated this unmeasurable and sheepish bashfulnesse, he hash a great care and regard, lest ere he be aware he to cut away therewith, that ingenuous and honest shamefaltnesse that is so good and commendable. For we fee that even nourfes themselves when they thinke to wipe away the filth of their little infants, and to make them cleane; if they rub any thing hard, otherwhiles fetch off the skin withall, make the flesh raw and put them to paine. And therefore we must take heed, that in seeking by all meanes to do out this excellive bathfulneffe utterly in yoong people, we make them not brasen faced, such as care not what is faid unto them, and blush thereat no more than a blackdog, and in one word standing stiffe in any thing that they do; but rather we ought to doe, as they, who demolish and pull downe the dwelling houses that be necre unto the temples of the gods; who for feare of touching any thing that is holy or facred, suffer those ends of the edifices and buildings to stand still, which are next and joined close thereto; yea and those they 20 underprop and stay up, that they should not fall downe of themselves; even so (Isay) beware and feare we must, whiles we be tempering about this immoderate shamefacednesse for toremoove it, that we do not draw away with it grace and modesty, gentlenes and debonarity which be adjacents and lie close unto it; under which qualities lieth lurking and sticketh close to, the forefaid naughtic bathfulneffe, flattering him that is poffeffed therewith, as if he were full of humanitie, courtefic, civilitie and common fenfe; not opinionative, fevere, inflexible and untractable : which is the reason, that the Stoicke Philosophers when they dispute of this matter, have diffinguished by severall names, this aptnes to blush or over-much bashfulnesse, from modestie and shamefacednesse indeed: for feare lest the equivocation and ambiguitie of one common word, might give fome occasion and vantage to the vicious passion it selte to do some 30 hurt. As for us, they must give us leave to use the tearmes without calumniation, or rather permit us to diffinguish according to Homer, when he faith, neither without good calle is it, that in the former place he putteth downe the harme and discommoditie thereof: for furely it is not profitable but by the meanes of reason, which cutteth off that which is superfluous, and leaveth a meane behinde.

Shame is a thing that doth mickle harme, and profiteth as much.

To come then unto the remedies thereof; it behooveth him first and formost, who is given to blushing at every smal matter, to believe & be perswaded, that he is possessed with such an huttfull passion: (now there is nothing hurtfull, which is good and honest) neither ought he to take pleasure and delight when he shall be tickled in the care with praises and commendations, when 40 he shall heare himselfe called gentle, jolly and courteous, in steed of grave, magnanimous and just; neither let him do as Pegasu the horse in Euripides, who

that is to fay, give place and yeeld after a bafe manner to the demannds and requests of everie man; or object himselfe to their wil and pleasure, for feare (for footh) lest one should say of him Lo what a hard man is this? See how inexorable he is. It is reported of Boechorus a king of Egypt, that being rough, sell & austere, the goddesself the sent the serpent called Assia, for to wind and wreath about his head, and so to cast a shadow over him from above, to the ende that hee might be put in minde to judge aright: but this excessive shamefastnesse which alwaies over so spreadeth and coverest them, who are not manly but faint-hearted and esseminate, not suffering them once to date, to deny, or gainfay any thing, surely, would avert and withdraw judges from oding justice close up their mouthes, that in counsels and consultations should deliver their opinion stankly yea and cause them both to say and do many things inconsiderately against their minde, which otherwhiles they would not. For looke whosover is most unreasonable and importunate, he will ever tyrannize and dominier over such an one, forcing by his impudencie the bashfulnesse of the other; by which meanes, it commett to passe that this excessive fhame, like into a low piece of foft ground which is ready to receive all the water that comes, and apt to be overflowed and drowned, having no power to withfland and repulse any encounter; nor say a word to the contrarie what soever is proposed, yeeldeth accesse to the lewdest deficiences, acts and passions that be. An evill guardian and keeper of childhood and yoong age, is this excessive bath fulnesse, as brut me well faid, who was of this minde, that neither he nor she could well and honesstly passe the flower of their fresh youth, who had not the heart and sace to refuse and denie any thing; even so likewise, a bad governesse is of the bride-bed and womens chamber, according to that which shee saide in sephoeles to the adulterer, who repented of the said.

Thy flattering words have me feduced,

And foper [waded, I am abufed. Infuch fort as this bathfulnes, over and befides, that it is vicious and faultie it felfe, spoileth and marreth cleane the intemperate & incontinent person, by making no resistance to his appetites and demaunds, but letting all ly unfortified, unbard, and unlockt, yeelding eafie accesse and entranceto those that will make affault and give the attempt, who may by great gifts and large offers catch and compaffe the wickedest natures that be: but furely by perswaffons and inductions, and by the meanes withall of this exceffive bashfulnesse, they often times conquer and get the mastric even of such as are of honest and gentle disposition. Here I passe-by the detriments and damages that this bashfulnesse hath beene the cause of, in many matters and that of profit 20 and commoditie: namely, how many men having not the heart to fay nay, have put forth and lent their money even to those whose credite they distrust; have been furcties for such as otherwife they would have beene loth and unwilling to engage themselves for, who can approove and commend this golden sentence (written upon the temple of Apollo) Be surety thou mailt, but make account then to pay: howbeit, they have not the power to do themselves good by that warning, when they come to deale in the world. And how many have come unto their end and died by the meanes of this foolish qualitie, it were hard to reckon. For Creen in Euripides when he spake thus unto Medea,

For me Madame it were much better now by flat deniall your minde to discontent, Thin baving once thus yeelded unto you sigh after wards full sore, and ay repent.

gave a very good leffon for others to follow; but himselfe overcome at length through his foolith bashfulnesse, graunting one day longer of delay at her request, overthrew his owne state, and his whole house. Some there were also who doubting and suspecting that they were laide for, to be bloodily murdered, or made away by poison, yet upon a foolish modestie not refusing to go into the place of daunger, came to their death and were foone destroied. Thus died Dion; who notwithstanding hecknew well enough that Callippus laide wait for him to take away his life, yet(forfooth)abashed he was to distruit his friend and host, and so to stand upon his guard. Thus was Antiparer the sonne of Cassander massacred; who having first invited Demetrius to 40 supper, was bidden the morrow after to his house likewise; and for that he was abashed to misttult Demetrius, who the day before had trusted him, refused not to go, but after supper he was murdered for his labour. Moreover, when Polysperchon had undertaken and promised unto Cassander for the summe of one hundred talents to kill Hercules (a base sonne of king Alexander by lady Barfine) he fent and requested the faid Hercules to sup with with him in his lodging, theyoong gentleman had no liking at all to fuch a bidding, but miftrufting and fearing his curtesie, alleaged for his excuse that he was not well at ease: whereupon Poly sperchon came himfelfe in person unto him, and in this maner began to perswade: Above all things my good childe (quoth he) studie and endevour to imitate the humanitie and sociable nature of your noble father, unlesse haply you have me in jealousie and suspition as if I went about to com-⁵⁰ passe your death. The youth was abashed to heare him say so, and went with him 5 well, supper was no fooner ended, but they made an end of the yoong gentleman also, and strangled him outright: fo that it is no ridiculous and foolish advertisement (as some let not to say) but a wise and fage advise of Hesiodus when he faith;

Thy friend and lover to supper do invite,

Thy foe leave out, for he will thee require.

Benot in any wife bashfull and ashamed to refusehis offer whom thou knowest to hate thee:
but never leave out and reject him once who seemeth to put his trust and considence in thee:
for

for if thou do invite, thou shalt be invited againe; and if thou be bidden to a supper and go, thou canst not choose but bid againe; if thou abandon once thy distrust and diffidence, which is the guard of thy fafty, and so marre that good tincture and temperature by a foolish shame that thou halt, when thou darest not refuse.

Seeing then that this infirmitie and maladie of the minde, is the cause of many inconveniences, affay we must to chase it away with all the might we have by exercise, beginning at the first like as men do in other exercises, with things that are not very difficult, nor such as a man may boldly have the face to denie: as for example, if at a dinner one chance to drinke unto thee. when thou half drunke fufficiently already; be not abashed to resuse for to pledge him, neither force thy felfe, but take the cup at his hand and fet it downe againe on the boord; againe, there, is another perchance that amids his cups chalengeth thee to hazzard or to play at dice; be not ashamed to fay him may neither feare thou although thou receive a flout and fcoffe at his hands for deniall : but rather do as Xenophanes did, when one Lafue the fonne of Hermiones called him coward, because he would not play at dice with him: I confesse (quoth he) I am a very dastatdin those things that be lewd and naught, and I dare do nothing at all; moreover, say thou sall into the hands of a practing & talkative busic bodie, who catcheth hold on thee, hangeth upon thee and will not let thee go? be not theepith and bathfull; but interrupt and cut his tale thort, thake him off I fay, but go thou forward and make an end of thy bulinesse whereabout thou wentest for fuch refufals, fuch repulses, this and evalions in small matters, for which men cannot greatly complaine of us, exercifing us not to blufh and be ashamed when there is no cause, do inure 20 and frame us well before hand unto other occasions of greater importance. And heere in this place, it were not amisse to call unto remembrance a speech of Demosthenes: for when the Athenians being follicited and mooved to fend aid unto Harpalus, were fo forward in the action, that they had put themselves in armes against king Alexander, all on a sodaine they discovered upon their owne coasts Philoxenus, the lieutenant generall of the kings forces, and chiefe admirall of his Armada at fea: now when the people were fo aftonied upon this unexpected occurrent, that they had not a word to fay for very feare: What wil these men do (quoth Demosthenes) when they shall see the funne, who are so afraid that they dare not looke against a little lampe; even fo I fay to thee that art given much to blush and be abashed: What wilt thou be able to do in weightie affaires, namely, when thou shalt be encountred by a king; or if the bodie of some so people or state be earnest with thee to obtaine ought at thy hand that is unreasonable? when thou hast not the heart to refuse for to pledge a familiar friend if he chance to drinke unto thee & offer thee a cup of wine? or if thou canft not find meanes to escape and wind thy selfe out of the company of a babling bufie bodie, that hath faftened and taken hold of thee, but fuffer fucha vaine prating fellow as this to walke and leade thee at his pleasure up and downe, having not so much power as to fay thus unto him: I will fee you againe hereafter at some other time, now I have no leafure to talke with you.

Over and befides, the exercise and use of breaking your selves of this bashfulnesse in praising others for small and light matters, will not be unprofitable unto you; as for example: Say, that when you are at a feast of your friends, the harper or minstrell do either play or sing out of tune; 40 or haply an actour of a Comedie, dearely hired for a good piece of money, by his ill gracein acting, marrethe play and difgrace the authour himselfe Menander, and yet neverthelesse, the vulgar fort doe applaud, clap their hands, and highly commend and admire him for his deed: in mine advice it would be no great paine or difficulty for thee to give him the hearing with patience and filence, without praifing him after a fervile and flattering maner, otherwife than you thinke it meet and reason : for if in such things as these, you be not master of your selfe, how will you be able to hold, when some deare friend of yours shall reade unto you either some soolish rime or bad poesse that himselse bath composed? if he shal shew unto you some oration of his owne foolish and ridiculous penning? you will fall a praising of him, will you? you will keepe a clapping of your hands with other flattering jacks? I would not els. And if you doe fo, so how can you reprove him when he shall commit some grosse fault in greater matters? how shall you be able to admonish him, if he chance to forget himselfe in the administration of some magittracie or in his carriage in wedlocke, or in politike government? And verily, for mine owne part, I do not greatly allow and like of that answere of Pericles, who being requested by a friend to beare false withesie in his behalfe, and to binde the same with an oath, whereby he should be forfworne: I am your friend (quoth he) as far as the altar; as if he should have faid: Saving my conscience and ducty to the gods: for surely he was come too neere already unto him. But he, who hath accustomed himselse long before, neither to praise against his owne minde, one who hath made an oration, nor to applaud unto him who hath fung, nor to laugh heartily at him who came out with some stale or poore jest which had no grace; hee will (I trow) never suffer his friend and familiar to proceed fo farre, as to demand fuch a request of him, or once be so bolde as to move him (who before had refused in smaller trifles to satisfie his defire) in this maner : Be perjuted for me; beare false witnesse for my sake; or pronounce an unjust sentence for the love

ofme. After the same maner we ought to be prepared and provided before-hand against those that beinstant to borrow mony of us, namely, if we have bene used to deny them in matters that neiather be of great moment nor hard to be refused. There was one upon a time, who being of this mind, that there was nothing so honest as to crave and receive, begged of Archelau the king of Macedonie (as he fate at supper) the cup of golde whereout he drunke himselfe; the king called unto his page that waited at his trencher, and commanded him to give the faid cup unto Euripides, who fat at the boord; and withall, casting his cie wistly upon the party who craved it : As for you fir (quoth he) worthy you are for your asking to go without; but Euripides deferveth to have, though he do not crave. A woorthy speech, importing thus much, that the judgement of reason ought to be the best master and guide to direct us in our gifts and free liberalitie, and not bathfulnesse and shame to denie. But wee contrariwise, neglecting and despissing many times those that be honest and modest persons, yea, our very familiar friends, who have need of our o helpe, and feeme to reque the fame, are ready to beltow our bounty upon fuch as inceffantly importune us with their impudent craving, not for any affection that we have to pleasure them, butbecause we can not finde in our heart to say themnay. Thus did king Antigonus the elder to Bias, after he had beene a long time an importunate begger : Give this Bias (quoth he) a talent for me thinks he will have it perforce : and yet this antigonus, of all princes and kings that everwere, had the best grace and most dexterity to put by, and thist off such unreasonable beggers: for when a beggerly Cynicall Philosopher craved once at his hands a drachme: It is not for aking (quoth he) to give a drachme: Why then (quoth the other againe) give me a talent: Neither is it meet (quoth the king) for a Cynick to receive a talent. Diogenes as he walked otherwiles along the Ceranicum (that is, a street in Athens, where stood crected the statues of worthy perfonages) would aske almes of those images; and when some marvelled at him therefore: I do it (quoth he) to learne how to take a repulse and deniall. Semblably, we ought first to betrained in small matters, and to exercise our selves in denying slight requests unto such as would feeme to demand and have at our hands that which is not fit and requifite, to the end that we may not be to feeke for an answere when we would denie them in matters of greater importance: for as Demostheres was woont to fay: He who hath spent and bestowed that which he had otherwise than he should, will never employ those things which he hath, not as he ought, if peradventure he should be furnished agains therewith. And looke how often we doe faile, and be wanting in honest things, and yet abound in superfluities, it is a signe that we are in a great fault, and many waies shame groweth to us by that meanes.

Moreover, foit is, that this excessive ball fulnesse is not onely a bad and undiscreet steward to layout and disperse our money, but also to dispose of our serious affaires and those of great consequence, wherein it will not admit the advice and counfell that reason giveth; for oftentimes it falleth out, that when we be ficke, we fend not for the best and most expert Physicians, in respect of some friend, whom we favour and reverence so, as we are loth to doe otherwise than he would advise us: likewise wee chuse for masters and teachers of our children, not those alwaies who are best and meetest, but such as make sute and meanes unto us for to be enterteined; yea, and many times, when we have a cause to be tried in the law, we choose not alwaies the most sufficient & expert Advocates or Barristers for our counsel to plead for us; but for to grarifie a fonne of some familiar friend or kinsman of our owne, we commit the cause to him for to pracso tile and learne to plead in court to our great cost and losse. To conclude we may see manie of those that make profession of Philosophy, to wit, Epicureans, Stoicks, and others, how they follow this or that feet, not upon their owne judgement and election; but for that they were importuned by fome of their kinsfolke or friends thereto, whom they were loth to denie. Come on then, let us long before be exercised against such groffe faults in vulgar, smal & common occasions of this life; as for example, let us breake our selves from using either a bather * magazi, Erasto trim us, or a * painter to draw our picture, for to fatisfie the appetite of our foolish shame-min seemeth facednelle; from lo ging also in some bad Inne or Hostelrie where there is a better neere at i, a Fuller. hand, hand, because haply our hoast the goodman of the house hath oftentimes saluted us kindely; but rather make we a cuttome of it, (although there be but finall difference and ods between one and another) alwaies to chuse the better: and like as the Pythagoreans observed evermore priseifely not to croffe the right legge with the left, neither to take an odde number for an even, though otherwise all things else were equall and indifferent; even so are we to draw this into an ordinarie practife, that when we celebrate any folemne facrifice, or make a wedding dinner, or fome great feaft, we invite not him, who is woont with reverence to give us the gentle greeting and good morrow, or who feeing us a great way off ufeth to runne unto us, rather than him whom we know to be an honest man and a well-willer of ours 5 for whosoever is thus inured and exercifed long before, shall be hardly caught and surprised; may rather he shall never be once in affailed and fet upon in weightie matters. And thus much may fuffice as touching exercise and custome.

Moreover to come unto other profitable instructions which we have gathered for this purpose; the principall in mine advise is this, which sheweth & teacheth us, that all the passions and maladies of the minde be ordinarily accompanied with those inconveniences which we would feeme to avoid by their meanes: as for example, ambition and defire of honor hath common ly attending upon it diffionor; paine usually followeth the love of pleasures; labour and travell ensueth upon case and delicacie; repulse, overthrowes, and condemnations are the ends that enfue daily upon those that are given to be litigious, contentious, and desirous to cast, soile. and conquer others; femblably it hapneth unto exceffive bathfulnesse, which feeming to flew and thun the fmoke of blame, catteth it felfe into the very fire and flame of infamie. For those who be abashed to gaine-say and denie them, who importune them unreasonably, and will take no nay in things unjust, are constrained afterwards to beare both shame and blame at their hands who justly call them to their answer and accuse them woorthily; and whiles they seare fome light checke or private rebuke, many times they are faine to incurre and fusteine open difgrace and reproch: for being abathed to denie a friend who craveth to borrow money, as being loth to fay they have none, within a while after (with shame enough) they blush, when they shall be convinced to have had none; and having promifed to affift and fland to some who have suit in law, by that meanes are forced to contend with others, and afterwards being ashamed thereof, are driven to hide their heads and flie out of the way. Also there be many whom this soo to lish modestie hath caused to enter into some disadvantageous promise as touching the mariage either of daughter or fifter, and being entangled therewith have beene conftreined afterwards upon change of minde to breake their word and faile in their promife; as for him who faid in old time, that all the inhabitants of Asia served as slaves unto one man; for that they knew not how to pronounce one onely negative fyllable &, that is, No; he spake not in earnest but by way of bourd, and was disposed to jest: but furely these bashfull persons may if they list without one word spoken, by knitting and bending their browes onely, or nodding downward to the ground, avoid and escape many offices and absurd inconveniences, which often-times they do unwillingly and onely upon importunitie. For as Euripides faid very well,

Wife men do know how things to take: And of silence an answere to make.

And haply we have more cause to take that course with such as be senselesse and unreasonable: for to those who be honest, sensible, and of more humanitie, we need not seare to make excuse and fatisfie them by word of mouth. And for this purpose it were not amisse to be furnished with many answers and notable apothegmes of great and famous persons in times past; and to have them ready at hand to allege against such importunate & impudent fellows. Such was that faying of Phoeion to Antiparer: You can not have me to be your friend and a flatterer to; like wife the answere which he made unto the Athenians, who were earnest with him to contribute and give somewhat toward the charges of solemnizing a great feast, and withall applauded and clapped their hands: It were a thame (quoth he) that I should give any thing over and above unto you, and not to pay that which I owe to him yonder, pointing therewith to Callieles the usurer : for as Thucydides said; It is no shame to confesse and acknowledge povertie; but more shamefull it is indeed not to avoid and eschew it. But he who by reason of a faint, feeble, and delicate heart dare not for foolish shame answere thus unto one that demaundeth to borrow and then suffreth to passe out of his mouth a promise (as it were) an earnest pennie or pawne of Istied by foot with fetters not of braffe N or yron wrought; but shame, and cannot passe.

> My friend, I have in house or purse No filver white, for to disburse.

But Perfeus when he lent foorth a fumine of money to one of his familiar friends and acquaintance, went into the open market place to paffe the contract at the very banke or table of exchangers and usurers; being mindfull of that rule and precept of the Poet Hesiodus, which teacheth us in thefe words,

now when his friend marveiled hereat and faid; How now Perfess, fo formally and according to law? Yea (quoth he) because I would receive my money againe of you friendly, & not require it by courfe and fuit of law. For many there be, who at the first upon a kinde of foolish modellie. are abathed to call for affurance & fecuritie, but afterward be forced to proceed by order of law. & somake their friends their enemies. Againe, Cato sending commendatory letters up to Denis the Tyrant, in the behalfe and favour of one Helicona Cyzzcena, as of a kind, modeft, and courteous person, subscribed in maner of a post-date under his letter thus: That which you read above, take it as written in the commendation of a man, that is to fay, of a living creature by nature mutable. Contrariwife Xenocrates, although he were otherwife in his behaviour auftere, yet being overcome and yeelding to a kind of foolish modestie of his owne, recommended in his letters unto Poly (perchon, a man of no worth or qualitie, as it prooved afterwards by the lequell: Now when as that Macedonian Lord bade the partie welcome, and friendly gave him his hand, and withall used some words of course and complement; demanding whether he had neede of ought, and bidding him call for what he would; he made no more adoo but craved a whole talent of filver at his hands; which Polysperchon caused presently indeed to be weighed out unto him; but he dispatched his letters withall unto Xenverates to this effect: That from thencefoorth he should be more circumspect, and consider better whom he recommended unto him: and verily, herein onely was the error of Xenocrates, for that he knew not the man for whom he wrote: but we oftentimes knowing well enough that they be leawd and naughtic persons, yet are verie forward with our commendatorie letters; yea and that which more is, our purse is open unto them; we are ready to put money into their hands to our owne hinderance and damage; not with any pleasure that we take, nor upon affection unto them, as they do, who bellow their filver upon courtefanes, pleafants, and flatterers to gratifie them; but as displeased and discontented with their impudencie, which overturneth our reason, upfide downe, and forceth us to do against our owne judgement, in such fort, that if ever there were cause besides, we may by good reason say unto these bold and shamelesse beggers, that thus take vantage of our bathtulneffe:

I fee that Imust for your fake, Leawd courfes ever undertake.

o namely, in bearing falfe witneffe; in pronouncing wrong judgement; in giving my voice at any election for an unworthic and unmeet person; or in putting my money into his hands, whom I know unfufficient, and who will never repay it. And therefore of all paffions, this leawd and exceffive modeftie is that, which is accompanied prefently with repentance, and hath it not following afterwards as the rest: for at the verie instant when we give away our money, we grieve; when we beare fuch witnesse, we blush; when we affist them and fet to our helping hand, we incurre infamie; and if wee furnish them not with that which they require, wee are convinced as though we were not able. And for a fmuch as our weaknesse is such, that we cannot denie them simply that which they would have; we undertake and promise many times unto those who do importune & ly upon us unceffantly, even thosethings that we are not able to copasse & make ogood; as namely, our commendatorie letters for to finde favour in princes courts ; to be mediators for them unto great rulets and governors, and to talke with them about their causes, as being neither willing nor so hardie as thus to say; The king knoweth not us; hee regardeth others more, and you were better go to fuch and fuch. After this manner, when Lyfander had offendedking Agefilaus and incurred his heavy displeasure, and yet was shought woorthie to be chiefe in credit above all those that were about him, in regard of the great opinion and reputation that men had of him for his noble acts, he never bathed to repell and put backe those faces that came unto him, making excuse and bidding them to go unto others, and assay them, who were in greater credit with the king than himselfe. For it is no shame not to be able to effect all things, butfor a man to be driven upon a foolish modestie to enterprise such matters, as he is neither able to compasse nor meet to mannage; besides that it is sharnefull, I hold it also a right great corrofive to the heart.

But now to goe unto another principle, we ought willingly and with a ready heart to doe pleasure unto those that request at our hands such things as be meet and reasonable; not as for. ced thereto by a rufticall feare of fhame, but as yeelding unto reason and equity. Contrariwile, if their demaunds be hurtfull, abfurd, and without all reason, we ought evermore to have the say. ing of Zeno in readinesse, who meeting with a young man one of his acquaintance, walking close under the towne wall secretly as if he would norbe seene; asked of him the cause of his being there, and understanding by him that it was because he would avoide one of his friends, who had beene earnest with him to beare falle witnes in his behalfe: What failt thou (quoth Zeno) for that thouart? Was thy friend so bold and shamelesseto require that of thee which is unreasonable, unjust and hurtfull unto thee? And darest thou not stand against him in that which is just and honest? For who foever he was that faid, teacheth us an ill lesson, to learne to be naught our selves, when we would be revenged of naugh. tinesse. But such as repulse those who impudently and with a shamelesse face doe molestand trouble them, not fuffering themselves to be overcome with shamefacednesse, but rather shame to graunt unto shamelesse beggers those things that be shameful, are wife men and well advised, doing herein that which is right and just. Now as touching those importunate and shameless persons, who otherwise are but obscure, base and of no woorth, it is of no great matter to resist them when they be troublefome unto us. And fome there be who make no more ado but shift them off with laughter or a skoffe: like as Theorium ferved twaine who would feeme to bottom of him his rubber or currying combe in the verie baine; of which two, the one was a meete ftranger unto him, the other he knew well enough for anotorious theefe: I know not you (quoth he) to the one; and to the other, I know what you are well enough; and so he fent them both away with ameere frumpe. Lyfimache the priestreffe of Minerva in Athens, furnamed Polisi that is, the patronesse of the citie; when certaine Muletters who brought facrifices unto the temple, called unto her for to powre them out drinke freely: No (quoth the) my good friends,

Acrooked wedge is fit to cleave a knotted knurry tree, It well befeemes against learn d folke with lewdneffe arm'd to be.

I may not do fo, for feare you will make a custome of it.

Amigonus had under him in his retinue a yoong gentleman, whose father in times pathad bene a good warriour, and lead a band or company of fouldiours, but himselfe was a very comard, and of no service, and when he sued unto him (in regard of his birth) to be advanced unto the place of his father, late deceased: Yoong man (quoth he) my maner is to recompense and honour the prowesse and manhood of my souldiours, and not their good parentage. But if the party who affaileth our modelty, be a noble man, of might and authority (and fuch kinde of perfons of all other will most hardly endure a repulse, and be put off with a deniall or excuse, and namely, in the case of giving sentence or award in a matter of judgement, or in a voice at the lection of magistrates) peradventure it may be thought neither easie nor necessarie to doe that which Cato sometimes did, being then but of yoong yeeres, unto Catulus; now this Catulus was a man of exceeding great authoritie among the Romans, and for that time bare the Cenlute thip, who came unto Cato, (then Lord high treasurer of Rome that yeere) as a mediatour and intercessour for one, who had bene condemned before by Cato in a round fine, pressing and inportuning him so hard with earnest praier and entreaty, that in the end Cato seeing how urgent and unreasonable he was, and not able to endure him any longer, was forced to say thus unto him: You would thinke it a foule differace and fhame for you Catulus, Cenfour as you are, fine you will not receive an answere and be gone, if my serjeants and officers here should take youb the head and shoulders, and send you away: with that, Catulus being abashed and ashamed departed in great anger and discontentment. But confider rather and see, whether the answer of Agesilans and that which Themissoeles made, were not more modest, and savoured of greater humanity : for Age filaus, when his own father willed him to give fentence in a certain cause that was brought before him, against all right, and directly contrary to the lawes: Father (quothic) your selfe have taught me from my very child-hood to obey the lawes; I will be therfore obed ent still to your good precepts, and passe no judgement against law. As for Themistocles, when as Sunonides feemed to request of him fornewhat which was unjust and unlawfull: Neither were you Simonides (quoth he) a good Poer, if you should not keepe time and number in your long, nor I a good Magistrate, if I should judge against the law. And yet (as Plate was woont to fav) it is not for want of due proportion betweene the necke and body of the lute, that one citie is atvariance with another citie, and friends fall out and be at difference, doing what mischiese they can one to another, and fuffering the like againe; but for this rather, that they offend and faile in that which concerneth law and justice. Howbeit, you shall have some, who themselves observing the precise rules most exactly according to art in Musicke, in Grammaticall orthoof graphie, and in the Poeticall quantitie of fyllables and measures of feet, can be in hand with others, and request them to neglect and forget that which they ought to do in the administration of government, in paffing of judgements, and in their other actions. And therefore with fuch as thefebe, I would have you take this course which I will now tell you: Is there an Advocate or Rhetorician that doth importune you fitting as judge upon the bench? or is there an Oratour thattroubleth you with an unreasonable sute as you sit in counsell? grant them both, that which they request, upon condition that the one in the entrie of his plea will commit a solectime or incongruity, and the other in the beginning of his narration come out with some barbarisme: butitis all to nothing, that they will never do fo, it would be thought fuch a shame; and in very trueth, we fee that fome of them are fo fine eared, that they can not abide in a speech or sentence o that two vowels should come together: againe, Is he one of the nobilitie, or a man of honour and authoritie, that troubleth you with fome unhonest fute? will him likewise for your sake to paffethorow the market place hopping and dancing, making mowes, and writhing his mouth; but if he denie so to doe, then have you good occasion and fit opportunity to come upon him with this revie, and demand of him; whether of the twaine be more dishonest? to make incongruity in speech, and to make mowes, and set the mouth awry; or to breake the lawes, commit perjurie, and beside all right, equitie and conscience, to award and adjudge more unto the leawd and wicked than to good and honest persons. Moreover, like as Nicostratus the Argive answeredunto Archidamus, who follicited him with a good fumme of money (promiting him befides in marriage what Lady he would himselfe chuse in all Lacedamon) to betray and render up by to treason the towne Cromnum: I see well (quoth he) ô Archidamus, that you are not descended from the race of Hercules, for that he travelled thorow the world, killing wicked persons whom he had vanquished, but your study is to make them wicked who are good and honest; even so we ought to fay unto him, who would bee thought a man of woorth and good marke, and yet commeth to presse and force us to committhose deeds which are not besitting, that he doth that which beforemeth not his nobility or opinion of vertue,

Now if they be meane and bale persons to account, who shall thus tempt you, go this way to worke with fuch: If he be a covetous mifer, and one that loveth his money too well, fee and trie whether you can induce and perfwade him by all importunity to credit you with a talent of filverupon your bare word, without schedule, obligation or specialtie for his security; or if he be 40 an ambitious and vaine-glorious person; trie if you can prevaile with him so much, as to give youthe upper hand or higher feat in publike place; or if he be one that defireth to beare rule and office; affay him, whether he will give over his possibilitie that he hath to such a magistracie, especially when he is in the ready way to obtaine it? Certes, we may well thinke it a very strange and abfurd thing, that fuch as they in their vices and paffions should stand and continue so stiffe, forefolute and fo hard to be removed; and we who professe and would be reputed honest men, lovers of vertue, justice and equity, can not be masters of our selves, but suffer vertue to be subverted, and cast it at our heeles. For if they who by their importunity urge our modestie, doe it cither for their owne reputation or their authoritie, it were abfurd and befide the purpose, for us to augment the honour, credit and authority of another, and to difhonour, difcredit and difgrace 50 our felves; like unto those, who be in an ill name, and incurre the obloquie of the world, who either in publike and folemne games defraude those of the prizes and rewardes who have achieved victory, or who at the election of magistrates, deprive those of their right of suffrages and voices to whom it doth belong, for to gratifie others that deferve it not, thereby to procure to the one fort, the honour of fitting in high places, and to the other the glory of wearing coronets, and so by doing pleasure unto others, falsifie their owne faith, defame themselves, and lose the opinion and reputation they had of honestie and good conscience. Now if we see that it is for his ownelucre and gaine, that any one urge us beyond all reason to do a thing; how is it that we doe not prefently confider, that it is abfurd and without all fense to hazzard and put to comprimise (as it were) our owne reputation and vertue for another man, to the end that the put so from one (I know not who) should thereby be more weightie and heavie?

But certainly many therebe unto whom fuch confiderations as these are presented, and who are not ignorant that they tread aside and do amisse; much like to them, who being chalenged to drinke off great bolles full of wine, take paines to pledg them with much ado, even so long till their eies be ready to start out of their heads, changing their countenance, and panting for want of winde, and all to pleasure those that put them to it. But surely this feeblenes of minde and faint heart of theirs, refembleth the weake constitution and temperature of the bodie, which cannot away either with foorching heat or chilling cold. For be they praifed by those who set, upon them thus impudently, they are ready to leape out of their skins for joy; and fay they doubt for to be accused, checked, rebuked or suspected, if haply they deny, then they are ready to die for woe and feare. But we ought to be well defended & fortified against the one & the other, that we yeeld neither to them that terrifie us, nor to those that flatter us. Thueydides verily suppofing it impossible for one to be great or in high place & not envied, saith, That the mais well advised & led by good cousel who shooteth at the greatest & highest affaires, if he must be subject unto envie. For mine owne part, thinking as I do, that it is no hard matter to escape envie, but to avoid al complaints & to keepe our felves from being molefted by fome one or other than converse with us & keepe our company, a thing impossible: I suppose it good counsel for us,& the best thing we can do for our owne safetie, to incurre rather the ill will and displeasure of 10 leand, importunate, and unreasonable people, than of those who have just cause to blame and accuse us, if against all right and justice we satisfie their minds and be ready to do them service and pleafure: as for the praises and commendations which proceed from such leawd & shameleffe persons, being as they are in every respect counterfeit and sophisticall, we ought to beware and take heed of; neither must we suffer our selves as swine to be rubbed, scratched, or tickled, and all the whiles stand still and gently, letting them do with us what they will, untill they may with ease lay us all along, when we have once yeelded to be so handled at their pleasure : for furely they that give care to flatterers, differ in no respect from those who set out their legs of purpose to be supplanted and to have their heeles tripped up from under them; save onely in this, that those are woorse foiled and catch the more shamefull fall, I meane aswell such as remit punishment to naughtie persons, because for sooth they love to be called mercitull, milde and gentle; as those on the contrary side, who being perswaded by such as praise them, do submit the felves to enmittee and accufations needleffe, but yet perilous; as being borne in hand & made believe they were the onely men, & fuch alone as flood invincible against all flatterie, yea and those whom they sticke not to tearme their very mouthes & voices; and therefore Bion likened them most aptly to vessels that had two eares, for that they might be caried so easily by the eares which way a man would: like as it is reported of one Alexinua Sophister, who upon a time as he walked with others in the galleric Peripatos, spake all that naught was of Stilpo the Megarean: &when one of the company faid unto him, What meane you by this, confidering that of late & no longer fince than the other day, he gave out of you al the good that may be: I wot wel (quoth he) for hee is a right honest gentleman, and the most courteous person in the worlde. Contrariwife Menedemus when he heard that Alexinus had praifed him many a time; But I (quoth he) do never speake well of Alexinus; & therfore a bad man he must needs be, that either praifeth a naughty person, or is dispraised of an honest man: So hard it was to turn or catch him by any fuch meanes, as making use, and practifing that precept which Hercules Atisthenem taught his children, when hee admonished and warned them that they should never con those thanke who praised them: and this was nothing else, but not to suffer a mans selfe to be overcome by foolish modestie, nor to flatter them againe who praised him. For this may suffice in mine opinion which Pindarus answered upon a time to one who said unto him: That in everie place and to all men he never ceased to commend him: Grand mercie (quoth he) and I will do so this favor unto you againe that you may be a true man of your word, & be thought to have spoken nothing but the truth.

To conclude, that which is good and expedient against all other affections and passions, they ought surely to remember who are easily overcome by this hurtfull modestie, whensoever they giving place soone to the violence of this passion, doe commit a fault and tread anny against their minde: namely to call to remembrance the markes and prints of remorfe and repentance sticking fast in their minde, and to repent estioness and keepe the same a long time.

For like as waifaring men, after they have once stumbled upon a stone; or pilots at sea when they have once split their ship upon a rocke and suffred shipwracke, if they call those accidents to remembrance, for ever after doe seare and take heed not onely of the same, but of such like; even so they that set before their cies continually the dishonours and damages which they have received by this hursfull and excessive modestie, and represent the same to their minde once wounded and bitten with remorse and repentance, will in the like afterwards reclaime themselves, and not so easily another time be perverted and seduced out of the right way.

OF BROTHERLY LOVE OR AMITIE.

The Summarie.

Man should have prosited but badly in the schoole of versue, if endevouring to carry in the simplest bounests toward his friends and samiliars, yea and his verie enemies, he continue still in evil demeanor with his owne breibren, unto whom he is opined naturally, by the streightest line and linke that can be devised. But for that ever since the heginning of the world, thu proverbiall sentence from time to time hush becone currant and found true; that the Unitie of Brethren is a rarething: Plucarch after he had complained in the verseentrance of this little booke, that (uch a maladie as this, raigned mightily in his time, goeth about afterwards to apply a remedie thereto. And to this effect he shewesh, that since brotherly amitie is 30 taught and preferibed by nature, those who love not their brethren, be block!sh, unnaturall, enemies to their owne selves; yea, and the greatest Atheists that may be found. And albeit the obligation wherein we are bound to our parents, amounteth to so high a summe as we are never able fully so discharge; he prooves h not with standing, that brotherly love may stand for one verie good paiment toward that debt : whereupon he concludeth, that hatred betweene brethren ought to be banified; for that if it once creepe in and get betweene, it will be a verie hard matter to rejoine and reconcile them againe. Afterwards hetescheth a readie and compendious way, how a man ought to manage and use a brother ill disposed. In what manner brethren should carrie themselves one to another, both during the life of their father and also after his decease; discoursing at large upon the dutie of those who are the elder or higher advanced in other respects; as also what they should doe, who are the younger; 40 namely, that as they are not equall to their other brethren in yeeres, so they be their inferiours in place of honor and in wealth; likewife what meanes as well the one as the other are to follow, for to avoidenvie and jealousse. Which done, he teacheth brethren who in age come verie necre, their natuvalldurie and kindnesse that they ought to shew one unto another; to which purpose he produceth proper examples of brotherly amuse among the Pagans: In the ende, since he can not possibly effect thus much, that brethren should evermore accordivell together, he setteth downe what course they are to take in their differences and disagreements; and how their friends oughs to be common between them; and for a final conclusion, he treatesh of that hongest are and respective regardone of another that they oughs to have, and especially of their kinseff folke, which he emishes the wish two other notable examples.

Hose ancient statues representing the two brethren Castor and Pollux, the inhabitants of the citic Sparta, were woont in their language to call disease. And two paralell pieces of timber they are of an equall distance asunder, united and joined together by two other 10 pieces overthwart: now it should seeme, that this was a device sitting verie well and agreeable to the brotherly amitie of the faid two gods, for to thew that undivisible union which was betweene them; and even fo, I also do offer and dedicate unto you, ô Nigrinus and Quintus, this little treatife as touching the amitie of brethren, a gift common unto you both as those who are woorthie of the same;

for seeing, that of your owne accord you practise that alreadie, which it reacheth and exhorteth unto, you shall be thought not so much to be admonished thereby, as by your exampleso confirme and testifie the same which therein is delivered; and the joy which you shall conceive to fee that approoved and commended which your felves do, shall give unto your judgementa; farther afflirance to continue therein; as if your actions were allowed and praifed by vertuous and honest beholders of the fame.

Aristarchus verily, the father of Theodettes, scoffing at the great number of those Sophisters or counterfeit sages in his daies, said: That in old time hardly could be found seven wife men throughout the world; but in our daies (quoth he) much adoo there is to finde so many fooles or ignorant persons. But I may verie well and truely saie: That I see in this age wherein we live, the amitie of brethren to be assare, as their hatted was in times past. The examples whereof being so few as they were among our auncients, were thought by men in those daiss living, notable arguments to furnish Tragedies and Theaters with, as matters verie strange and in a manner fabulous. But contrariwife, all they that live in this age if haply they meete with to two brethren, that be good and kind one to another, woonder and marvell thereat as much asif they faw those Molionides (of whom Homer speaketh) whose bodies seemed to grow together in one: and as incredible and miraculous doe they thinke it, that brethren should use in commonthe patrimonie, goods, friends and flaves which their fathers left behind unto them, asif one and the same soule alone ruled the feet, hands and cies of two bodies. And yet nature has felfe hath fet downe a lively example of that mutuall behaviour and carriage that ought to be among brethren, and the fame not farre off, but even within our owne bodies, wherein shehab framed and devised for the most part those members double, and as a man would say, brethren like and twinnes, which be necessarie, to wit, two hands, two feet, two cies, two eares, and two nose thrils; showing thereby, that she hath thus distinguished them all, not onely for their naturall health and lafetie, but also for a mutuall and reciprocall helpe, and not for to quarrell and fight one with another. As for the hands when the parted them into many fingers, and those of unequal length and bignesse, the hath made them of all other organicall parts, the mol proper artificious and workemanlike instruments; insomuch as that ancient Philosopher A maxagaras afcribed the verie cause of mans wisedome and understanding unto the hands Howbeit, the contrarie unto this should seeme rather to be true; for man was not the wisestof all other living creatures in regard of his hands, but because by nature being eudued with reafon, given to be wittle and capable of arts and sciences, he was likewise naturally furnished with fuch instruments as these. Moreover, this is well knowen unto everie man, that nature hath so med of one and the same seed, as of one principle of life, two, three, and more brethren; not to the end that they should be at debate and variance, but that being apart and asunder, they might the better and more commodioufly helpe one another. For those men with three bodies and hundred armes apiece, which the Poëts describe unto us (if ever there were any such) being join ned and growen together in all their parts, were not able to doe any thing at all when they were parted afunder, or as it were, without themselves: which brethren can doe well enough, namely dwell and keepe within house and go abroad together, meddle in affaires of State, exercise hul bandrie and tillage one with another, in case they preserve and keepe well that principle of amily and benevolence which nature hath given them. For otherwife they should (I suppose) nothing differ from those feet which are readie to trip or supplant one another, and cause them to catch afall: or they should refemble those hands and fingers which enfolded and classe one another untowardly against the course of nature. But rather according as in one and the same bodie, the cold, the hot, the drie, and the moist, participating likewise in one and the same nature and nourishment, if they doe accord and agree well together, engender an excellent temperature and most pleasant harmonic, to wit, the health of the bodie, without which, neither all the wealth of the world, as men fay, have any pleasure, grace or profit but in case these principall elements of our life, covet to have more than their just proportion, and thereupon breake out into a kind of civill fedition, feeking one to furcrease and over-grow another, soone there ensueth a filthie corruption and confusion which overthroweth the state of the bodie and the creature it selfe; semblably, by the concord of brethren, the whole race and house is in good case and flouritheth, the friends and familiars belonging to them (like a melodious quire of muscicians) make a sweet consent and harmonie: for neither they doe, nor fay nor thinke any thing that jarreth or is contrarie one to the

to wit, some ill-tongued variet and pickthanke carrie-tale within the house, or some flattering claw-backe comming betweene, and entring into the house, or else some envious and malicious neighbour in the citie. For like as diseases do ingender in those bodies which neither receive nor fland well affected to their proper & familiar nourishment, many appetites of strange and hurtfull meates; even fo, a flanderous calumniation of jealoufie being gotten once among those of a blood & kindred, doth draw and bring withal evill words and naughtie speechs, which from without are alwaies readic enough to runne thither where as a breach lieth open, and where there is fome fault alreadie. That divine master and soothsaier of Arcadie, of whom Herodotus writeth, when he had loft one of his owne naturall feet, was forced upon necessitie to 30 make himselfe another of wood: but a brother being sallen out and at warre with a brother, and constrained to get some stranger to be his companion, either out of the market place and common hall of the citie as he walketh there, or from the publike place of exercise, where he useth to behold the wrestlers and others; in my conceit doth nothing else but willingly cut-off a part or limme of his owne bodie made of fleih, and engraffed fast unto him, for to fer another in the place which is of another kinde and altogether a stranger. For even necessarie it selfe which dothentertaine, approove and seeke for friendship and mutuall acquaintance, teacheth us to honor, cheariff and preferve that which is of the fame nature and kind; for that without friends focietie and fellowship we are notable to live solitarie and alone as most savage beasts, neither will our nature endure it: and therefore in Menander he faith very well and wifely:

By jolly cheere and bankets day by day, Thinke we to finde (ôfather) trustie friends, To whom our felves and life commit we may? No special thing for cost to make amends; I found he hath, who by that meanes hath met With (hade of friends; for fuch I count no bet.

For to fay a truth, most of our friendships be but shadowes, semblances and images of that first amitie, which nature hath imprinted and engraffed in children toward their parents, in brethren toward their brethren: and he who doth not reverence nor honor it, how can he perfwade and make strangers beleeve that he beareth found and faithfull good will unto strangers. Or what 50 man is he who in his familiar greetings and falutations, or in his letters, will call his friend and companion Brother, and can not find in his heart fo much as to go with his brother in the fame way? For as it were a point of great folly and madnesse, to adorne the statue of a brother, and in the meane time to beat and maime his bodie; even so, to reverence and honor the name of a brother in others, and withall to shun, hate and disdaine a brother indeed, were the case of one that were out of his wits, and who never conceived in his heart and minde, that Nature is the most facred and holy thing in the world. And heere in this place, I can not choose but call to minde, how at Rome upon a time I tooke upon me to bee umpier betweene two brethren, of whom the one feemed to make profession of Philosophie; but he was (as after it appeared) not onely untruely entituled by the name of a Brother; but also as falsely called a Philosopher: for when I requested of him that he should carrie himselfe as a Philosopher toward his brother, and fuch abrother as altogether was unlettered and ignorant: In that you say (ignorant quoth he) I hold well with you, and I avow it a tructh; but as for Brother, I take it for no fuch great and ve. nerable matter, to have forung from the fame loines, or to have come foorth of one wombe. Well (faid I againe) It appeares that you make no great account to iffue out of the fame natu. ral members; but all men else besides you, if they doe not thinke and imagine so in their hearts; yet I am fure they doe both fing and fay that Nature first, and then Law (which doth preserve and maintaine Nature) have given the chiefe place of reverence and honor next after the gods, 10 unto father and mother; neither can men performe any service more acceptable unto the gods. than to pay willingly, readily and affectionately unto parents who begat and brought them foorth, unto nourses and fosters that reared them up, the interest and usurie for the old thankes, befides the new which are due unto them. And on the other fide again, there is not a more certaine figne & marke of a verie Atheift; than either to neglect parents, or to be any waies ungracious or defective in duty unto them: and therfore wheras we are forbidden in expresse termes by the law, to doe wrong or hurt unto other men: if one doe not behave himfelfe to father and mother both in word and deed, so as they may have (I do not say no discontenument and displeafurebut) joy and comfort thereby, men esteeme him to be profane, godlesse and irreligious. Tell me now, what action, what grace, what disposition of children towards their parents, can be to more agreeable and yeeld them greater contentment, than to fee good will, kinde affection, fast and affored love betweene brethren? the which a man may easily gather by the contrarie in other smaller matters. For seeing that fathers and mothers be displeased otherwhiles with their fonnes, if they misuse or hardly intreat some home-borne slave whom they set much store by : if I fay, they be vexed and angrie, when they fee them to make no reckoning & care of their woods and grounds wherein they tooke some joy and delight; considering also that the good kind-harted old folke of a gentle and loving affection that they have, be offended if fome hound or dog bred up within house, or an horse be not well tended and looked unto; last of all, if they grieve when they perceive their children to mocke, find fault with, or despise the lectures, narrations, sports, sights, wrestlers, and others that exercise feats of activitie, which themselves some 3 time highly effected: Is there any likelihood that they in any measure can indure to see their children hate one another? to entertaine braules and quarrels continually? to be ever fnatling, railing and reviling one another? and in all enterprifes and actions alwaies croffing, thwarting and supplanting one another? I suppose there is no man will so fay. Then on the contrarie side, if bretheen love together and be ready one to do for another; if they draw in one line and carrie the like affection with them; follow the fame studies and take the same courses; and how much nature hath divided and separated them in bodie, so much to joine for it agains in minde; lending one another their helping hands in all their negotiations and affaires; following the same exercifes; repairing to the fame diffutations; and frequenting the fame plaies, games and paflimes, fo as they agree and communicate in all things: certainely this great love and amitie 40 among brethren, must needs yeeld sweet joy and happie comfort to their father and mother in their old age: and therefore parents take nothing fo much pleasure, when their children proove eloquent orators, wealthy men, or advanced to promotions and high places of dignities; as loving and kind one to another; like as a man shall never see a father so desirous of eloquence, of riches, or of honor, as he is loving to his owne children. It is reported of Queene Apollonisthe Cyzicen, mother to King Eumenes, and to three other Princes, to wit, Atalus, Philetarus and Athenaus, that shee reputed and reported her selfe to bee right happy, and rendered thankes unto the immortall gods, not for her riches, nor roiall port and majeftie; but that it was her good fortune to fee those three younger sonnes of hers, serving as Pensioners and Esquiers of the bodic to Eumenes their elder brother, and himselfe living scarlesse and in as securitie in 50 the mids of them, flanding about his person with their pollaxes, halbards, and partisanes in their hands, and girded with fwords by their fides. On the other fide, King Xerxes perceiving, that his fonne Ochus fet an ambush and laid traines to murder his brethren, died for veriesorrow and anguith of heart. Terrible and grievous are the warres, faid Europides, betweene brethren; but unto their parents above all others most grievous; for that whosoever hateth his owne brother, and may not youchfafe him a good eie and kinde looke, can not choofe but in his heart blame the father that begat him, and the mother that bare him. We read that Piffratus martied his fecond wife, when his formes whom he had by the former were now men growen, faying: That fince he faw them proove fo good and towardly, he gladly would be the father of many more that might grow up like them; even fo, good and loyall children will not onely affect and hove one another for their parents fakes, but also love their parents fo much the more, in regard of their mutuall kindneffe, as making this account, thinking also and faying thus to themselves. That they are obliged and bounden unto them in many respects, but principally for their brethren, as being the most precious heritage, the sweetest and most pleasant possession hatthey inheritby them. And therefore Homer did verie well, when he brought in Telemachus among other calamities of his, reckoning this for one, that he had no brother at all; and saying to thus:

For Jupiter my fathers race in me alone, Now ended hath, and given me brother none.

As for Hessaus he did not well to with & give advice to have an only begotten sonne, to be the full heire and universall inheritour of a patrimonie; even that Hessaus who was the disciple of those Muses, whom men have named wives, as it were with the full who was the disciple of those Muses, whom men have named wives, as it were with the surface of the their mutual affection and fister-like love they keepe alwaies together. Certes, the amitie of brethern is so respective to parents, that it is both a certaine demonstration that they love father and mother, & also such an example & lesson a certaine demonstration that they love father and mother, we also such an example & lesson at less there is none other like unto it, but contrativitie, they take an ill president to hate their owne brethren from the first orion ginall of their father; for he that liveth continually & waxeth old in suits of law, in quarrels and dissensions with his owne brethren, and afterward shall seeme to preach unto his children for to live friendly & lovingly together, doth as much as he, who according to the common proverbe.

The fores of others will feeme to heale and cure and u himfelfe of ulcers full impure.

and fo by his owne deeds doth weaken the efficacie of his words. If then Eteocles the Thebane, when he had once faid unto his brother Polynices, in Euripides,

To starres about sunne rising would Imount, And under earth descend as sarre againe, By these attempts, if I might make account This sovereigne roid tie of gods to gaine.

should come afterwards againe unto his sonnes, and admonish them who would not mocke him and despite his admonition? And what kinde of man would Atreme have bene reputed, if after he had set such a supper as he did before his brother, he should in this 40 mauer have spoken sentences and given instruction to his owne children?

When great milhap and crosse calamitie
Upon a man is fallen suddenly,
The onely meed is sound by amitie
Of those whom blood hath joined perfectly.

Banish therefore we must, and rid away cleane, all hatted from among brethren, as a thing which is a bad nurce to parents in their olde age, and a woorse fostresse to children in their youth; besides, it giveth occasion of slander, calumniation and obloquie among their sellow-citizens and neighbours; for thus do men conceive and deeme of it: That brethren having bene nourished and brought up together so familiarly from their very cradle, it can not be that they should fall 50 out and grow to such termes of ennity and hostility, unlesse they were privie one to another of some wicked plots and most missine works practises. For great causes they must bee, that are able to undoe great friendship and amitie, by meanes whereof hardly or unneth afterwards they can bee reconciled and surely knit againe. For like as stundry pieces which have beene once artificially joined together by the meanes of glue or soder; if the joint bee loose or open, may bee rejoined or sodered againe; but if an entire body that naturally is united and growen in one, chaunce to bee broken or cut and slit assunder, it will be an hard piece of worke to finde any glew or soder so strong as to reunite the same and make it whole and found, even so those mutuall amities which either for profit or upon some neede were still knit betweene men, happen to cleave and part in twaine, it is an easie matter to reduce them close together; but brethren if they become alienated and estranged, so as that the natural bond of love can not hold them together, hardly will they peece againe or agree everafter: and fay they be made friends and brought to attonement, certeinly fuch reconciliation maketh in the former rent or breach an ill-favoured and filthy skar, as being alwaies full of jealousie, distrust, and suspicion. True it is that all jars and enmitties betweene man and man, entring into the heart, to gether with those passions which be most troublesome and dangerous of all others. to wit, a pecylifh humor of contention, choler, envie, and remembrance of injuries done and past, do breed griese, paine, and vexation; but surely that which is fallen betweene brother and to brother, who of necessitie are to communicate together in all facrifices and religious ceremo. nies belonging to their fathers house, who are to be interred another day in one and the same fepylchre, and live in the meane time otherwhiles under one roofe, and dwel in the same house, and enjoy possessions, lands, and tenements confining one upon another, doth continually prefent unto the eie that which tormenteth the heart, it putteth them in minde daily and howerly of their follie and madnesse; for by meanes thereof that face and countenance which should bee most sweete, best knowne, and of all other likest, is become most strange hideous, and un. pleafant to the cie; that voice which was woont to be even from the cradle friendly and familiat, is now become most fearefull & terrible to the eare; and whereas they fee many other brethren cohabit together in one house, fit at one table to take their repast, occupie the same lands, and it use the fame servants, without dividing them; what a griefe is it, that they thus fallen out, should part their friends, their hoafts and guests, and in one word, make all things that be commonamong other brethren, private, and whatfoever should be familiar & acceptable, to become contrarie & odious? Over and befides, here is another inconvenience and mischiese, which thereis no man so simple, but he must needs conceive and understand: That ordinary friends and table companions may be gotten and stollen (as it were) from others; alliance and acquaintance there may be had new, if the former be loft, even as armour, weapons and tooles may be repaired, if they be worne, or new made, if the first be gon; but to recover a brother that is lost, it is not posfible, no more than to make a new hand, if one be cut away, or to fet in another eie in the place of that which is plucked out of the head: and therefore well faid that Persian ladie, when sheen chofe rather to fave the life of her brethren than of her children: For children (quoth thee) I may have more, but fince my father and mother be both dead, brother thall I never have.

But what is to be done, will fome man fay, in case one be matched with a bad brother? First, this we ought evermore to remember, that in all forts of amities there is to be found some badneffe; and most true is that saying of Sophocles;

Who lift to fear cht broughout mankinde, More badthan good is fure to finde.

No kinred there is, no focietie, no fellowship, no amitie and love, that can be found fincere, found, pure and cleare from all faults. The Lacedæmonian who had married a wife of little stature: We must (quoth he) of evils chuse ever the least; even so in mine advice, a man may ve & ry well and wifely give counfell unto brethren, to beare rather with the most domesticall imperfections and the infirmities of their owne blood, than to trie those of strangers; for as the one is blameleffe, because it is necessarie, so the other is blame-worthy, for that it is voluntarie: for neither table friend and fellow gamefter, nor play-fere of the fame age, ne yet hoaft or gueft

Is bound wish links (of braffe by hand not wrought) Which shame by kinde bath forg'd, and cost su nought, but rather that friend, who is of the same blood, who had his nourishment and bringing up with us, begotten of one father, and who lay in the fame mothers wombe; unto whom it feemeth that * Vertue herselfe doth allow connivencie and pardon of some faults, so as a man may say unto a brother when he doth a fault,

Witleffe, farke naught, yea wretched though thou be,

Yet can Inos for fake and cast off thee. lest that (ere I be well aware) I might seeme in my hatred towards thee, for to punish sharpely, cruelly, and unnaturally in thy person, some infirmitie or vice of mine owner father or mother instilled into theeby their feed. As for strangers and such as are not of our bloud, we ought not to love first, and afterwards make triall and judgement of them; but first we must trie and then trust and love them afterwards; whereas contrariwise, nature hath not given unto proofeand experience experience the precedence and prerogative to go before love, neither doth the expect according to that comon proverbe; That a man should eate a * bushell or two of falt with one whom * Medinona heminded to love and make his friend; but even from our nativitie hath bred in us and with us conteining the very principle and cause of amitie, in which regard we ought not to be bitter unto such, nor 6.mod/y, which to fearch too neerely into their faults and infirmities.

But what will you say now if contrariwise some there be, who if meere aliens and strangers otherwise, yet if they take a foolish love and liking unto them, either at the taverne or at some game and pastime, or fall acquainted with them at the wrestling or fensing schoole, can be content to winke at their faults, be ready to excuse and justifie them, yea and take delight and pleafure therein; but if their brethren do amisse, they be exceeding rigorous unto them and inexorable; nay, you shall have many such, who can abide to love churlish dogs, & skittish horses, yea and finde in their hearts to feed and make much of fell ounces, shrewd cats, curst unhappie apes, and terrible lions; but they cannot endure the hastie and cholericke humor, the error and ignorance, or fome little ambitious humor of a brother. Others againe there be, who unto their concubines and harlots will not sticke to affigne over and passe away goodly houses and faire landslying thereto; but with their brethren they will wrangle and go to law, nay they will be ready to enter the lifts and combat for a plot of ground whereupon a house standeth, about fome corner of a meffuage or end of a little tenement, and afterwards attributing unto this their hatred of brethren, the colourable name of hating finne and wickednesse, they go up & downe 20 curling, detelting and reproching them for their vices, whiles in others they are never offended nor discontented therewith, but are willing enough daily to frequent and haunt their company. Thus much in generall tearmes by way of preamble or proxime of this whole treatife.

It remaineth now that I should enter into the doctrine and instructions thereto belonging: wherein I will not begin as other have done at the partition of their heritage or patrimonie; but at the naughtie emulation, hart-burning and jealousse which ariseth betweene them during the life of their parents. Agefilans king of Lacedamon was wont alwaies to fend as a present unto each one of the auncients of the citie, ever as they were created Senatours, a good oxe, in testimony that he honored their vertue: at length the lords called Ephori, who were the censurers & overfeers of each mans behavior, codemned him for this in a fine to be paid unto the State, sub-20 feribing and adding a season withall; for that by these gifts and largesses he went about to steale away their hearts and favors to himselse alone, which ought indifferently to regard the whole body of the city; even so a man may do well to give this counsell unto a sonne, in such wife to respect & honour his father and mother, that hee seeke not thereby to gaine their whole love, nor seeme to turne away their favour and affection from other children wholy unto himselfe; by which practife many doe prevent, undermine and supplant their brethren, and thus under a colourable and honest pretense in shew, but in deed unjust and unequall, cloke and cover their avarice and covetous defire; for after a cautelous and fubtill maner they infinuate themselves and get betweene them and home, and so defraud and cousen them ungentlemanly of their parents love, which is the greatest and fairest portion of their inheritance, who espying their time, 40 and taking the opportunitie and vantage when their brethren be otherwise employed, and least doubt of their practifes, then they bestir them most, and shew themselves in best order, obsequious, double-diligent, fober and modest, and namely in such things as their other brethren doeither faile or seeme to be slacke and forgetfull. But brethren ought to do cleane contrarie, for if they perceive their father to be angrie and displeased with one of them, they should interposethemselves and undergo some part of the heavie load, they ought to ease their brother, and by bearing a part, helpe to make the burden lighter: then (I fay) must they by their service and ministerie gratifie their brother so much, as to bring him in some fort in grace and favour againe with their father, and when he hath failed fo far foorth in neglecting the opportunity of time, or omitting some other businesse which hardly will afoord excuse, they are to lay the fault 50 and blame upon his very nature and disposition, as being more meete and sitted for other matters. And heereto accordeth well that speech of Agamemnon in Homer,

He faulted not through idleneffe, nor yet for want of wit, But lookt on me, and did expect my motive unto it.

even so one good brother may excuse another and say; He thought I should have done it, and left this duetie for me to doe: neither are fathers themselves strait laced, but willingly enough to admit fuch translations and gentle inversions of names as these; they can be content to beleeve their children, when they terme the fupine negligence of their brethren plaine simplicitie, their stupiditie and blockishnesse, upright dealing and a good conscience; their quarrellous and litigious nature, a minde loth to be troden under-foot and utterly despised. In this maner he that will proceed with an intent only to appeale his fathers wrath, shal gaine thus much moreover; That not only his fathers choler will therby be much diminished toward his brother, but his love also much more encreased unto himselfe: howbeit, afterwards when he hath thus made all well, and fatisfied his father to his good contentment, then must be turne and addresse himselfe to his brother apart, touch him to the quicke, spare him never a whit, but with all libertic of Janguage tell him roundly of his fault, and rebuke him for his trespasse; for furely it is not good to afe indulgencie and connivencie to a brother, no more than to infult over him too much. and tread him under foote if hee have done amisse, (for as this bewraieth a joy that one taketh at his fall; fo that implieth a guiltineffe with him in the fame transgression: but in this rebuke and reproofe, such measure would be kept, that it may testifie a care to do him good, and yeta difeleafure for his fault; for commonly he that hath beene a most earnest advocate and affects. onate interceffor for him to his father and mother, will be his sharpest accuser afterwards when he hath beene alone by himselfe. But put the case, that abrother having not at all offended, be blamed notwithstanding and accused to father and mother, howsoever in other things, it is the part of humanitie and dutifull kindnesse to susteine and beare all anger and froward displeasure of parents; yet in this case, the allegations and desenses of one brother in the justification of an other, when he is innocent, unjuftly traduced, and hardly used or wronged by his parents, are not to be blamed, but allowable and grounded upon honeftie: neither need abrother feare to heate thatreproch in Sophacles:

Thou graceleffe imp fo farre growen out of kinde,
As with thy sire, a counter plea to finde.

when frankly & freely he speaketh in the behalfe of his brother, seeming to be unjustly condemned and oppressed. For furely by this manner of processed and pleading, they that are convicted take more joy in being overthrowen, than if they had gained the victorie and better hand,

Now after that a father is deceased, it is well beforming and fit, that brethren should more affectionally love than before, and sticke more close together: for then presently their naturall golove into their sather which is common to them all, ought to appeare indifferently in mouning together and lamenting for his death; then are they to reject and cast behinde them all inspirions surmized or buzzed into their heads by variets & fervants, all flanderous calumniations and false reports; brought unto them by pick-thankes and carrie-tales on both sides, who would gladly sow some diffension between them; then are they to give eare unto that which sables doe report of the reciprocall love of Castor and Pollux; and namely, how it is said, That Pollux killed one with his sist for rounding him in the care, and whispering a tale against his brother Castor. Afterwards, when they shall come to the parting of their patrimonic and fathers goods among them, they ought not (as it were) to give defiance and denomine warre one against another, as many there be who come prepared for that purpose readieto encounter, as single this note,

O Alal Alala, now hearken and come fight, Who are of warre so fell the daughter right.

But that verie day of all others they ought to regard and observe most, as being the time which to them is the beginning either of mortall warre and enmitte irreconcileable, or else of perfect friendship and amitte perdurable: at which instant they ought among themselves alone, we divide their portions if it be possible; if not, then to do it in the presence of one indifferent and common friend between ethem, who may be a witnest otheir whole order and proceeding; and fo when after a loving and kinde maner, and as becomment honest and well disposed persons, they have by casting lots gotten ech one that which is his right; by which course (as Platesias) they ought to thinke that there is given and received that which is meet and agreeable for every one, and to to hold themselves therwith contented; this done, I say they are to make account that the ordering, mannaging, and administration onely of the goods and heritage is parted and divided; but the enjoying, tile and possession of all remaineth yet; whole in common between them. But those that in this partition and distribution of goods, plucke one from another the nourses that gave thems likes, or such youths as were softered and brought up together with them of inflanks; and with whom alwaies they had lived and loved familiarly; well may they pre-vaile fo farre forth with eager purfuing their wilfulnesse, as to go away with the gaine of a slave, perhaps of greater price: but in slead thereof, they lose the greatest and most pretions things in all their patrimonie and inheritance, and utterly betray the love of a brother, and the considence that otherwise they might have had in him. Some also we have knowen, who upon a peevish wilfulnesse onely, and a quartellous humour, and without any gaine at all, have in the partition of their fathers goods, carried themselves no better nor with greater modessite and respect, than sit had bene some bootic or pillage gotten in war. Such were Charless and Antischus, of the citic Opas, two brethren, who ever as they met with a piece of silver plate, made no more ado butcut it quite thorough the mids, and if there came a garment into their hands, in two pieces it went, slit (as necre as they could aime) just in the middle, and so they went either of them away with his part, dividing (as it were) upon some tragicall curse and executation.

Their house and all the goods therein By cage of sword so sharpe and keen.

Others there be who make their boast and report with joy unto others, how in the partition of their patrimonic they have by cunning cafts, connic-catched their brethren, and over-wrought them foby their cautelous circumvention, fine wit and flie policies, as that they have gone away with the better part by ods: whereas indeed they should rejoice rather and please themselves, if in modeflie, courtefie, kindneffe, and yeelding of their owne right they had furpaffed and gone beyond their brethren. In which regard Athenedorus deserveth to be remembred in this place; 20 and indeed there is not one here in these parts but remembreth him well enough. This Athenodorus had one brother elder than himfelfe, named Zenon, who having taken upon him the management of the patrimonie, left unto them both by their father, had imbezeld and made away a good part of it; and in the end, for that by force he had carried away a woman and married her, was condemned for a rape, and loft all his owne and his brothers goods, which by order of law was forfait and conficate to the Exchequer of the Emperor: now was Athenedorus abovefaid, a verie beardleffe-boy ftill, without any haire on his face; and when by equitie and the court of conscience, his portion out of his fathers goods was awarded and restored unto him, he for fooke not his brother, but brought all abroad and parted the one halfe thereof with him againe; and notwithstanding that he knew well enough that his brother had used no faire play, 30 but cunningly defrauded him of much in the division thereof, yet was he never angric with him nor repented of his kindneffe, but mildly, cheerefully, and patiently endured that unthankfulnes and folly of his brother, fo much divulged and talked of throughout all Greece. As for Solon when he pronounced fentence and determined in this manner as touching the government of the weale-publike; That equalitie never bred fedition; feemed veric confusedly to bring in the proportion Arithmeticall which is popular, in place of that other faire and good proportion called Geometricall. But he that in an house or familie would advise brethren (as Plato did the citizens of his Common-wealth) above all, if possible it were to take away these words, Mine and Thine; Mine and not Mine; or at leastwile (if that may not be) to stand contented with an egall portion, and to maintaine and preferve equalitie; certes, he fnould lay a notable and fin-40 gular foundation of amitie, concord and peace, and alwaies build thereupon the famous examples of most noble and renowmed personages, such as Pittachus was, who when the King of Lydia demanded of him whether he had money and goods enough? I may have (quoth he) more by one halfe if I would, by occasion of my brothers death whose heire I am.

But for a funch as not onely in the possession, augmentation and diminishing of goods, the less evermore set as an adverse and crosses enemie to the more, but also (as Plato said) simply and universally there is alwaies motion and stirring in unequalitie, but rest and repose in equalitie; and so all uneven dealing and unequal partition is dangerous for breeding dissension among brethren; and unpossible it is, that in all respects they should be even and equally for that either Nature at first from their very nativitie, or Fortune asterwards, but not divided with even so hand their severall graces and savours among them, whereupon proceed envie and jealousie, which are pernicious maladies and deadly plagues, as well to house and samilies as also to States and Cities; in these regards (1 say) therefore, a great regard and heed would be taken, both to prevent and also to remedie such misches with all speed, when they begin first to ingender. As for him who is indued with better gifts, and hath the vantage over his other brethren, it were not amilie to give him counsell; first to communicate unto them those gifts wherein he seemeth to excell and goe beyond them; namely, in gracing and honouring them as well as himselfeby his credit and reputation, in advancing them by the meanes of his great friends, and

drawing them unto their acquaintance; and in case he be more eloquent than they, to offer them the use thereof, which although it be emploied (as it were) in common, is yet neverthelesse his owne still: then let him not shew any signe of pride and arrogancie, as though he disdained them, but rather in fome measure by abasing, submitting and yeelding a little to them in his behaviour, to preserve himselfe from envie, unto which his excellent parts do lie open; and in one word, to reduce that inequallitie which fortune hath made, unto some equallitie, as farre forth as possible it is to do, by the moderate carriage of his minde. Lucullus verily would never daine to accept of any dignitic or place of rule, before his brother, notwithstanding he was his elder, but letting his owne time flip, expected the turne and course of his brother. Neither would Pollux take upon him to be a god alone by himfelfe, but chofe rather with his brother Castor to be a de. 10 mic-god, and for to communicate unto him his owne immortalitie, thought it no diffrace to participate with his mortall condition; and even fo may a man fay unto one whom hee would admonth: My good friend, it lies in you without diminishing one whit of those good things which you have at this prefent, to make your brother equall unto your felfe, and to joine him in honour with you, giving him leave to enjoy (as it were) your greatnesse, your glory, your vertue, and your fortune; like as Plato did in times past, who by putting downe in writing, the names of his brethren, and bringing them in as persons speaking in his most noble and excellent Treatifes, caused them by that meanes to be famous and renowmed in the world. Thus he graced Glaucus and Adamanus in his books of Policie: thus he honoured Antiphon the yoongest of them all, in his Dialogue named Parmenides.

Moreover, as it is an ordinary thing to observe great difference and oddes in the natures and fortunes of brethren; so it is in maner impossible, that in all things and in every respect any one of them should excell the rest. For true it is, that the fource lements, which they say were created of one and the same matter, have powers and qualities altogether contrary; but surely it was never yet scene, that of two brethren by one father and mother; the one should be like unto that wife man, whom the Stoicks do faine and imagine, to wit, saire, lovely, bountifull, honourable, rich, eloquent, studious, civill and courteous; and the other, foule, ill-tavoured, contemptible, illiberall, needie, not able to speake and deliver his minde, untaught, ignorant, uncivil and unsociable. But even in those that are more obscure, base and abject than others, there is after a fort some sparke of grace, of valour, of apunesse and inclination to one good thing or other: for as 30 the common proverbe goeth;

With Calthrap thistles rough and keene, with Prickyrest-harow, Close Sions faire and soft, yea, White-walstowers are seeneso grow.

These good parts therefore, be they more or lesse in others, if he that seemeth to have them in faire better and in greater measure, do not debase, smother, hide and hinder them, nor deject his brother (as in some solemnitie of games for the prize) from all the principall honours, but rather yeeld reciprocally unto him in some points, and acknowledge openly that in many things he is more excellent, and hath a greater dexteritie than himselfe, withdrawing alwaies closely all occasions and matter of envie, as it were fewell from the fire, shall either quench all debate, or rather not fuffer it at all to breed or grow to any head and fubitance. Now he that alwaies taketh 49 his brother as a colleague, counfeller and coadjutor with him, in those causes wherin himselfe is taken to be his superiour: as for example; If he be a prosessed Rhetorician and Oratour, using his brother to pleade causes; if he be a Politician, asking his advice in government; if a man greatly friended, imploying him in actions and affaires abroad; and in one word, in no matter of confequence and which may win credit and reputation, leaving not his brother out, but making him his fellow and companion in all great and honourable occasions, and so giving out of him, taking his countell if he be prefent, and expecting his prefence if he be absent; and generally, making it knowen that he is a man not of leffe execution than himselfe, but one rather that loveth not much to put himselfe forth, nor stands so much upon winning reputation in the world, and feeking to be advanced in credit; by this meanes he shall lose nothing of his owne, $1 but gaine much unto his brother. These be the precepts and advertisements that a man may give unto him that is the better and superiour.

To come now to him who is the inferiour, he ought thus to thinke in his minde: That his brother is not one alone that hat no fellow, nor the onely man in the world who is richer, better learned, or more renowmed and glorious than himselfe, but that often-times he also is inferiour to a great number, yea, and to many millions of us men,

Who on the earth fo large do breed,

hut if he be fuch an one as either goeth up and downe, bearing envie unto all the world; or if he hee of foill a nature, as that among fo many men that are fortunate, he alone and none but he troubleth him, who ought of all other to be dearest, and is most necrely joined unto him by the obligation of blood, a man may well fay of him; That he is unhappy in the highest degree, and hath not left unto another man living, any meanes to go beyond him in wretchedneffe. As Metellus therefore thought that the Romans were bound to render thanks unto the gods in heaven, for that Sapio to noble and brave a man was borne in Rome, and not in any other citie; fo everie man is to with and pray unto the gods, that himfelfe may furmount all other men in prospetity, to if not, yet that he might have a brother at least-wife to attaine unto that power and authoritie (o much defired; but some there be so infortunate and unlucky by nature, in respect of any goodneffe in them, that they can rejoice and take a great glorie in this, to have their friends advanced unto high places of honor, or to fee their hoafts and guefts abroad, princes, rulers, rich and mightie men, but the resplendent glorie of their brethren they thinke doth eclypse and darken their ownerenowine; they delight and joy to heare the fortunate exploits of their fathers recounted, or how their great grandfires long ago had the conduct of armies, and were lord prætours and generals in the field, wherein they themselves had never any part, nor received thereby either honor or profit; but if there have fallen unto their brethren any great heritages or possessions, if they have risen unto high estate and atchieved honorable dignities, if they are 20 advanced by rich and noble mariages, then they are cast downe and their hearts be done, And yet it had behooved and right meet it were in the first place, to bee envious to no man at all; but if that may not be, the next way were to turne their envie outward, and cie-bite strangers, and to thew our fpite unto aliens who are abroad, after the maner of those who to rid themselves from civill feditions at home, turne the fame upon their enimes without, and fet them together

Of Trojanes and their allies both,

by the cares, and like as Diomedes in Homer faid unto Glancus,

Upon her fruits who live and feed.

even so it may be said unto them; There be a number besides of concurrents upon whom they may exercise their envie and jealousse, and not with their naturall brethren; for a brother ought not to be like unto one of the balance scales, which doth alwaies contrarie unto his fellow, for as one rifeth the other falleth; but as small numbers do multiplie the greater, and serve to make both them bigger, and their felves too; even fo an inferior brother by multiplying the flate of his brother who is his superior, thall both augment him and also increase and grow himselfe to-40 gether with him in all good things: marke the fingers of your hand, that which holdeth not the pen in writing, or striketh the string of a lute in playing (for that it is not able so to do, nor dispofed and made naturally for those uses) is never a whit the worse for all that, nor serveth lesse otherwise, but they all stir and moove together, yea and in some fort they helpe one another in their actions, as being framed for the nonce, unequal & one bigger & longer than other, that by their opposition and meeting as it were round together, they might comprehend, claspe, and hold any thing most fure, strong, and fast. Thus Craterse being the natural brother of king Antigonus who reigned and swaid the scepter: Thus Perilaus also the brother of Cassander who ware the crowne, gave their minds to be brave warriors and to lead armies under their brethren, or else applied themselves to governe their houses at home in their absence; whereas on the con-50 trary fide, the Antiochi and Seleuci, as also certeine Grapi and Cyziceni and such others, having not learned to beare a lower faile then their brethren, and who could not content themselves to fing a lower note, nor to rest in a second place, but aspiring to the ensignes and ornaments of roiall dignitie, to wit, the purple mantle of estate with crowne, diademe and scepter, filled themfelves and one another with many calamities, yea and heaped as many troubles upon all Alis throughout. Now forasmuch as those especially who by nature are ambitious and disposed to thirlt after glory, be for the most part envious & jealous toward those who are more honored & renowmed than they; it were very expedient for brethren if they would avoid this inconvenience, not to feeke for to atteine either honour or authoritie and credit all by the fame meanes. bit fome by one thing and fome by another: for we fee by daily experience, it is an ordinarie matter that wilde bealts do fight and warre one with another, namely when they feede in one and the same pasture; and among champions and such as strive for the masterie in feats of activitie, we count those for their adversaries and concurrents onely, who professe and practise the fame kinde of game or exercise; for those that goe to it with fifts and buffers, are commonly friends good enough to fuch fword-fencers as fight at tharpe to the interance, and well-willers to the champions called Paneratiasta: likewise the runners in a race agree full-well with wrest. lers: these I say, are ready to aide, affist and favor one another, which is the reason, that of the two sonnes of Tyndarus, Pollux wan the prize alwaies at buffets, but Castor his brother went away with the victorie in the race. And Homer very well in his Poeme feighed that Teucer was an excellent archer, and became famous thereby, but his brother ajax was best at close fight and hand-strokes, standing to it heavily armed at all peeces,

> And with his shield so bright and wide His brother Toucer he did hide.

And thus it is with them that governe a State and common weale; those that be men of arms and manage martiall affaires, never lightly do envie them much who deale in civill causes and use to make speeches unto the people; likewise among those that protesse Rhetoricke and eloquence, advocates who plead at barre, never fall out with those Sophisters that read lectures of oratorie; among professors of Physicke, they that cure by diet envie not the chirurgions who 10 worke by hand; whereas they who endevour and feeke to win credite and estimation by the fame art, or by their facultie and fufficiencie in any one thing, do as much (efpecially if they be badly minded withall) as those rivals who loving one mistresse, would be better welcome and finde more grace and favour at her hands one than another. True it is I must needes confesse; that they who go divers waies, doe no good one to another; but furely fuch as choose fundric courses of life doe not onely avoid the occasions of envie, but also by that meanes the rather have mutuall helpe one by the other: thus Demosthenes and Chares forted well together; def chines likewise and Eubulus accorded; Hyperides also and Leosthenes were lovers and friends; in every which couple, the former imploied themselves in pleading and speaking before the people, & were writers and pen-men, whereas the other conducted armies, were warriors and men to of action. Brethren therefore who cannot communicate in glorie and credit together without envie, ought to fet their defires and ambitious mindes as farre remote one from another, and turne them full as contrarie as they can, if they would finde comfort, and not receive displeafure by the prosperitie and happy successe one of another: but above all, a principall care and regard they must have of their kindred and alliance, yea and otherwhiles of their verie wives and namely, when they be readie with their perillous speeches many times to blow more coales, and thereby enkindle their ambitious humour. Your brother (quoth one) doth woonders; he carrieth all before him; he beareth the fway; no talke there is but of him; he is admired, and every man maketh court to him: whereas, there is no refort to you; no man commeth toward you; nothing is there in you that men regard or fet by. When these suggestions shall be thus 40 whifpered, a brother that is wife and well minded, may well fay thus againe: I have a brother in deed whose name is up and carrieth a great side; and verily the greater part of his credit and authoritie is mine and at my commaindement. For Socrates was woont to fay, that hee would * An ancient choose rather to have Darius his friend, than his *Daricks. And a brother who is of found and good judgement, will thinke that he hath no leffe benefit, when his brother is placed in great image, worth estate of government, blessed with riches, or advanced to credit and reputation by his gift of cloquence, than if himselfe were a ruler, wealthie, learned and eloquent. Thus you may see the Tetratradam best and readiest meanes that are to qualific and mitigate this unequalitie between brethren. Now there be other difagreements befides, that grow quickly betweene, especially if they want good bringing up and are not well taught, and namely, in regard of their age. For commonly 50 the elder, who thinke that by good right they ought to have the command, rule and government of their younger brethren in everie thing, and who held it great reason that they should be honored, and have power and authoritie alwaies above them, commonly do use them hardly and are nothing kinde and lightfome unto them: the younger againe being stubborne, wilfull and unruly, ready also to shake off the bridle, are woont to make no reckoning of their elderbrethrens prerogative, but fet them at naught and despise them; whereby it commeth to passe, that as the yoonger of one fide envied, are held downe with envie, and kept under alwaies by their elder brethren, and fo shunne their rebukes and skorne their admonitions; so these on the other fide desirous to hold their owne and maintaine their preeminence and soveraigntic over their. fland alwaies in dread left their yoonger brethren should grow too much, as if the rifing of them were their fall. But like as the cafe standeth in a benefit or good turne that is done, men favit is meet that the receiver should esteeme the thing greater than it is, and the giver make the least of it; even so, he that can perswade the elder, that the time whereby he hath the vantage of his other brethren is no great thing; and likewife the yoonger, that he flipuld reckon the fame birth-right for no small matter, he shall do a good deed betweene them, in delivering the one from dildaine, contempt and suspicion, and the other from irreverence and negligence. 10 Now for a fmuch as it is meet, that the elder flould take care and charge, teach and inftruct, admonish and reproove the yoonger; and as fit likewise the yoonger should honor, imitate and follow the elder: I could wish that the follicitude and care of the elder, favoured rather of a companion and fellow, than of a father; that himfelfe also would seeme not so much to command as to perswade, and to be more prompt and ready to joy for his yoonger brothers wel-doing, and to praife him for it, than in any wife take pleafure in reprehending and blaming him if haply he have forgotten his duetie; and in one word, to do the one not onely more willingly, but also with greater humanitie than the other. Moreover, the zeale and emulation in the yoonger ought rather to be of the nature of an imitation, than either of jealoufie or contention; for that imitation presupposethan opinion of admiration, whereas jealousie and contention implictly 20 envie, which is the reason that they affect and love those who endevour to resemble, and be like unto them; but contrariwife, they are offended at those and keepe them downe, who strive to be their equals. Now among many honors, which it beforemeth the younger to render unto his elder, obedience is that which deferveth most commendation, and worketh a more affured and hearticaffection accompanied with a certaine reverence, which causeth the elder reciprocally and by way of requitall to yeeld the like and to give place unto him. Thus Cate having from his infancie honored and reverenced his elder brother Capion, by all maner of obeifance and filence before him; in the end gained thus much by it, that when they were both men growen, he had fo woon him and filled him (as it were) with fo great a respect and reverence of him, that her would neither fay nor doe ought without his privitie and knowledge. For it is reported, that 30 when Capion had one day figned and fealed with his owne fignet a certaine letter testimonial; Cato his brother comming afterwards would not fet to his feale; which when Capio understood, he called for the forefaid testimonial and pluckt away his owne seale, before he had once demaunded for what occasion his brother would not believe the deed, but suspected his sestimonie? It feemeth likewife, that the brethren of Epicurus shewed great respect and reverence unto him, in regard of the love and carefull good will that he bare unto them; which appeared in this, that as to all other things else of his; so to his Philosophie especially, they were so wedded, as if they had beene inspired therewith. For albeit they were seduced and deceived in their opinion, giving out and holding alwaies (as they did) from their infancie, that never was any man fo deepe a clearke, nor fo great a Philosopher as their brother Epicurus: yet it is wonderfull to cono fider as well him that could fo frame and dispose them, as themselves also for being so disposed and affectionate unto him. And verily even among the more moderne Philosophers of later time, Apollonias the Peripateticke, had convinced him of untrueth (who foever hee was) that faid Lordship and glorie could like no fellowship, for he made his brother sotion more famous and renowmed than himselfe. For mine owne part, to say somewhat of my selfe; albeit that fortune hath done me many favours, in regard whereof I am bound to render unto her much thankes; there is not any one for which I take my selfe so much obliged and beholden unto her, as for the love that my brother 7 imon hath alwaies shewed and doth yet shew unto me; a thing that no man is able to denie, who hath never fo little beene in our companie, and you least of all others may doubt who have converfed fo familiarly with us.

Now there be other occasions of trouble which ought to be taken heed of among those brethren which are of like age or fomewhat neere in yeeres; fmall passions (I wote well) they be, but many they are, and those ordinary and continuall; by meanes whereof they bring with them an evill custome of vexing, fretting and angering one another ever and anon for finall things, which in the end turne into hatred and entnity irreconcileable : for when they have begun to quartell one with another at their games and pattimes, about the feeding and fighting of some little creatures that they keepe, to wir, quailes or cocks, and afterwards about the wreftling of their boies and pages at the schoole, or the hunting of their hounds in the chase, or the capa-rison of their horses; they can no more holde and refraine (when as they be men) their contentious veine and ambition in matters of more importance: thus the greatest and mightiest men among the Greeks in our time, banding at the first one against another in taking parts with their dancers, and then in fliding with their minftrels, afterwards by comparing one with another who had the better ponds or bathing pooles in the territorie of Edepfin, who had the fairer galleries and walking places, the statelier halles and places of pleasure, evermore changing and exchanging, and fighting (as it were) for the vantage of a place, ftriving still by way of odious comparison, cutting and diverting another way the conduct pipes of fountaines, are become to much exasperate one against another, that in the meane time they are utterly undone; for the tyrant is come, and hath taken all from them; banished they are out of their owne native t countrey; they wander as poore vagabonds thorow the world, and I may be bolde (well neere) to fay, they are so farre changed from that they were afore, that they be others quite, this onely excepted, that they be the fame still in hatred one to another. Thus it appeareth evidently, that brethren ought not a little to refift the jealoufie and contentions which breed among them upon smaltrifles, even in the very beginning, & that by accustoming themselves to year & give place reciprocally one to another, fuffering themselves to be overcome & take the foile, and joying rather to pleafure and content one another, than to win the better hand one of another: for the victorie which in olde time they called the Cadmian victorie, was nothing elsbut that victoric betweene brethren about the citic of Thebes, which is of all other the most wicked and mischievous.

What shall we say moreover? do not the affaires of this life minister many occasions of difagreement and debate even among those brethren which are most kind and loving of all other? yes verily. But even therein also, we must be carefull to let the faid affaires to combat alone by themselves, and not to put thereto any passion of contention or anger, as an anker or hooketo catch holde of the parties, and pull them together for to quarrell, and enter into debate; but asit were in a ballance, to looke jointly together, on whether fide right and equitie doth encline and bend, and so soone as ever we can, to put matters in question to the arbitrement and judgement of fome good and indifferent perfons, to purge and make cleere all, before they are growen fo farre, as that they have gotten a staine or tincture of cankred malice, which afterwards will never be wathed or foured out: which done, we are to imitate the Pythagoreans, who being neither to joined in kinred or confanguinitie, nor yet allied by affinitie, but the scholars in one schoole, and the fellowes of one and the fame discipline, if peradventure at any time they were so farrecaried away with choler, that they fell to enterchange reprochfull & reviling taunts, yet before the funne was gone downe they would shake hands, kiffe and embrace one another, be reconciled, and become good friends againe. For like as if there be a feaver, occasioned by a botch ornfing in the share, there is no danger thereof, but if when the faid botch is gone, the seaver still continue, then it feemeth to be a maladie proceeding from fome more inward, fecret and deeper cause; even so the variance betweene two brethren, when it ceaseth together with the deciding of a bulineffe, we must thinke dependeth upon the same bulineffe & upon nothing els, but if the difference remaine still when the controversic is ended, furely then it was but a colourable at pretence thereof, and there was within some root of secret malice which caused it. And herein this place it would ferve our purpose very well, to heare the maner of proceeding in the decision of a controversic betweene two brethren of a barbarous nation, and the same not for some little parcell of land, nor about poore flaves or filly sheepe, but for no lesse than the kingdome of Perfin: for after the death of Darius fome of the Perfians would have had Ariamenes to fucceed and weare the crowne, as being the eldeft fonne of the King late deceased; others against flood carneftly for Xerxes, aswell for that he had to his mother Atoffa the daughter of that great Cyrus, as because hee was begotten by Darius when hee was a crowned king. Ariamenes then came downe out of Media, to claime his right; not in armes, as one that minded to make warre, but fimply and peaceably, attended onely with his ordinary traine & retinue, minding to enter § upon the kingdome by justice & order of law. Xerxes in the meane while, & before his brother came, being present in place, ruled as king, & exercised all those functions that apperteined therto: his brother was no fooner arrived, but he tooke willingly the diademe or rotall frontlet from his head, & the princely chaplet or coroner which the Persian kings are wont to weare upright, he laid downe, & went toward his brother to meet him upon the way, & with kind greeting embraced him: he fent also certeine presents unto him, with commandement unto those that carried them, to fay thus: Xerxes thy brother honoreth thee now with these presents here, but if y

the fentence and judgement of the peeres and lords of Persia he shall be declared king, his will and pleasure is, that thou shalt be the second person in the realme, and next unto him. Ariamener answered the message in this wise: These presents I receive kindly from my brother, but I am perswaded that the kingdome of Persa by right belongeth unto me; as formy brethren, I will referve that honour which is meet and due unto them next after my felfe, and Xerxes shalbe the first and chiefe of them all. Now when the great day of judgement was at hand, when this weightie matter should be determined; the Persians by one generall and common consent dechired Artabanus the brother of Darius late departed, to be the umpire and competent judge for to decide and end this cause. Xerxes was unwilling to stand unto his award, being but one man, 10 as who reposed more trust and confidence in the number of the princes and nobles of the realme; but his mother Atoffa reproving him for it: Tell me (quoth fhe) my fonne, wherefore refuled thou Arrabanus to be thy judge, who is your uncle, and befides, the best man of all the Perfians? and why doest thou feare fo much the iffue of his judgement, confidering that if thou miffe, yet the second place is most honourable, namely, to be called the kings brother of Persia? Then Xerxes perfwaded by his mother, yeelded; and after many allegations brought and pleaded on both fides judicially, Artabanus at length pronounced definitively, that the kingdome of Persia apperteined unto Xerxes: with that Artamenes incontinently leapt from his seat, went and did homage unto his brother, and taking him by the right hand, embronifed and enftalled himking: from which time forward he was alwaies the greatest person next unto his brother; 20 and shewed himselfe so loving and affectionate unto him, that in his quarrell he sought most valiantly in the navall battel before Salaminas, where in his fervice and for his honour he loft his life. This example may ferve for an original patterne of true benevolence and magnanimitie, to pure and uncorrupt, as it cannot in any one point be blamed or steined. As for Antiochus, as a man may reprehend in him his ambitious minde, and exceffive defire of rule; fo he may afwell woonder that confidering his vaine-glorious spirit, all brotherly love was not in him utterly extinct; for being himselfe the yoonger, he waged war with Seleneus for the crowne, and kept his mother fire enough for to fide with him and take his part: now it hapned that during this warre and when it was at the horest, Seleucus strucke a battell with the Galatians, lost the field, and was himselfe not to be found, but supposed certainly to have beene slaine and cut in peeces, toge-30 ther with his whole armie, which by the Barbarians were put to the sword and massacred; when newes came unto Antiochus of this defeature, hee laide away his purple robes, put on blacke, caused the court gates to be shut, and mourned heavily for his brother, as if he had beene dead: but being afterwards advertised that he was alive safe & sound, and that he went about to gather new forces and make head againe; hee came abroad, facrificed with thankefgiving unto the gods, & commaumded al those cities & states which were under his dominion to keepe holiday, to facrifice & weare chapplets of flowers upon their heads in token of publike joy. The Athenians when they had devised an absurd and ridiculous fable as touching the quarrell betweene Neptune and Minerva, intermedled withall another invention, which foundeth to fome reason, tending to the correction of the fame, and as it were to make amends for that abfurditie, for 40 they suppresse alwaies the second of August, upon which day hapned (by their faying) that debate aforesaid betweene Neptune and Minerva. What should let and hinder us likewise, if it chance that we enter into any quarrell or debate with our allies and kinsfolke in blood, to condemne that day to perpetuall oblivion, and to repute and reckon it among the curfed and difmat daies: but in no wife by occasion of one such unhappie day to forget so many other good and joyfull daies wherein we have lived and beene brought up together; for either it is for nothing and in vaine that nature hath endued us with meekeneffe, and harmeleffe long fufferance, or patience the daughter of modestie and mediocritie, or else surely wee ought to use these vertues and good gifts of her principally to our allies and kinsfolke; and verily to crave and receive pardon of them when we our felveshave offended and done amiffe, declareth no leffe love and 50 naturall affection than to forgive them if they have trespassed against us. And therefore wee ought not to neglect them if they be angrie and displeased; nor to be straight laced and stiffely stand against them when they come to justifie or excuse themselves; but rather both when our selves have faulted, oftentimes to prevent their anger by excuse, making or asking forgivenesse, and also by pardoning them before they come to excuse if we have beene wronged by them. And therefore Euclides that great scholer of Socrates is much renowmed and samous in all schooles of Philosophie, for that when he heard his brother breake out into these beastly and wickedwords against him, The foule ill take me if I be not revenged and meet with thee; and a mischiefe come to me also (quoth he againe) if I appease not thine anger, & perswade thee to love me as well as ever thou didft. But king Eumenes not in word but in deed & effect furpaffed all others in meckeneffe and patience: for Perseus king of the Macedonians being his mortall enimie, had fecretly addressed an ambush, and fet certeine men of purpose to murder him about Delphos, elpying their time when they fawe him going from the sea side to the said towne forto confult with the oracle of Apollo: now when he was gone a little past the ambush, they began to affaile him from behinde, tumbling downe and throwing mightic flones upon his head and necke, wherewith he was so astonished that his fight failed, and he fell withall, in that manner as he was taken for dead: now the rumour heereof ran into all parts, infomuch as certeine of his fervitors and friends made speed to the citie Pergamus, reporting the tidings of this occurrent, 10 as if they had beene present and scene all done; whereupon Attalus the eldest brother next unto himfelfe, an honeft and kinde hearted man, one also who alwaies had caried himfelfe most faithfully and loyally unto Eumenes, was not onely declared king, and crowned with the royall diademe; but that which more is, espoused and maried Queene Stratonice his faid brothers wife, and lay with her. But afterwards, when counter-newes came that Eumenes was alive and comming homeward againe, Attalus laid afide his diademe, and taking a partifan or javelinia his hand (as his maner before time was) with other pentioners and squires of the bodie, he went to meet his brother : king Eumenes received him right graciously, tooke him lovingly by the hand, embraced the Queene with all honour, and of a princely and magnanimous spirit put up all; yea and when he had lived a long time after without any complaint, fulpition, and jealou 20 fie at all, in the end at his death made over and affigned both the crowne and the Queene his wife unto his brother the aforefaid Attalus: and what did Attalus now after his brothers decease? he would not foster and bring up (as heire apparant) so much as one childe that he had by Stratonice his wife, although the bare unto him many; but he nourished and carefully cherithed the fonne of his brother departed, untill he was come to full age, and then himfelfe in his life time with his owne hands fet the imperiall diademe and royall crowne upon his head, and proclaimed him king. But Cambyles contrariwife frighted upon a vaine dreame which he had; That his brother was come to usurpe the kingdome of Affic, without expecting any proofe or prelumption thereof, put him to death for it; by occasion whereof, the succession in the empirewent out of the race of Cyrus upon his decease, and was devolved upon the line of Darius 10 who raigned after him; a Prince who knew how to communicate the government of his affaires, and his regall authoritie, not onely with his brethren, but also with his friends.

Moreover, this one point more is to be remembred & observed diligently in all variances and debates that are rifen betweene brethren: namely, then especially, and more than at any time elfe, to converse and keepe companie with their friends; and on the other side to avoide their enemies and evill-willers, and not to be willing fo much as to vouchfafe them any speech or entertainment. Following herein the fashion of the Candiots, who being oftentimes fallen out and in civill diffension among themselves, yea and warring hot one with another, no sooner heare newes of forrein enemies comming against them, but they rancke themselves, banding jointly together against them; and this combination is that, which thereupon is called syntre- 40 tesmos. For some there be, that (like as water runneth alwaies to the lower ground, and to places that chinke or cleave afunder) are readie to fide with those brethren or friends that be fallen out, and by their fuggestions buzzed into their cares, ruinate and overthrow all acquaintance, kinred and amitic, hating indeed both parties, but feeming to beare rather upon the weaker fide, and to fettle upon him, who of imbecillitie foone yeeldeth and giveth place. And verily thofe that be fimple and harmleffe friends, fuch as commonly yong folke are, apply themselves commonly to him that affecteth a brother, helping & increasing that love what he may; but the most malicious enemies are they, who espying when one brother is angrie or fallen out with another, feeme to be angrie and offended together with him for companie; and these do most hurt of all others. Like as the hen therefore in Aelope answered unto the cat, making semblance as though 50 he heard her fay the was ficke, and therefore in kindnesse and love asking how the did? I am well enough (quoth fhe) I thanke you, fo that you were farther off; even fo, unto fuch a manas is inquisitive and entreth into talke as touching the debate of brethren to found and search into fome secrets betweene them, one ought to answere thus: Surely there would be no quarrell betweene my brother and me, if neither I nor he would give eare to carrie-tales and pick-thankes betweene us. But now it commeth to paffe (I wot not how) that when our eies be fore and in paine, we turne away our fight from those bodies and colours which make no reverberation of repercussion backe againe upon it, but when we have some complaint and quarrell, or conceive anger or suspicion against our brethren, we take pleasure to heare those that make all woorse, and are aptenough to take any colour and infection, presented to us by them, where it were more needfull and expedient at fuch a time to avoid their enimies and evill willers, and to keepe out felves out of the way from them; and contrariwife to converfe with their allies, familiars and friends; and with them to beare company especially, yea and to enter into their owne houles for to complaine and blame them before their very wives frankly and with libertie of speech. And yet it is a common faying, That brethren when they walke together, should not so much as let a stone to be betwixt them; nay they are discontented and displeased in minde, in case a dog to chance to runne overthwart them; and a number of fuch other things they feare, whereof there is not one able to make any breach or division betweene brethren; but in the meane while, they perceive not how they receive into the mids of them, and fuffer to traverse and crosse them, men of a currith and dogged nature, who can do nothing els but barke betweene, and fowe falle rumours and calumniations betweene one and another, for to provoke them to jarre and fall together by the cares: and therefore to great reason and very well to this purpose said Theophra-Itus; That if al things (according to the old proverbe) should be common among friends, then most of all they ought to enterteine friends in common; for private familiarities and acquaintances apart one from another, are great meanes to disjoine and turne away their hearts; for if they fall to love others, and make choife of other familiar friends, it must needs follow by confequence to take pleasure and delight in other companies, to esteeme and affect others, yea and to fuffer themselves to be ruled and led by others. For friendships and amities frame the natures and dispositions of men; neither is there a more certeine and affured signe of different humors and divers natures, than the choise & election of different friends, in fuch fort as neither to eate and drinke, nor to play, nor to passe and spend whole daies together in good fellowship and companie, is so effectuall to hold and maintaine the concord and good will of brethren, as to hate and love the same persons; to joy in the same acquaintance; and contrariwise to abhor and shun the same companie; for when brethren have friends common betweenethem, the faid friends will never fuffer any furmifes, calumniations & quarrels to grow betweene; and fay that peradventure there do artife some sudden heat of choler or grudging fit of complaint, preo sently it is cooled, quenched, and suppressed by the mediation of common friends; for readie they will be to take up the quarrell and featter it fo as it shall vanish away to nothing if they be indifferently affectionate to them both, and that their love incline no more to the one fide than to the other: for like as tin-foder doth knit and rejoyne a crackt peece of braffe, in touching and taking hold of both fides and edges of the broken peeces, for that it agreeth and forteth as well to the one as to the other, and fuffreth from them both alike; even so ought a friend to be fitted and futable indifferently unto both brethren, if he would knit furely, and confirme through their mutuall benevolence and good will. But fuch as are unequall, and cannot intermeddle and go betweene the one as well as the other, make a separation and disjunction, and not a found joint, like as certeine notes or discords in musicke. And therefore it may well bee o doubted and question made whether Hesiodus did well or no when he said,

Make not a feere I thee advise Thy brothers peere in any wife.

For a discrett and sober companion common to both (as I said) before, or rather incorporat (as it were) into them, shall ever be a sure knot to fasten brotherly love. But Hessource (as it should seeme) meant and feared this in the ordinary and vulgar fort of men, who are many of them naught, by reason that so customably they be given to jealouste and suspition, yea and to selfelove which if we consider and observe, it is well; but with this regard alwaies, that although a manyeeld equall good will unto a friend as unto a brother; yet neverthelesse in case of concurrence, he ought to referve ever the preeminence and first place for his brother, whether it be in so preferring him in any election of Magistrates, or to the mannaging of State affaires; or in bidding and inviting him to a solemne feast, or publike assembly to consult and debate of weightie causes; or introomending him to princes & great lords. For in such cases which in the common opinion of the world are reputted matters of honor and credit, a man ought to render the dignitie, honor, and reward, which is beseeming and due to blood by the course of nature. For in these things the advantage and prerogative will not purchase so much gloric and reputation to a strend, as the repulse and putting-by, bring disgrace, discredit and disson unto a brother.

Well

Well, as touching this old faid faw and fentence of Hesterdam, I have treated more at largees where; but the sententious saying of Menander full wisely set downe in these words:

putteth us in minde and teacheth us to have good regard and care of our brethren, and not to presume so much upon the obligation of nature, as to despise them. For the horse is a beast by nature loving to a man, and the dog loves his mafter; but in case you never thinke upon them. nor see unto them (as you ought) they wil forgoe that kind affectio, estrange themselves & take no knowledge of you. The bodicalfo is most necrely knit and united to the foule by the grea. test bond of nature that can be; but in case it be neglected and contemmed by her, or not chem in flied to tenderly as it looketh to be, unwilling shall you fee it to helpe and affish her, nay full un. towardly will it execute, or rather give over it will altogether everie action. Now to come more neere and to particularise upon this point, honest and good is that care and diligence which is emploied and shewed to thy brethren themselves alone; but better it would be farre, if thy love and kind affections be extended as far as to their wives fathers and daughters husbands, by carrying a friendly minde and readic will to pleasure them likewife, and to do for them in all their occasions; if they be courteous and attable in faluting their fervants, such especially asther love and favour 5 thankfull and beholding to their Physicians who had them in cure during sick neffe and were diligent about them; acknowledging themselves bound unto their faithfull and trustie friends, or to such as were willing and forward to take such part as they did in any long 1 voyage and expedition, or to beare them company in warfare. And as for the wedded wife of brother whom he is to reverence, repute and honor no leffe than a most facted and holy relique or monument, if at any time he happen to fee her, it will be come him to speake all honour and good of her husband before her; or to be offended and complaine (as well as she) of her husband, if he fet not that flore by her as he ought, and when the is angred to appeare and still her. Say also that the have done some light fault, and offended her husband, to reconcile him agains unto her and entreat him to be content and to pardon her; and likewise if there be some particular and private cause of difference betweene him and his brother, to acquaint the wife therewith, and by her meanes to complaine thereof, that she may take up the matter by composition and end the quarrell.

Lives thy brother a batcheler and hath no children? thou oughtest in good earnest tobe angrie with him for it, to follicite him to marriage, yea with chiding, rating, and by all meanes urge him to leave this fingle life, and by entring into wedlocke to be linked in lawfull alliance and affinitie: hath he children? then you are to thew your good will and affection more manifellly, as well toward him as his wife, in honouring him more than ever before, in loving his children as if they were your owne, yea and shewing your selfe more indulgent, kinde and affable unto them; that if it chaunce they do faults and shrewd turnes (as little ones are woont) they runne not away, nor retire into some blind and solitarie corner for seare of father and mother, or by that meanes light into some light, unhappie and ungracious companie, but may have recourse & refuge unto their unkle, where they may be admonished lovingly, and find an intercelfor to make their excuse & get their pardon. Thus Plato reclaimed his brothers son or nephew Spensippus, from his loofe life and diffolute riot, without doing any harme or giving him foule words, but by winning him with faire and gentle language (whereas his father and mother did nothing but rate and crie upon him continually, which caused him to runne away and keepe out of their fight) he imprinted in his heart a great reverence of him, and a fervent zeale to imtate him, and to fet his mind to the studie of Philosophie, notwithstanding many of his friends thought hardly of him and blamed him not a litle, for that he tooke not another course with the untoward youth, namely, to rebuke, checke, and chastice him sharply: but this was evermore his answere unto them: That he reprooved and tooke him downe sufficiently, by shewing unto him by his owne life and carriage, what difference there was betweene vice and vertue, betweene things honest and dishonest. Alenas sometime King of Thessalie, was hardly used and overawed by his father, for that he was infolent, proude, and violent withall; but contrariwife, his uncle by the fathers lide, would give him entertainment, beare him out and make much of him Now when upon a time the Theffalians fent unto Delphos certaine lots, to know by the oracle of god Apollo who should be their king? The foresaid uncle of Alenas unwitting to his brother, put in one for him: Then Pythia the Prophetesse gave answere from Apollo and pronounced, That Alenas should be king: The father of Alenas denied, and faid that he had cast in no lot for him; and it seemed unto every man that there was some errour in writing of those billes or names for the lotterie; whereupon new messengers were dispatched to the Oracle for to electe this doubt; and then Pythia in confirmation of the former choice, answered:

Imeane that youth with reddish heare, Whom dame Archedice in wombe did beare.

Thus Alems declared and elected king of Theffalie, by the oracle of Apollo, and by the meanes withall of his fathers brother, both proved himfelfe afterward a most noble prince, excelling all hisprogenitours and predeceffours, and also raised the whole nation and his countrey a great pame and mighty puilsance.

Furthermore, it is feemely and convenient by joying and taking a glory in the advancement, prosperity, honours and dignities of brothers children, to augment the same, and to encourage and animate them to vertue, and when they do well, to praise them to the full. Haply it might be thought an odious and unfeemely thing for a man to commend much his owne fonne, but furely to praise a brothers some is an honourable thing, and since it proceedeth not from the love of a mans felfe, it can not be thought but right, honeft, and (in truth)*divine: for furely me *ado hadthinks the very name it felfe (of tincle) is sufficient to draw brethren to affect & love deerly one field dryne at another, and so consequently their nephewes: and thus we ought to propose unto our selves, for to imitate the better fort, & fuch as have bene immortalised & deified in times past: for so Herto cules notwithstanding he had 70 sonnes within twaine of his owne, yet he loved toland his brothers fonne no leffe than any of them; infomuch as even at this day in most places there is but one altar erected for him and his faid nephew together, and men pray jointly unto Hercules and Iolaus. Alfo when his brother Iphiclus was flain in that famous battell which was fought nere Laced.emon, he was so exceedingly displeased, and tooke such indignation thereat, that he departed out of Peloponne (w, and left the whole countrey. As for Leucothea, when her fifter was dead, the nourished and brought up her childe, and together with her, ranged it among the heavenly faints: whereupon the Romane dames even at this day, when they celebrate the feaft of Leuesthea (whom they name Matuta) carrie in their armes and chearifh tenderly their fifters children, and not their owne.

OF INTEMPERATE SPEECH OR GAR-RVLITIE.

The Summarie.

so able) and Babble; against which this Discourse is addressed. Considering then, that silence is an assure redreward unto wise men, and opposite directly unto much practing, and comely and seemely specific in the mids, we call not silence a vice, but say, That a mannever findeth havne by holding his peace. But as southing Garruitte or Intemperate speech, the authour steweth in the very beginning of his Treatist, that it is a maladic incurable and against nature; for it doth full rate the talkative person of hus greatest desire, to wit, for to have audience and credit given him; also that it make the aman inconsiderate importane and malapert, ridiculous, mocked and hated, plunging him ordinarily into danger, so many events have prooved by experience. For to discover this matter the better, he saith concavations.

fequently: That the nature of vertuous men and those who have noble bringing up, is directly opportunity fire uno that of long-tongued persons; and joining the reasons by which a man ought not to bewrathin fecret together with those evils and inconveniences which curiofity of much babble do bring, and confirming all by fine similitudes and notable examples : afterwards, taking in hand againe his former speech and argument, be compareth a traiter and busie talker together, to the end that all menst could for much the rather detest the vice of garrulitie: then he proceedeth immediatly to discover and apply the remedies of this mischiefe, willing us, in the first place and generally to consider the calamities and mi feries that much babbling causes h; as also the good & commodity which proceedeth of silence: which done he discourseth of those particular remedies, which import thus much in effect: That aman ought to frame and accustome himselfe, either to be silent, or els to speake last; to avoid all hastinesse inma king his answere; to say nothing, but that which is either needfull or civill; to frun and forbearethis discourses which please us most, and wherein we may be soone overseene and proceed too farre; to find busic praters occupied apart from them; to provide them the companie of men who are of authoritie and aged; In summe, to consider whether that which a man hash faid, be convement, meet and profit. able, and nevertheleffe, to thinke alwaies of this: That other-whiles a man may repent of some world Boken, but never of keeping silence.

Very hard and troublefome cure it is that Philosophie hath undertaken, namely, To heale the disease of much prating; for that the medicine and remedie which she useth, be words that must be received by hearing; and these great talkers will abide to heare no man, for that they have all the words themselves, and talke continually so that the first mischiete of those who can not hold their tongue and keepe silence, is this; That they neither can nor will give eare to another; insomuch as it is a wilfull kinde of deafenesse in men, who seeme thereby to controll nature, and complaine of her, in that where she hath allowed them two cares, she hath given thembat one tongue. If then Euripides faid very well unto a foolish auditour of his,

Powre I wife words, and counfell what I can
With all my skill, into a fottiff man, Unnet by all I be able him to fill,
If holde and keepe the fame he never will.
aman may more truely and justly lay unto (or rather of) a prating fellow, Powre I wife words, and counfell what I can

Powre I wife words, and counfell what I ca With all my skill unto a fottifh man, Unneth I shall be able him to fill, In case receive the same he never will.

and in trueth, more properly it may be faid. That one powreth good advertisements about such an one and beside him rather, than into him, so long as he either speaketh unto him that listness not, or giveth no care unto them that speake: for if a pratting sellow chance to heate some short and little tale, such is the nature of this disease called Garrulitie, that his hearing is but a kind of taking his winde new, to babble it foorth againe immediatly, much more than it was, or like whitle-poolewhich what soever it taketh once, the same it sendeth up againe very often with the vantage. Within the city Olympia there was a porch or gallery called Heptaphones, for that some voice by sundry resections and reverberations it rendred seven eccloses: but if some speech come to the cares of a babbler, and enter never so little in, by and by it resoundeth agains on every side,

And firres the strings of secret heart within, Which should be still, and not be moon'd therein.

informuch, as a man may well fay: That the conducts and paffages of their hearing reach not to the braine where their foule and minde is feared, but onely to their tongue: by reafon whereof, whereas in others, the words that be heard doorest in their understanding, in pratters they we away and runne out prefently, and afterwards they goe up and downe like emptie veffels, void of fenie and full of found. Well, as incurable as fuch feeme to be, yet if it may be thought availeable to leave no experiment untried for to doe fuch good, we may begin our cure, and fay thus unto a buffe pratter:

Peace my good fonne, for Taciturnitie Brings ay with it much good commodity.

But among the rest, these be the two chiefe and principall, namely: To heare and to be heard; of which twaine, our importunate talkers can attaine neither the one northe other, fo unhappie they are as to be frustrate of that which they so much defire. As for other passions and maladies of the foule, namely, Avarice, Ambition, Love and Voluptuousnesse, they doe all of them in some fortenjoy their defire; but the thing that troubleth and tormenteth these babbling sellowes most, is this: That feeking for audience so much as they do, and nothing more, they can never meet with it, but every man shunneth their company, and slieth away as fast as his legges will carrie him; for whether men be fet together in a knot, fadly talking in their round chaires, or walking in companie, let them espie one of these pratiers comming toward them, away they go every one, that a man would fay the retreat were founded, fo quickly they retire. And like as when in some affembly if all be husht on a sudden so as there is not a word, wee use to say that Mercurie is come among them; even fo when a prating foole entreth into a place where friends are either fet at the boord to make merry, or otherwife met together in counfell, everie o man streightwaies is filent and holdeth his peace, as being unwilling to minister occasion unto him of talke; but if himselfe begin first to open his lips, up they rife all and are soone gone, as mariners suspecting, & doubting by the whistling northern wind from the top of craggie rocks, and promontories, tome rough fea, and fearing to be flomacke-ficke, retire betimes into a bay for harbor: whereby it commeth to paffe also, that neither at a supper can be meet with guests willing to eate and drinke with him, nor yet companions to lodge with him, either in journey by land, or voiage by fea, unlesse it be by constreint. For so importunate he is alwaies, that onewhile he is ready to hang upon a mans cloake wherefoever he goes, another while he takes hold on the fide of his beard, as if he knocked at the doore with his hand to force him to speake; in which case well fare a good paire of legs, for they are woorth much monie at such a time; as Archilochus was wont to fay, yea and Aristotle alfo that wife Philosopher: for when upon a time he was much troubled with one of these busic praters, who haunted and wearied him out of measure with cavilling tales and many foolish and absurd discourses, iterating estsoones these words; And is not this a woonderful thing Aristotle? No iwis (quoth he againe) but this were a wonderrather, if a man that hath feet of his owne should stand still and abide to heare you thus prate. Unto another also of the same stamp, who after much printe prattle and a long discourse, faid thus unto him: I doubt I have bin tedious unto you Philosopher with my many words; No in good footh (quoth Aristotle unto him:) for I gave no eare at all unto you. For if otherwhiles men cannot shake such praters off, but must of necessitie let their tongues walke, this benefit he hath by the foule, that the retireth inwardly all the while lending the outward eares onely for o them to beat upon, and dath as it were all about with their jangling bibble babble; for the in the meane time is otherwise occupied, and discourseth to herselfe of divers matters within; by which meanes fuch fellowes can meet with no hearers that take heed what they fay, or beleeve their words. For as it is generally held, that the naturall feed of fuch as are lecherous and much given to the companie of women is unfruitfull and of no force to engender; even fo the talke of these great praters is vaine, barren, and altogether fruitlesse. And yet there is no part or member of our body that nature hath fo furely defended (as it were) with a ftrong rampar, as the tongue: for before it she hath set a pallaisado of sharpe teeth, to the end that if peradventure it will not obey reason, which within holdeth it hard as with a straite bridle, but it will blatter out and not tarrie within, we might bite it until it bleed againe, and so restraine the intemperance therof. For 30 Euripides faid not, that houses unbolted;

But tongues and mouth's unbrid led if they bee Shall find in th' end mishap and miserte.

And those in my conceit who say that housen without dores, and putses without strings, serve their masters in no steed; and yet in the meane time, neither set hatch nor locke unto their mouthes, but suffer them rum out and overflow continually, like unto the mouth of the sea Pontauthese I say in mine opinion seeme to make no other account of words than of the basest thing in the world; whereby they are never beleeved (say what they will) and yet this is the proper end and scopethat all speech tendeth to, namely to winne credit with the hearers; and no man will ever believe these great talkers, no not when they speake the truth. For like as wheat if be it enclosed within some danke or most vessell, doths well and yeeld more in measure, but for use is found to be worse; even so it is with the talke of a pratting person; well may he multiply and augment it with lying, but by that meanes it seefeth all the force of perswation. Moreover what modest, eivil, and honest man is there, who would not verie carefully take heed of drunkenness? for anger (as some say) may well be ranged with rage & madnesse; and drunkennessed and well with her, or rather is * madness it selle, onely in circumstance of time it may be conneed lesse, for that it continued helse while, but surely in regard of the cause it is greater, for that it is voluntarie, and we tunne wilfully into it, and without any constraint. Now there is no a one thing for which drunkennesse is so much blamed and accused as for intemperate speech and talke without end: for as the Poët saith,

Wine makes a man who is both wife and grave To fing and chant to laugh full wantonly, It caufeth him to dance, and eke tor ave, And many things to do undecently.

for the greatest and woorst matter that ensueth thereupon is not finging, laughing and dauncing; there is another inconvenience in comparison whereof all these are nothing, and

To blurt abroad, and those words to reveale,

Which better were within for to conceale. This is (I fay) the mischiese most dangerous of all the rest and it may be that the Poët coverily would afforle that question which the Philosophers have propounded and disputed upon; namely, what difference there might be, betweene liberall drinking of wine, and starke drunken neffe? in attributing unto the former mirthand jocundneffe extraordinarie, and to the latter much babling and foolift prattle: for according to the common proverbe, that which is feated in the heart and thought of a lober person, lieth alost in the mouth and tongue of a drunkard And therefore wifely answered the Philosopher Bias unto one of these jangling and prating companions: for when he feemed to marke him for fitting still, and saying nothing at a feat, informuch as he gave him the lob and foole for it: And how is it possible (quoth he) that a foole; should hold his peace at the table? There was upon a time a citizen of Athens who feasted the embaffadors of the king of Perfia, and for that he perceived that thele great Lords would take delight in the companie of learned men and Philosophers, upon a brave minde that he carried, invited they were all & met there together: now when all the rest began to discourse in general, and everie man seemed to put in some vie for himselfe, and to hold and maintaine one theame or other, Zeno who fate among them was onely filent and spake not a word; whereupon the said Embaffadors and ftrangers of Persia began to bee merrie with him and to drinke unto him round, faying in the end: And what shall wereport of you Sir Zeno unto the King our master? Marie (quoth he) no more but this, that there is an ancient man at Athens, who can fit at the boord and fay nothing. Thus you fee that filence argueth deepe and profound wifedome; it im 40 plieth fobrietie, and is a mysticall secret and divine vertue; whereas drunkennesse is talkative, full of words, void of fense and reason; and indeed thereupon multiplieth so many words, and is ever jangling. And in truth the Philosophers themselves when they define drunkennesse say: That it is a kinde of raving and speaking idlely at the table upon drinking too much wine; whereby it is evident, that they doe not fimply condemne drinking, fo that a man keepe himfelfe within the bounds of modestie and filence; but it is excessive and foolish talke, that of drinking winemaketh drunkennesse. Thus the drunkard raveth and talketh idlely when he is cup-shotten at the boord; but the pratter and man of many words doth it alwaies and in every place, in the market and common hal, at the theatre, in the publike galleries and walking places, by day and by night If he be a physician and visit his patient, certes he is more grievous, and doth more hurt in his cure than the maladie it selfe; if he be a passenger with others in a ship, all the companie had rather be sea-sicke than heare him prate; if he set to praise thee, thou wert better to be dispraised by another; and in a word, a man shall have more pleasure and delight to converse and commune with lewed persons so they be discreet in their speech, than with others that be business. kers, though otherwise they be good honest men. True it is indeed that old Nestor in a tragedie of sophocles speaking unto Ajax (who overshothimselfe in some hot and hasty words) for to age peale and pacifie him, faith thus after a milde and gracious maner,

I blame not you fir Ajax for your speech N aught though it be, your deeds are nothing leech. t surely we are not so well affected unto a vaine-prating sellow;

But furely we are not fo well affected unto a vaine-prating fellow; for his importunate and unfeafonable words, marre all his good works, and make them to lofe their grace. Lyfus upon a time, at the requelt of one who had a caufe to plead unto at the barre, penned an oration for his purpofe and gave it him. The partie after he had read and read it over againe, came unto Lyfus heavie and ill-appaied faying; The first time that I perufed your oration, the thought it was excellently well written, and I wondred at it; but when I tooke it a fecond and third time in hand, it feemed very fimply endited & caried no forcible and effectuall full with it: Why(quoth Lyfus, and similed withall) know you not that you are to pronounce it but once before the judges? and yet see & marke withall the perswasive eloquence and sweet grace that is in the writing of Lyfus, for I may be bold to say and affirme of him, that

And among those singular commendations that are given out of any Poët; most true it is that Homer is he alone of all that ever were, who overcame all satietie of the reader; seeming evermore new and fresh, sourishing alwaies in the prime of lovely grace, and appearing yoong shill and amiable to win savour; howbeit in speaking and prosessing thus much of himselse,

It greeves me much for to rehear se againe At ale that once delivered hath beene plaine.

He sheweth sufficiently that he avoideth what he can, and searcth that tedious satietic which solloweth hard at heeles, & laieth wait (as it were) unto all long traines of speechsin which regard he leaderly the reader & hearer of his Poemes from one discourse & narration to another, and evermore with novelties doth fo refresh and recreate him, that he thinketh he hath never enough; whereas our long-tongued chatterers do after a fort wound and weary the eares of their hearers by their tautologies and vaine repetitions of the fame thing as they that foile and flourry writing tables when they be faire fooured and clenfed; and therefore let us fet this first and formost before their eies, that like as they who force men to drinke wine out of measure and undelaied with water, are the caufe that the good bleffing which was given us to rejoice our hearts and 20 make us pleafant and merry, driveth fome into fadneffe, and others into drunkenneffe and violence; even fo they that beyond all reason and to no purpose use their speech (which is a thing otherwile counted the most delightsome and amiable meanes of conference and societie that men have together) cause it to bee inhumane and unsociable, displeasing those whom they thought to pleafe, making them to be mocked at their hands, of whom they looked to be well effectived, and to have their evill will and displeasure, whose love and amitie they made reckoning of. And even as hee by good right may be effected incourteous and altogether uncivill, who with the girdle and tiffue of Venus, wherein are allforts of kind and amiable allurements, should repell and drive from him as many as defire his companie; so hee that with his speech maketh others heavie and himfelfe hatefull, may well be held and reputed for a graceleffe man 40 and of no bringing up in the world. As for other passions and maladies of the minde, some are dangerous, others odious, and fome againe ridiculous and expoled to mockerie; but garrulity is subject unto all these inconveniences at once. For such solke as are noted for their lavish tongue, are a meere laughing stocke, and in every common and ordinary report of theirs, they minister occasion of laughter; hated they be for their relation of ill newes, and in danger they are because they cannot conceale and keepeclose their owne secrets: heereupon Anachar sis being invited one day & feasted by Solon, was reputed wife, for that being afleepe he was found and feene holding his right hand to his mouth, and his left upon his privities and natural parts: for good reason he had to thinke, that the tongue required and needed the stronger bridle and bit to restreine it : and in very truth it were a hard matter to reckon so many persons undone o and overthrowne by their intemperate and loose life, as there have beene cities and mightie States ruinated and subverted utterly, by the revealing and opening of some secrets. It fortuned that whiles Sylla did inleaguer before the citie of athens, and had not leafure to stay there long and continue the fiege, by reason of other affaires and troubles pressed him fore, for of one side king Mithridates invaded and harmed Asia, and on the other side the faction of Marine gathered itength; and having gotten head, prevailed much within Rome: cetteine old fellowes being met in a barbars shop within the city of Ashens, who were blabs of their tongues, clattered it out in their talk together, that a certaine quarter of the citie named Heptacalekon was not fufficiently guarded, and therefore the towne in danger to be surprised by that part; which talke of theirs was over-heard by certeine espies, who advertised Sylla so much; whereupon immediately hee brought all his forces to that fide, and about midnight gave an hot affault, made entricand went within a very little of forcing the citie, and being mafter of it all, for he filled the whole ftreete called Ceramicum with flaughter and dead carcaffes, infomuch as the chanels ran downe with bloud. Now was hee cruelly bent against the Athenians more for their hard language which they gave him than for any offence or injurie otherwise that they did unto him, for they had flouted and mocked Sylla, together with his wife Metella; and for that purpose they would get upon the walles and fay; syllais a Sycamoore or Mulberie, bestrewed all over with dufty-meale; befides many other fuch foolish jibes and taunts; and fo for the lightest thing in the world (as Plato faith) to wit, words which are but winde, they brought upon their heads a most heavie and grievous penaltie. The garrulitie and over-much talke of one man, was the only hinderance that the citie of Rome was not fet free and delivered from the tyrannic of Nero, For there was but one night betweene the time that Nero should have beene murthered on the inforrow, and all things were readic and prepared for the purpose: but he who had undertaken the execution of that feat, as he went toward the Theatre, espied one of those persons who were condemned to die, bound and pinnioned at the prison doore, and readie to be led and brought before Nero; who hearing him to make pitcous moane and lamenting his miferable fortune, steps to him and rounding him softly in the eare: Pray to God poore man (quoth he) that this one day may paffe over thy head, and that thou die not to day, for to morrow thou shalt conme 20 thankes. The poore prisoner taking hold presently of this anigmaticall and darke speech, and thinking (as I fuppose) that one bird in hand is better than two in bush, and according to the common faying that made choise of faving his life by the surer way, rather than by the juster meanes; for he discovered unto Nero that which the man had whifpered fecretly unto him : whereupon prefently the partie was apprehended and carried away to the place of torture, where by racking, fcott 30 ching and fourging; he was urged miferable wretch, to confesse and speake out that perforce, which of himselfe he had revealed without any constraint at all. Zeno the Philosopher fearing that whe his body was put to dolorous and horrible torments, he should be forced even against his will to bewray and disclose some secret plots bit-off his tongue with his owne teeth and spitit in the Tyrants face. Notable is the example of Leana, and the reward which the had for conteining and ruling her tongue is fingular. An harlot the was and verie familiar with Harmodius and Ariflogiton; by meanes of which inward acquaintance, privie the was and partie as farre foorth as a woman might be to that conspiracie which they had complotted against the usurping tyrants of Athens, and the hopes that they builded upon (Drunke the had out of that faire cup of Love, and thereby vowed never to reveale the fecrets of god Cupid.) Now after that thele w two paramours and lovers of hers had failed of their enterprise and were put to death; she was called into question and put to torture, and therewith commaunded to declare the rest of the complices in that conspiracie, who as yet were unknowen and not brought to light: but so constant and resolute the was, that the would not detect so much as one, but endured all paines and extremities whatfoever; whereby the thewed that those two young gentlemen had done nothing unfitting their persons and nobilitie, in making choise to be enamoured of her. In regard of which rare fecrecie of hers, the Athenians caused a Lionesse to be made of brasse withouta tongue, and the fame in memoriall of her to be erected and fet up at the verie gate and entrie of their Citadell; giving posteritie to understand by the generosity of that beast, what an undanuted and invincible heart the had; and likewise of what taciturnitie and trust in keeping secrets, 19 by making it tongueleffe: and to fay a tructh, never any word spoken served to so good stead as many concealed and held in, have profited. For why? A man may one time or other utter that which he once kept in; but being spoken, it cannot possibly be recalled and unsaid, for out it is gone alreadie and spread abroad fundrie waies. And hereupon it is (I suppose) that we have men to teach us for to speake, but we learne of the gods to hold our peace. For in facrifices, religious mysteries, and ceremonies of divine service we receive by tradition, a custome to keepe silence. And even so, the Poet Homer feigned ulyffes (whose eloquence otherwise was so sweet) to be of all men most filent and of fewest words; his sonne likewise, his wife and nourse, whom you may heare thus speaking:

As soone shall stocke of sturdy oake it tell, Or iron so strong as I will it reveale.

And ulyffes himselfe sitting by Penelope, before he would be knowen unto her who he was,

Griev din hismind, and pitted to behold Hiswife by teares to hew what heart did feele, But all the while his eies he ftiffe did hold, Which ftr d no more than horne or fturdie fteele.

10 fo full was his tongue of patience, and his lips of continence. For why? reason had all the parts of his bodie so obeisant and readie at command, that it gave order to the cies not to shed teares; to the tongue not to utter a word; to the heart not to pant or tremble, nor so much as to so or sight:

Thus unto reason obeisant was his heart, Perswaded all to take in better part.

yea his reason had gotten the maltrie of those inward and secret motions which are voide and incapable of reason, as having under her hand the verie blood and vitall spirits in all obeysance: his people also and traine about him were for the most part of that disposition; for what wanted this of constancy & loyalty to their lord in the highest degree, to suffer themselves to be pulled 20 & thaled, to be tugged & tossed, yea & dashed against the hard ground under foote by the giant Cyclops, rather than to utter one word against the suffer, or to bewray that logge of wood which was bornt at the one end, & an instrument made readie for to put out his onely cie that he had? nay they endured rather to be eaten & devoured raw by him, that to disclose any of Utyses his secrets. Pittaem therefore did not amisse, who when the King of Egypt had sent unto him abeast for facrifice, and willed him withall to take out and lay apart the best and woorst piece thereof, plucked out the tongue and sent it unto him, as being the organ of many good things, and no lesse instrument of the woorst that be in the world. And Ladie Ino in Euripides speaking sreely of herfelle, faith that she knew the time.

When that she ought her tongue to hold, And when to speake, she might be bold.

For certainly those who have had noble and princely bringing up in deed, learne first to keepe filence, and afterwards how to speake. And therefore king Antigonus the great, when his sonne upon a time asked him, When they should dislodge and breake up the campe: What sonne (quoth hee) art thou alone afraid, that when the time comes thou shalt not heare the trumpet found the remove? Loe, how he would not trust him with a word of secrecie, unto whom he was to leave his kingdome in fuccession! teaching him thereby, that he also another day should in fuch cases be wary and spare his speech. Olde Metellus likewise, being asked such another secret as touching the armie and fetting forward of fome expedition: If I wift (quoth he) that my Thirt which is next my skinne, knew this my inward intent and fecret purpose, I would put it off 40 and fling it into the fire. King Eumenes, being advertised that Craterus was comming against him with his forces, kept it to himselfe, and would not acquaint any of his necrest friends therewith, but made femblance and gave it out (though untruly) that it was Neoptolemus who had the leading of that power; for him did his fouldiours contemne and make no reckoning of, whereas the glory and renowme of Craterio they had in admiration, and loved his vertue and valour: now when no man els but himfelfeknew of Craterus his being in the field, they gave him battell, vanquished him, slew him before they were aware, neither tooke they knowledge of him before they found him dead on the ground. See how by a stratageme of secrecie and silence the victorie was atchieved, onely by concealing to hardie and terrible an enemie; infomuch, as his very friends about him admired more his wifedome in keeping this fecret from so them, than complained of his diffidence and diftrust of them. And fay that a man should complaine of thee in fuch a case, better it were yet to be challenged and blamed for distrusting, all the while thou remainest fase and obtaine a victorie by that meanes, than to be justly accused after an overthrow, for being to open and trufting to cafily. Moreover, how dareft thou confidently and boldly blame and reproove another for not keeping that fecret, which thou thy felfe hast revealed? for if it was behoovefull and expedient that it should not be knowen, why hast thou tolde it to another? but in case when thou hast let flie a secret from thy selse unto a man, thou wouldest have him to holde it in, and notblutt it out, surely it can not be but thou hast better confidence in another than thy felfe: now if he be like thy felfe, who will pity thee if thou come by a mischiese? is he better, and so by that meanes saveth thee harmelesse beyond all reafon and ordinary course? then hast thou met with one more faithfull to thee than thou art thy felfe: but haply thou wilt fay: He is my very friend; so hath he another friend (be fure) whom he will do as much for, and disclose the same secret unto, and that friend (no doubt) hath ano. ther. Thus one word will get more still, it will grow and multiplie by a fute and sequence linked & hanging to an intemperate tongue: for like as Unitie, fo long as the paffeth not her bounds. but continueth and remaineth still in herselfe, is one and no more, in which respect she is called in Greeke, Monas, that is to fay, Alone; whereas the number of twaine is the beginning of a diversitie (as it were) and difference, and therefore indefinite; for straight-waies is Unitie passed to forth of it felfe by doubling, and fo turneth to a plurality; even fo a word or speech all the while it abideth enclosed in him who first knew it, is truely and properly called a Secret, but after itis once gotten forth and fet a going, fo that it is come unto another, it beginneth to take the name of a common brute and rumour : for asthe Poet very well faith; Words have wings. A bird, if The be let flie once out of our hands, it is much adoc to catch againe, and even fo, when a word bath paffed out of a mans mouth, hardly or unneth may we withholde or recover; for it flieth amaine, it flappeth her light wings, fetching many a round compasse, and spreadeth every way from one quarter to another: well may mariners flay a ship with cables and ankers, when they. olence of the winde is ready to drive and carrie her an end, or at least-wife they may moderate her swift & flight course; but if a word be iffued out of the mouth, as out of her haven, and have w gotten sea-roome, there is no bay nor harborough to ride in, there is no casting of ankerwill ferve the turne, away the goes with a mighty noise and hurry, untill in the end the runnes upon fome rocke and is fplit, or els into a great and deepe gulfe, to the present danger of him who set her foorth;

For in small time, and with a little sparke Of sire, aman may burne the sorrest tall Of Ida mount; evin so (who list to marke) All towne will heare, a word to one let fall.

The Senate of Rome upon a time fat in fadde and ferious counfell many daies together, about a matter of great fecrecie: now the thing being fo much the more suspected and hearkened as p ter, as it was leffe apparent and knowen abroad; a certaine Romane dame, otherwife a good fober and wife matron (howbeit a woman) importuned her husband and instantly befoughthin, of all loves to tell her what this fecret matter might be upon which they did fit fo close in confultation? protefling with many an oath and execrable curle to keepe filence and not to utterit to any creature in the world; you must thinke also, that she had teares at command, lamenting and complaining withall, what an unhappie woman the was, in cafe her husband would not truft her fo much as with a word: the Romane Senatour her husband minding to trie and reprove her folly: Thou halt overcome me (fweet heart, quoth hee) and through thine importunitie, thou shalt heare of a strange and terrible occurrent that troubleth us all. So it is, that we are advertifed by our Priefts, that there hath bene a larke of late feene flying in the aire, with a golden # cop or creft on her head in maner of an helmer, and withall, bearing a javelin : hereupon wedo conferre and confult with our Soothfaiers and Diviners, defirous to be certified out of their learning, whether this prodigious token portend good or hurt to the Common-weale? but keepe it to thy felfe (as thou lovest me) and tell it no bodie. When he had thus said, he went forth toward the Common hall and Market place: his wife incontinently had no fooner spied one of her waiting-maidens comming into the roome, but she drew her apart, begunne to heat and knocke her owne brest, to rent and teare the haire off her head, and therewith: Ah, woe's me (quoth she) for my poore husband, my sweet native countrey; alas and weladay, what shall we doe, and what will become of us all; as if thee taught her maide and were defirous that thee should fay thus unto her againe: Why, what is the matter mistresse? Now when the maiden? thereupon asked her, What newes? Thee fet tale an end and told all, marie flee forgat not the common and ordinarie burden or clause, that all blabs of their tongue use to come in with: But in any case (quoth she) say nothing, but keepe it to thy selfe. Scarse was shee gone out of her mistresse sight, but seeing one of her fellowes whom she found most at leasure and doing link or nothing, to her the imparted all. That wench againe made no more adoo, but to her lover the goes, who haply then was come to vifite her, and telleth him as much. By this meanes the tale was bruted abroad, and passed roundly from one to another; infomuch as the rumour thereof was runne into the market place, and there went currant before the first author, and deviser there of himselfe was gotten thither. For there meetes with him one of his familiars and friends: How now (quoth he) are you come but now directly from your house to the matket place: No (quoth he againe) I am but newly come: Why then belike (faith the other) you have heard no newes? Newes (quoth he) what newes should I heare? and what tidings can you tell me off? Why man (answered he agame) there hath beene of late a Larke scene flying with a golden cop or crest on her head, and carrying beside a javelin; and the Consuls with other Magistrates are readie to call a Senate house for to fit upon this strange occurrent. With that the Senatour beforefaid, turning afide & fmiling, thus faid to himfelte: Weldone wife, I con thee thank for thy 10 quicknes & celeritie, thou hast quit thy selfe well indeed, that the word which erewhile I uttered unto thee, is gotten before me into the market place. Well, the first thing that he did was this, To the Magiltrates he went straightwaies, fignified unto them the occasion of this speech, and freed them from all feare and trouble: but when he was come home to his owne house he fell in hand to chastice his wife: How now Dame (quoth he) how is this come to passe; you have undone me for ever; for it is found and knowen for a trueth, that this fecret and matter of counfell which I imparred to you, is divulged and published abroad, and that out of my house; and thus your unbridled tongue is the cause that I must abandon and fly my countrey, and foorthwith depart into exile. Now when at the first she would have denied the thing stourly, and alledged for her excuse and defence, faying: Are not there three hundred Senatours besides o your selfe, who heard it as well as you? No marvell then if it be knowen abroad. What tell you me of three hundred (quoth he?) Upon your importunate inflance, I devifed it of mine owne head, in mirth to trie your filence, and whether you could keepe counfell. Certes, this Senator was a wife man and went fafely and warily to worke, who to make proofe of his wife, whom hee tooke to be no founder nor furer than a crackt and rotten veffell, would not poure into it either wine or oile, but water only, to fee if it would leake & run out. But Fulvius one of the favorits & minnions of Augustus the Emperor, when he was now well stepped in vecres, having heard him. toward his latter daies, lamenting and bewailing the deffolate estate of his house, in that he had no children of his owne bodie begotten; and that of his three nephewes or fifters children two were dead, and Posthumius (who onely remained alive) upon an imputation there upon him 30 confined, and living in banithment, whereupon he was enforced to bring in his wives fonne. and declare him heire apparant to succeed him in the Empire: notwithstanding upon a tender compassion, he was otherwhiles in deliberation with himselse, and minded to recall his foresaid fifters fonne from exile, and the place whereunto he was confined. Fulvius (I fay) being privy to these moanes and desseignes of his, went home and told his wife all that he had heard. Shee could not hold but goes to the Empresse Livia, wife of Augustus, and reported what her husband Fulvius had told her. Wherenpon Livis taking great indignation, sharply did contest and expostulate with Cafar in these termes: That seeing it is so (quoth she) that you had so long before projected & determined fuch a thing, as to cal home againe your nephew aforefaid; why fent you not for him at the first, but exposed me to hatred, enmity & war with him, who another 40 day should weare the Diademe and be Emperor after your decease? Well the next morning betimes, when Fulvius came, as his maner was, to falute Cafar and give him good morrow, after he had faid unto him zonge Kairres; that is, God fave you Cafar. He refaluted him no otherwise buthis, viture génére; that is, God make you wife Fulvius. Fulvius soone found him and conceived presently what hee meant thereby; whereupon hee retired home to his house withall speede, and called for his wife; unto whom: Cafar (quoth hee) is come to the knowledge that I have not kept his counfell nor concealed his fecrets; and therefore I am refolved to make my felfe away with mine owne handes. And well woorthie (quoth shee) for justly you have deserved death, who having lived so long with me, knew not the incontinence of my tongue all this while, norwould take heed and beware of it; but yet fuffer me first 50 to die upon your fword; and with that catching hold therof, killed herselse before her husband. And therefore Philippides the Comædian, did verie wifely in his answere to King Lysimachus, who by way of all courtefie making much of him, and minding to do him honour, demaunded of him thus: What wouldest thou have me to impart unto thee of all other treasure and riches that I have? What it shall please your Majestie (quoth he) my gracious Lord, so it be none of

Moreover, there is adjoined ordinarily unto Garrulitie, another vice no lesse than it; namely, Busic intermedling and Curiositie, for men desire to heare and know much newes, because they may report and blase the same abroad, and especially if they be secrets. Thus goe they up and downe liftening, enquiring and fearching if they can find and discover some close and hid. den speeches, adding as it were some olde surcharge of odious matters to their toics and soole. ries; which maketh them afterwards to be like unto little boies, who neither can hold yeein their hands, nor yet will let it goe; or to fay more truely, they classe and conteine in their bo. foms fecret speeches, refembling serpents, which they are not able to hold and keepe long, but are eaten and gnawen by them. It is faid that certaine fifthes called the Sea-needles, yea and the vipers doe cleave and burst when they bring foorth their your 3; and even so, secrets when they be let fall out of their mouthes who can not containe them, undo and overthrow those that reveale them. King Seleucus (him I meane who was furnamed Callinicus, that is, the victori-10 ous Conquerour) in one battell against the Galatians, was defaited hee and his whole power; whereupon he tooke from his head the Diademe or Royall band that he ware, and rode away on the spurre on horsebacke with three or source in his companie, wandring through defarts and by waies unknowen fo long, untill both horse and man were done, and readie to faint for weari. neffe: at length he came unto a countrey kearnes or peafants cottage; and finding (by good fortune) the good man of the house within, asked for bread and water; which the faid peasantor cottier gave unto him; and not that onely, but looke what the field would afoord els belides, he imparted unto him and his company with a willing heart and in great plentie, making them the best cheere that hee could devise: in the end he knew the kings face, whereupon he tooke such joy, in that his hap was to entertaine the king in his necessitie, that he could not conteine him- 20 felfe, nor fecond the king in diffembling his knowledge, who defired nothing more, than to be unknowen: when hee had therefore brought the king onward on his way, and was to take his leave of him: Adieu (quoth he) king Seleucus: with that the king reached foorth his hand, and drew him toward him, as if he would have kiffed him, & withall, beckned to one of his followers, and gave him a fecret token to take his fword and make the man shorter by the head.

Thus whiles he spake (I wot not what) his head Off goes, and ties in dust when he was dead.

whereas, if he could have held his tongue a little while longer, and mastered himselse, when the king afterwards had better fortune and recovered his greatnesse and puissance, he should in my conceit have gotten more thanks at his hands, and beene better rewarded for keeping filence, 30 than for all the courrefie and hospitalitie that he shewed. And yet this fellow had in some fort a colourable excuse for this intemperate tongue of his, to wit, his owne hopes and the good will that he bare unto the king: but the most part of these pratters vndo themselves without any cause or pretense at all of reason: like as it befell unto Denys the tyrants barbar: for when (upon a time) there were fome talking in his shop as touching his tyrannicall government and estate, how affured it was, and as hard to be ruined or overthrowen, as it is to breake the Diamond: the faid barbar laughing thereat: I marvell (quoth he) that you should fay so of Denys, who is so of ten under my hands, and at whose throat in a maner every day I holde my rasor: these words were foone carried to the tyrant Denys, who faire crucified this barbar and hanged him for his foolish words. And to fay a trueth, all the fort of these barbars be commonly busie fellowes 40 with their tongue; and no marvell, for lightly the greatest praters and idlest persons in a countrey, frequent the barbars thop, and fit in his chaire, where they keepe fuch chat, that it cannot be, but by hearing them prate fo customably, his tongue also must walke with them. And therefore king Archelaus answered very pleasantly unto a barbar of his, that was a man of no few words, who when he had cast his linnen cloth about his shoulders, said unto him: Sir, may it please your Highnesse to tell me how I shall cut or shave you: Mary (quoth he) holding thy tongue, and faying not a word. A barbar it was, who first reported in the city of Athens, the newes of that great discomfiture and overthrow which the Athenians received in Sicily; for keeping his shop (as he did) in that end of the suburbs called Pyraum, he had no sooner heard the faid unlucky newes of a certaine flave who fled from thence out of the field, when it was loft, but 50 leaving shop and all at fixe and seven, ran directly into the city, and never rested to bring the said tidings, and whiles they were fresh and fire-new,

For feare some els might all the honour win, And he too late, or second, should come in.

Now upon the broching of these unwelcome ridings, a man may well thinke (and not without good cause) that there was a great stirre within the city; informuch, as the people affembled to gether into the Market place or Common hall, and search was made for the authour of this submour : hereupon the faid barbar was haled and brought before the bodie of the people, and exanined; who knew not fo much as the name of the partie of whom hee heard this newes; But well affured I am (quoth he) that one faid fo, mary who it was or what his name might be, I can not tell. Thus it was taken for an headlesse tale, and the whole Theatre or Assembly was to moved to anger, that they cried out with one voice; Away with the villaine, have the varlet to the racke, fet the knave noon the wheele, he it is onely that hath made all on his owne fingers ends, this hath he and none but he devised; for who els hath heard it, or who besides him hath beleewedit? Well, the wheele was brought, and upon it was the barbar stretched: meane while, and even as the poore wretch was hoifed thereupon, beholde there arrived and came to the citie, athofe who brought certaine newes in deed of the faid defeature, even they who made a shift to escape out of that infortunate field: then brake up the affembly, and every man departed and retired home to his owne house, for to bewaile his owne private losse and calamity, leaving the filly barbar lying along bound to the wheele, and racked out to the length, and there remained he untill it was very late in the evening, at what time he was let loofe; and no fooner was he at liberty, but he must needs enquire newes of the executioner, & namely; what they heard abroad of the Generall himselse Nicias, and in what fort he was slaine? So inexpugnable and incorrigible a vice is this, gotten by custome of much talke, that a man can not leave it, though he were going to the gallowes, nor keepe in those tidings which no man is willing to heare: for certes, like as they who have drunke bitter potions or unfavory medicines, can not away with the very o cups wherein they were; even fo, they that bring evill and heavie tidings, are ordinarily hated and deterted of those unto whom they report the same. And therefore Sophicles the Poet hath verie finely distinguished upon this point in these verses:

Messenger.

Isit your heart, or els your eare,

That this offends, which you do heare?

Creon.

And why do ft thou fearch my difeafe.

To know what griefe doth me diffleafe?

Messenger.

His deeds (1 see) offend your heart,

But my words cause your eares to smart. Well then, those who tell us any wofull newes be as odious as they who worke our wo; and yet for all that, there is no restreint and brideling of an untemperate tongue that is given to walke and overreach. It fortuned one day at Lacedamon, that the temple of Juno called there Chalciacos was robbed, and within it was found a certeine emptie flagon or stone bottle for wine: great running there was and concourfe of the people thither, and men could not tell what to make of that flagon: at last one of them that stood by; My masters (quoth he) if you will give me leave, I shall tell you what my conceit is of that flagon, for my minde gives me (faith he) that these church-robbers who projected to execute fo perilous an enterprife, had first drunke the juice of hemlockebefore they entred into the action, and afterwards brought wine with them in this bottle, to the end that if they were not furprifed nor taken in the maner, they might fave their lives by drinking each of them a good draught of meere wine; the nature and vertue whereof (as you know well enough) is to quench as it were and diffolve the vigour and strength of that poison, and so goe their waies safe enough, but if it chance that they were taken in the deed doing, then they might by meanes of that hemlocke which they had drunke die an eafie death, and without any great paine and torment, before that they were put to torture by the magistrate. He had no sooner delivered this speech, but the whole companie who heard his words, thought verily that such a contrived devise, and so deepe a reach as this never came from one that suspected such a matter, but rather knew that it was so indeed; whereupon they slocked o round about, and hemmed him in, and on everie fide each one had a faying unto him: And what art thou (quoth one?) From whence art thou faith another? Here comes one and asketh, who knew him? there fets upon him another, faying: And how commest thou by the light of all this that thou hast delivered? to be short, they handeled the matter so well, that they forced him to bewray himselfe in the end, and to confesse that he was one of them that committed the facriledge. Were northey also who murdered the Poët Ibyeus, discovered and taken after the fame manner? It hapned that the faid murderers were fet at a Theatre to behold the plaies and pastimes which were exhibited; and seeing a flight of Cranes over their heads, they whispered

one to another: Loe these be they that will revenge the death of Ibyeus. Now had not Ibyeus beene a long time before seene, and much search was made after him, because he was out of the way and miffed; whereupon they that fate next unto these men over-hearing those wordsof theirs, and well noting the speech, went directly to the Magistrates and Justices to give intelligence and information of their words. Then were they attached and examined; and thus being convicted, fuffered punishment in the end, not by the meanes of those Cranes that they talked of, but furely by their owne blab-tongues; as if some hellish furie had forced them to disclose that murder which they had committed. For like as in our bodies the members diseased and in paine, draw humours continually unto them, and all the corruption of the parts neere unto them flow thither; even fo, the tongue of a babling fellow, being never without an inflamma. tion and a feaverous pulse, draweth alwaies and gathereth to it one fecret and hidden thing or other. In which regard it ought to be well fented with a rampar, and the bulwarke of realon should evermore beset against it, which like unto a barre may stay and stop that overslowing and inconstant subricitie which it hath; that we be not more undiscreet and foolish beasts than geefe are, who when they be to take a flight into Cilicia over the mountaine Taurus, which is full of eagels, take up everie one in their bill a good big stone, which serveth them in stead of a locke or bridle to restraine their gagling; by which devise they may passe all night long without any noise, and not be heard at all or descried by the said eagles.

Now if one should demaund and aske of me, what person of all others is most mischievous and dangerous? I believe very well there is no man would name any other but a traitour. And, yet Euchyerates (as faith Demosthenes) for his treason covered his owne house with a rousemade of timber that he had out of Micedonie. Philocrates also lived richly and gallant of that great maffe of gold and filver, which he had of King Philip for betraying his countrey, and therewith furnished himselfe with brave harlots, gallant concubines, and daintie fishes. Euphor bisu also and Philagrus who betraied Eretria, were endowed by the King, with faire lands and possessions: but a pratter is a traitor voluntarie and for nothing, he demandeth no hire at all, neither low keth he to be folicited, but offereth himfelfe and his fervice; nor betraieth unto the enemies either horfes or walles, but revealeth hidden fecrets, and difclofeth speeches which are to be concealed, whether it bein justiciall matters of law or in feditious discords, or in managing of State affaires, it makes no matter, and no man conneth him thankes; nay he will thinke himfelfe beholden to others, if they will vouchfafe to give him audience. And therefore, that which is commonly faid to a prodigal person, who foolithly mis-spendeth and vainely wasteth his substance he cares not how, to gratifie every man: Thou art not liberal; this is no courtefie; a viceit is rather that thou art disposed unto thus to take pleasure in nothing, but giving and giving still. The fame rebuke and reprehension serveth verie fitly for a babler: Thou art no friend nor wellwiller of mine, thus to come and discover these things unto me; this is thy fault, and a disease which thou art ficke of that levelt to be clattering and halt no mind but of chatting.

Now would I have the Reader to thinke that I write not all this, so much to accuse and blame the vice and maladie of garrulitie, as to cure and heale the same. For by judgement and exercise we surmount and overcome the vices and passions of the minde; but judgement, that is to say, we knowledge, must go before: so no man accustometh himselse to void, and (as it were) to weed them out of the soule, unlessed he hate and detect them first. Now then, and never before, begin we to take an hatred to vices, when by the light of reason we consider and weigh the shame and soften that commeth unto us by them: as for example, we know and see that these great praters, whiles they defire to win love, gaine hatred; thinking to do a pleasure, they displease; looking to be well esteemed, are mocked and derided; they lay for sure; and get nothing; they hur their friends, aide their enemies, and undoe themselves.

So then, let this be the first receit and medicine for to cure this maladie; even the consideration and reckoning up of the shamefull infamies and painfull inconveniences that proceed and ensure thereof. The second remedy is, to take a survey of the contrary; that is to say, to heareal su waies, to remember and have ready at hand the praises and commendations of filence, the majestie (Isay) the mysticall gravitie and holinesse for faciturnitie, to represent alwaies unto our minde and understanding, how much more admired, how much more loved, and how sarre wifer they are reputed, who speake roundly at once, and in few words, their minde pithily; who in a short and compensions speech comprehend more good matter and substance a great deale, than these great talkers, whose tongues are unbrideled and run at randon. Those (I say) be they whom Platos to highly esteemeth, comparing them to skilfull and well practised Archers and

Datters, who have the feat of shooting arrowes and launcing darts; for they know how and when to speake graciously and bitterly, soundly, pithily and compactly. And verily, wise Lysurgus framed and exercised his citizens immedialy from their child-hood by keeping them downe at the first with silence to this short and sententious kinde of speech, whereby they spake alunios compendiously, and knit up much in a little. For like as they of Biskay or Celtiberia do make their steele of yron, by enterring it and letting it lie first within the ground, and then by putging and refining it from the groffe, terrene and earthly fubftance that it hath; even fothe Laconians speech hath no outward barke (as a man would fay) or crust upon it, but when all the superfluitie thereof is taken away, it is sleeled (as it were) and tempered, yea, and hath an edge upon it, fit for to worke withall and to pierce: and verily that apophthegmaticall and powerfull speech of theirs, that grace which they had to answere sententiously and with such gravity, together with a quicke and ready gift to meet at every turne with all objections, they attained unto by nothing els but by their much filence. Wherefore, it were very expedient to fee ever before the cies of these great praters, those short and witty speeches, that they may see what grace and gravity both, they have : as for example; The Lacedæmonians unto Philip, greeting: Dionyfus in Corinth. Also another time, when Philip had written unto them to this effect: If I enter once into the confines of Laconia, I wildestroy you utterly that you shal nevertise againe. They returned this answere againe in writing : Ales, that is, If. Likewise when King Demetrius in great displeasure and indignation, cried out aloud in these words: The Laced amonians have fent o unto me an embassador alone, and who bath no fellow; meaning that there came but one: the said embatfador nothing danted at his words, answered readily: One for one. Certes, they that used to fpeake thort and fententioully, were highly efteemed long ago with our ancients & forefathers. And hereupon it was that the AmphyEtiones, that is to fay, the Deputies or States for the generall counfell of all Greese, gave order, that there should be written over the doore of the Temple of Apollo Pythina, not the Odylee or Ilias of Homer; ne yet the Canticles or Parans of Pindarus; but these briefe sentences: Ivali ourter, that is, Know thy selfe. Music ayar, that is, Too much of nothing, also Eyvia, ween or and that is, Be suretie and make account to pay: so highly esteemed they a plaine, simple and round manner of speaking, which comprised in few words much matter, and a fentence maffie and found: and no marvell, for Apollo himfelfe loveth bre-, vitic, and is in his oracles verie fuccinct and pithy; wherefore els is he furnamed Loxias? but because he chooseth rather to avoide pluralitie than obscuritie of words. They also who without word uttered at all, fignifie the conceptions of their minde by certaine fymbolicall devifes, and after that maner deliver good leffons unto us; are they not fundrie waies commended and admired exceedingly? Thus Heraclitus in times past, being requested by his neighbours and fellow-citizens, to make a fententious speech unto them, and deliver his opinion as touching civil unitie and concord, mounted up into the pulpit, and taking a cup of cold water in his hand, befpiced it (as it were) with some meale, and with a sprig or two of the herbe Penniroyall, shooke all together: which done, he dranke it off, and fo came downe and went his way: giving them by this demonstration, thus much to understand; that if men would take up with a little and be o content with things at hand, without defiring coftly fuperfluities, it were the next way to keepe and preferve cities in peace and concord.

Seylurus a King of the Scythians left behind him fourfcore fonnes; and when the houre of his death drewneere, he called for a bundle of darts or a sheafe of arrowes to be brought unto him, which he put into his childrens hands one after another, and willed each one to breake and burst the same in pieces, bound as it was entire and whole together: which when they had affaied to do, and putting all their ftrength unto it, could not, but gave over: himfelfe tooke out of the sheafe or knitch the darts aforelaid one by one, and knapt them in twaine fingle as they were with facilitie: declaring by this devise, that so long as they held together, their union and agreement would be strong and invincible; but their discord and distunion would make them e feeble, and be an occasion that they should not long continue. He then, that continually shall have these & such like precedents in his mouth, and ordinarily repeat and remember the same, will peradventure take no great pleasure and delight in idle and superfluous words. For mine owne part, furely I am abashed mightily at the example of that domesticall servant at Rome, when I consider with my selfe what a great matter it is to be well advised before a man speaketh, and constantly to hold and maintaine the resolution of any purpose. Publius Piso the great Orator and Rhetorician, because he would provide that his people and servitours about him fhould not trouble his head with much prattle, gave order and commaundement unto them, that they should make answere unto his demaunds onely, and no more: now being minded one day to entertaine Cloding the chiefe ruler of the city at his house, he bad him to supper, and caused him to be sent for and called at the time accordingly; for a stately and royall seatthe had provided, by all likelihood, and as any man would thinke no leffe: now when supper time was come, the rest of the invited guests now present, Clodius onely they staied and looked for meane while, Pife had fent out oftentimes unto him one of his fervitours who was woont ordin narily to bid his guests for to see whether he were coming, or would come to supper or no? but when it grew late in the evening, to that there was no hope now that hee would be there: Now firrha (quoth Pifo to his man aforefaid) didft thou not invite and bid him? Yes iwis Sir: Why then comes he not: faid the mafter againe? Forfooth (quoth he) because he denied to come; And why toldest thou not me this immediately? Because sir, you never asked me the question. Well this was a Romane feruitor; but an Athenian fervant I trow whiles he is digging and del ving, will tell his mafter newes, and namely, what be the articles and capitulations, in the treaty and composition of peace. So powerfull and forcible is use and custome in all things, whereof I purpose now to treat; for that there is no bit nor bridle that is able to represse, tame, and keepe in a talkative tongue, but it is custome that must do the deed and conquer this maladie.

First and formost therefore, when in companie there shall be any question propounded by them that are about thee, frame and use thy selfe to hold thy tongue and be filent, untill thouse that everie man else resuleth to speake and make answere: for according to Sophoeles.

To counsell and to runne a course in race

Have not both twaine one end to hafte apace.

No more verily doeth a voice and an answere shoot at the same marke that running aimeth at: for there, to wir, in a race, he winneth the prize that getteth to be formost; but heere, if another man have delivered a fufficient answere, it will be well enough, by praising and appropring his fpeech, to gaine the opinion and reputation of a courteous person; if not, then will it not be thought impertinent, neither can envie or hatred come of it, in case a man do gently thew and open that wherein the other was ignorant, and so after a milde and civill maner supply the defect of the former answer: but above all, this regard would be had: That when a question or demand is addressed and directed unto another, we take it not upon our selves; and so anticipate and prevent his answer; and peradventure, neither in this nor in any thing els, is it decent and commendable to offer and put forth our selves too forward before we be required; and in this case, when another man is asked a question, our owne intrusion, with the putting by of him is not feemely; for we may be thought (in fo doing) both to injurie and discredit the party demanded, as if hee were not able to performe that which was put upon him, and also to reproch the demandant, as though hee had little skill and differentian, to aske a thing of him who could not give the fame : and that which more is, fuch malapert boldnesse and heady have flinesse in rath answering, importeth (most of all) exceeding arrogancie and presumption; for it feemeth, that hee who taketh the answere out of his mouth of whom the question is demanded, would fay thus much in effect: What need have wee of him? what can be fay unto it? what skill or knowledge hath hee? when I am in place, no man ought to aske any o- # ther of these matters, but my selfe only. And yet many times we propose questions unto some, not of any great defire that we have to heare their answeres, but onely because we would finde talke, and minister occasion of discourse, seeking thereby to draw from them some words that may yeeld matter of mirth and pleafant conference : after which fort, Socrates used to provoke Theatetus and Charmides. To prevent therefore the answere of another, to turne away mens cares, to divert their eies, and draw their cogitations from him to our felves, is as much as if we should run before and make hafte to kiffe one first, who was minded to be kiffed of another, or to enforce him to looke upon us, whose eies were set and fixed upon another; considering, that although the partie unto whom the demand was made, be either not able nor willing to make answer, it were befitting for a man, after some little pause made, to present himself in all modelly st and reverence, & then to frame & accommodate his speech as nere unto that as may be, which he thinketh will content the minde of him that made the demand, and so answere (as it were) in the name of the other: for if they who are demanded a question, make no good & sufficient anfwer, great reason they have to be pardoned and held excused; but he who intrudeth himselfe, & taking the words out of anothers mouth, is ready to speak before he be spoken unto, by good right is odious, although he answer otherwise sufficiently; but if he faile, and make no good anfwere, certes he maketh himfelfe, ridiculous, and a very laughing stocke to the whole company.

The second point of exercise and meditation, is in a mans owne particular answeres, wherein he ought of pecially to be carefull and take heed who is given to over-much talke, to the end that they who would provoke him to fpeake, and all to make themselves merry and to laugh at him, may well know that he answereth nor he knowes not what inconfiderately, but with good advice and ferioufly to the point for fuch there be in the world, who for no need at all, but only for to paffe time in mirth, devife certeine questions for the nonce, and in that maner propound them to fuch persons for no other end, but to provoke them to prattle; and therefore they ought to have a good eie and regard before them, not to leape out and runne all on a fudden haffilly to their answere, as if they were well pleased and beholden unto them for to have such an occasion offpeech; but with mature deliberation to confider the nature and behaviour of him that putteth out the question, together with the necessitie thereof, and the profit that may ensue thereby; and if it appeare indeed, that the partie be in good earnest, and desirous to learne and be infiructed, then he must accustome himselfe to represse his tongue and take some pause, allowing a competent space of time betweene the demand and the answere; during which silence, both the demander may have while to bethinke himfelfe and adde fornewhat thereto, if he lift, and alto the demandé time to thinke of an answere, and not let his tongue runne before his wit, and so huddle up a confused answere before the question be fully propounded : for often-times it falleth out, that for very hafte they take no heed of those things which were demanded, but answere kim kam, and one thing for another. True it is (I must needs say) that Pythia the prictiresse of o Apolloes temple, is woont to give answere by oracle at the same instant that the question is demanded, yea, and often-times before it be asked; for why ? the god whom the ferveth

but among men, he that would wifely and to the purpote answere, ought to stay until he conceive the thought, and fully understand the intent of him that proposeth a question, less that befall unto him which is said in the common proverbe:

> About an hooke I question made, And they gave answere of a spade.

and otherwife allo, if that incovenience were not, yet are we to bridle this lavish & hastie tongue to of ours, and restraine the inordinate and hungry appetite which we have to be talking; lest it be thought that we had a fluxe (as it were) of humours gathered a long time about the tongue, and growen into an impostume, which wee are very well content should be let our, and have if sue made by a question tendered unto us, and so by that meanes be discharged thereof. Secrates was woont in this maner to restraine and repressed his hirst, after that shad enchased his body and sethimselse into an heat, either by wrestling, or running, or such like exercises; he would not permit himselse to drinke before he had powed out the first bucket of water that he had drawen out of the pit or well, acquainting this his sensual appetite to attend the fit and convenient time that reason appointed.

Moreover, this would be noted, that there be three kinds of answeres unto interrogations; o the first necessarie, the second civill, and the third needlesse and superstuous: as for example : If one should aske whether Socrates be within or no; he that is unwilling or not ready and forward with his tongue, would make answere and fay: He is not within, but if he be disposed to laconize a little, and speake more briefe, he would leave out the word (within) and say: He is not; or yet more thort than fo, pronouncing onely the negative Adverbe, and faying no more but No. Thus the Lacedæmonians dealt once by Philip; for when he had dispatched his letters unto the to this effect; To know whether they would receive him into their city or no : they wrote backe againe, in faire great capitall letters, within a sheet of paper, no more but OY, that is to say, No: & fo fent it unto him: but he that would make answer to the former question of Socrates a little more civilly and courteoully, would fay thus: He is not within fir for he is gone to the banke or exchange; & to give yet a formwhat better ineafure, he might perhaps adde moreover & fay; He looketh there for certeine strangers and friends of his. But a vaine prating fellow, and one that loves many words, especially it his hap hath beene to read the booke of Antimachin the Colophonian, wil make answer to the demand aforesaid in this wise: He is not within fir, gone he is to the Burfe or Exchange, for there he expecteth certeine strangers out of Ionia, of whom and in whose behalfe Aleibiades wrote unto him, who now maketh his abode within the citie of Milefm, lojourneth with Tiffaphernes, one of the lieutenants generall of the great King of Persia; who before time was in league with the Lacedamonians, stood their friend, and fent them aid $ ther as to me

Aleibrades being desirous to returne into his ownecountry, hath prevailed so much that hee hath altered Tiffaphernes his minde, and drawen him away from our part: and thus shall you have him rehearle in good earnest the whole eight booke (in maner) of Thueydides his story, un. till he have overwhelmed a man with a multitude of narrations, and made him beleeve that in Miletus there is some great sedition; that it is ready to be lost, and Alcibiades to be banished a second time. Herein then ought a man principally to set his soote and stay his overmuch language, fo as the center and circumference of the answer be that, which he who maketh the demaund defireth and hath need to know. Carneades before he had any great name, disputed one day in the publike schooles and place appointed for exercise: Unto whom the master of m prefident of the place fent before hand, and gave him warning to moderate his voice (for hee fpake naturally exceeding big and loud, fo as the schooles rung againe therewith:) Give men then (quoth he) a gage and measure for my voice; upon whom the said master replied thus not unproperly: Let him that disputeth with thee be the measure and rule to moderate thy voice by; even so a man may in this case say: The measure that hee ought to keepe who answereth is the very will and minde of him that proposeth the question. Moreover, like as Socrates forbad those meats which drew men on to eate when they are not hungry; and likewise those drinkes which caused them to drinke who are not a thirst, even so should a man who is given to much prattle, beafraid of those discourses wherein he delighteth most, and which he is woont to use and take greatest pleasure in; and in case hee perceive them to run willingly upon him for to n withit and the fame, and not give them interteinment. As for example, marrial men and warriours love to discourse and tell of battels; which is the reason that the Poët Homer bringeth in * Nestor effloores recounting his owne proweffe and feats of armes: and ordinarie it is with the who in indiciall trials have had the upper hand of their adversaries, or who beyond the hope and opinion of everie man have obtained grace and favour with kings and princes, to be subject unto this maladie that evermore followeth them, namely to report and recount effloores the maner how they came in place; after what fort they were brought in; the order of their pleading; how they argued the case; how they convinced their accusers, & overthrew their adversaries; last of all, how they were praised and commended: for to say a truth, joy and mirth is much more talkative than that olde Agryppina which the Poets doe feigne and devise in their comz-3 dies: for it roufeth and flirreth up, it reneweth and refresheth it selfe ever & anon, with many dif courses and narrations; whereupon ready they are to fall into such speeches upon every light and colourable occasion: for not onely is it true which the common proverbe faith:

Looke where a man dosh feele his paineand griefe,

His hand will soone be there to yeeld reliefe.

but also joy and contentment draweth unto it the voice, it leadeth the tongue alwaies about with it, and is evermore willing to be remembred and related. Thus we see that amorous lows passe the greater part of their time in rehearling certeine words which may renew the remembrance of their loves, insomuch that if they cannot meet with one person or other to relate the same unto, they will devise and talke of them with such things as have neither sense nor life: like a sweread of one who brake soorth into these words:

O dainty bed, most fiveet and pleafant couch, ô bleffed lamp, ô happie candle light, No leffe than God doth Bacchus you avouch nay, God you are the might lest in her fight.

And verily a buffe prater is altogether (as one would fay) a white line or ftrake in regard of all words, to wit, without discretion he speaketh indifferently of all matters; howbeit if he be affected more to some than to others, he ought to take heed thereof, and absteine from them; he is say to withdraw and writhe him els from thence; for that by reason of the contentment which he may therein take, and the pleasure that he receiveth thereby, they may lead him wide & carie him every while very farre out of the way: the same inclination to overshoot themselves in prating, they sinde also when they discourse of those matters wherein they suppose themselves to have better experience, and a more excellent habit than others: such an one I say being a selfet lover and ambitious withall,

Most part of all the day in this doth spend, Himselfe to passe, and others to transcend.

As for example in histories if he hath read much , in artificiall stile and couching of his words, hethatisa Grammarian; in relation of strange reports and newes, who hath bene a great traveller and wandred through many forren countries: hereof therefore great heed would bee taken; for garrulitie being therein fleshed and baited, willingly runneth to the old and usuall haunt, like as every beaft feeketh out the ordinary and accustomed pasture. And in this point was the young prince Cyrus of a woonderfull and excellent nature, who would never chalenge his playfellowes and conforts in age unto any exercise wherein he knew himselse to be superior, and to furpaffe, but alwaies to fuch feats wherein he was leffe practifed than they; which he did afwell because he would not grieve their hearts in winning the prize from them, as also for that he would profit thereby, and learne to doe that wherein hee was more raw and unready than they. But a talkative fellow contrariwife, if there be a matter proposed whereby he may heare and learne somewhat that he knew not before, rejecteth and refuseth it; he cannot for his life hold histongue and keepe filence a little while, to gaine thereby fome hire and reward, but cafting and rolling his thought round about, he never rests untill he light upon some old ragged rapsodies and overworne discourses, which hee hath patched and tacked together a thousand times. Such a one there was among us, who hapned by chance to have perufed two or three bookes of Ephorus; whereby he tooke himselfe to be so great a clearke and so well read, that he wearied everie mans cares who heard him talke; there was no affembly nor feaft unto which he came. but he would force the companie to atife and depart with his unmeasurable prating of the battel of Leuttres, and the occurrents that enfued therupon, infomuch as he got himself a by-name, and everie man called him Epaminondas. But this is the least inconvenience of all others that followeth this infirmitie of much babling: and furely one good meanes it is to the cure thereof; To turne the fame from other matters to fuch as thefe: for thereby shall their tongue be leffe troublesome and offensive, when it passeth the bonds in the tearmes onely of litterature.

Over and befides, for the remedie of this their dileale, they shall do well to inure and accustome themselves to write somewhat, and to dispute of questions apart. Thus did Antipater the Stoick, who as it may be thought, being not able nor willing to hold out in diffrutation hand to hand with Carneades, who with a violent streame (as it were) of his forcible wit and eloquence refused the sect of the Stoicks, answered the said Carneades by writing, and filled whole bookes with contradictorie affertions and arguments against him; infomuch as thereupon he was furnamed Calamoboas, which is as much to fay, as the luftie Crier with his pen: and fo by all likelihood this manner of fighting with a shadow and lowd exclaiming in secret, and apart by themfelves, training these stout praters everie day by little and little from the frequencie and multitude of people, may make them in the end more fociable and fitter for companie. Thus curft curres after they have fpent and discharged their choler and anger upon the cudgels or stones which have beene throwen at them, become thereby more gentle and tractable to men. But above all, it were verie expedient and profitable for them to be alwaies neere unto personages for yeeres elder, and in authoritie greater than themselves, and with those to converse; for the reverent regard and feare that they have in respect of their dignitic and gravitie, may induce and direct them in time and by custome to keepe filence; and evermore among those exercises heretofore by us specified, this advisement would be mingled and interlaced; That when we are about to speake, and that words be readie to runne out of our mouth, we say thus unto our selves by way of reasoning: What manner of speech is this that is so urgent and presset so hard to be gone? What ailes my tongue, that it is fo willing to be walking? What good may come by the utterance thereof? What harme may enfue by concealing it in and holding my peace? For we must not thinke that our words be like an heavy burden over-loading us, and whereof we should thinke our selves well eased when we are discharged of them: for speech remaineth still as well when it is uttered as before: but men ought to speake, either in the behalfe of themselves when they stand in need of some thing, or to benefit others, or else to pleasure and recreat one another by pleafant devifes and discourses, (as it were) with falt to mittigate the painefull travels in actions and worldly affaires, or rather to make the fame more favorie whiles we are employed therein. Now if a speech be neither profitable to him that delivereth it, nor necessarie for him that hearethit, ne yet carrie therewith any grace or pleasure; what need is there that it should beuttered? For furely, a man may as foone speake aword in vaine, as do a thing to no purpose. But above and after all other good advertisements in this case, we ought alwaies to have in readinesse and remembrance this wife faying of Simonides: A man (quoth he) may repent many a time for words spoken, but never for a word kept in : this also we must thinke: That exercise is all in all, and a matter of that moment and efficacie, that it is able to master and conquer everie thing: confidering that men will take great paines and be carefull; yea they will endure much forrow for to be rid of an old cough; to chase away the troublesome yex or hicket. Besides, Taciturnitie hath not onely this one faire propertie and good vertue, that (as Hippoerases faith) It never breedeth thirst; but also that it engendreth no paine, no griefe nor displeasure, neither is any man bound to render an account thereof.

AVARICE COVETOUSNES.

The Summarie.

F there be any excessein the world that troubleth the repose and tranquillitie of then F there be any except in the word of miferable it is Avarice; against which the sa ges and wife men of all ages from time to time have framed frarpe and terrible inves. tives, which in sum and effect doe frew thus much; That this covetousnes and greedie desire of gathering goods is (as it were) the capitall cure and seat-towne of all wicked nes; the verie sinke of sinne and receptacle of all vices. Now albeit all men with one voice, yea and the most covetous persons of all others do confesse as much; yet the heart of man is so affectionate a friend to the earth, that needfull it is to propole and set downe divers instructions for to avert the same from thence, and to cause it to range & sort with other occupations and affaires, more beseeming it selfe than is the over curious fearching after transitorie & corruptible things. This is the reason, that those Philosophers who have handled the doctrine as touching manners are emploied herein: and Plutaich among the rest, who teacher has here in few words, with what considerations we ought to be furnished & fortified that we do not permit such a pestilent plague as this to seaze upon our souls: and therewith he sheweth the miseries that befall unto avarice; whereof this is the first oprincipal; That in steads giving contentment, it makes h her flave most wretched, and putteth him to the greatest patne and to ture in the world. And hereupon he interlaceth and insertes ha discription of three forts of covetom persons. First, of those who cover things rare and dangerous, whereas they should seeke after necessar ries. Secondly of such as spend nothing have much, and yet desire more and more; and these he depairteth in all their colours. Thirdly, of them that be niggards and base minded pinch-pennies. Which done, he discovereth the second miserie of covetous wretches, to wit; That avarice doth tyrannize over her cairife and flave, not suffring him to use that which she commaunded him to winne and get. The third is thus, That is causeth him to gather and heape up riches, for some promoter or catch-poll, or else for a Tyrant, or else for some wicked and gracelesse heire, whose nature and properties hee doethrepresent and describe verie lively. Afterwards having concluded that covetous persons are herein especially miserable; for that the one sort of them use not their goods at all, and other abuse the same: he prescribeth three remedies against this mischievous maladie. The first; That those who greed ly gape after riches, have no more in effect than they who stand contented with that which is necessarie for nature. The second; That we are not to count them happy, who be richly furnished with things unprofitable. And the last, That it is vertue, wherein we ought to ground and fecke for contentment; for there it uso be found and not in riches.

AVARICEOR Covetousnesse.

Ippomaches, a great mafter of wrestling & such exercises of the bodie, hearing some to praise a certeine tall man, high of statute, and having long armes and handes, commending him for a fingular champion, and fit to fight at buffets: A proper fellow hee were (quoth he) if the garland or prize of the victory were hung on high, for to be reached with the hand; femblably it may be faid unto them who effecte fo highly and repute it a great felicitie to be poffeffed of much faire lands, to have many great and stately houses, to be furnished with mighty masses and summes of money, in case felicity were to be bought and folde for coine. And yet a man shall see many in the world, chuse rather to be rich and wretched withall, than to give their filver for to be happy and bleffed: but furely it is not filver nor golde that can purchase either repose of spirit void of griefe and anguish, or magnanimity, ne yet fetled constancic and resolution, confidence and fuffifance, or contenument with our owneestate. Be a man never so rich, he can not skill thereby to contemme riches, no more than the possession of more than enough worketh this in us; That we want not fliff, and defire even things that be superfluous. What other evill and maladie then doeth our wealth and riches rid us from, if it delivereth us not from avarice? By drinke men quench their thirst; by meat they flake their hunger. And he that faid:

Give Hipponax a cloike to keepe him warme,

For volde extreame I shake, and may take harme.

if there were many clothes hung or call upon him, would be offended therewith and fling them from him; but this their strong defire and love of money, it is neither filver nor gold that is able to grench; and let a man have never formuch, yet he covereth nevertheleffe to have more still. And well it may be verified of riches which one faid fometime to an ignorant and deceitfull Phytician:

> Your drugs and falves augment my fore. They make me ficker than before.

For riches verily, after that men have once met therewith, (wheras before they flood in need of bread, of a competent house to put in their heads, of meane comment and any viands that come next hand) fill them now with an impatient defire of golde, filver, ivory, emerands, horses and hounds, changing and transporting their natural appetite of things needfull and necessarie, into a disfordinate lust to things dangerous, rare, hard to be gotten, and unprofitable when they be had. For never is any man poore in regard of fuch things as fuffice nature; never docth he take up money upon uturie, for to buy himfelfe meat, cheefe, bread or olives; but one indebteth himfelfe for to build a fumptuous and stately house; another runnes in debt, because he would purchase a grove of olive trees that joineth to his ownel and; one is engaged deeply in the usurers books, by laying corne-grounds and wheat-fields to his owne demaines, another, because he would be possessed of fruitfull vineyards; some are endebted with buying mules of Galaria, and others, because they would be masters have call themselves into the bottom leffe gulfe of obligations, conditions, covenants, interests, flatutes, reall gages & pawnes: and afterwards it commeth to passe, that like as they who drinke when they be not drie; & eat without a stomacke, many times cast up by vomit, even that which they did cat & drinke when they were hungry & thirfty; even fo, when they will needs have fuch things as be superfluous and to no use, doe not enjoy the benefit of those things that are needfull and necessarie indeed. Lo what kinde of people these be!

Asfor those who are at no cost, nor will lay out any thing, and not with standing they have much, yet ever cover more; a man may rather marvell and woonder at them, if he would but remember that which Arifippus was woont to fay: He that eateth much (quoth he) and drinketh likewise much, and is never satisfied nor full, goeth to the Physicians, asketh their opinion what his disease and strange indisposition of the body might be, and withall craveth their countil for the cure and remedie thereof: but if one who hath five faire bedfleds already with the furniture thereto belonging, and feeketh to make them ten; and having ten tables with their cup. boords of plate, will needs buy ten more; and for all that he is possessed of faire manours and goodly lands, have his bags and coffers full of money, is never the better fatisfied, but it ill ga porth after more, breaketh his fleeps, devising and calting as he lieth awake, how to compaffe the fame, and when he hathall, yet is he not full; fuch an one (I fay) never thinks that he hath need of a Phylician to cure his maladie or to discourse unto him, from what cause all this doth pro. deed. And verily a man may looke, that of those who are thirsty ordinatily, and he that hath. not drunke, will be delivered of his thirst fo foone as he meeteth with drinke; but in case such an one as evermore drinketh and powreth in still, never giving over, yet neverthelesse continueth drie and thirstie, we judge him to have no need of repletion, but rather of purging and evacuation; him (I say) we appoint for to vomit, as being not troubled and distempered upon any want, but with some extraordinary heat or unkinde acrimonies of humours that be within him; even fo it is with those that seeke to get and gather goods : he that is bare and poore in deed, will haply give over feeking fo foone as he hath got him an house to dwell in, or found sometres fure, or met with a good friend to helpe him to a fumme of money to make cleere with the nin rer, and to be croffed out of his booke: but he that hath already more than enough and fuffici ent, and yet craveth more, furely it is neither golde nor filver that will cure him, neither hor in fes, nor theepe, nor yet beeves will ferve his turne; need had he of purgation and evacuation. for povertie is not his difease, but coverous nesse and an unsatiable desire of riches, proceeding from falle judgement and a corrupt opinion that he hath, which if a man do not rid away out of his mind, as a winding gulfe or whitle-poole that is croffe and overthwart in their way, they will never cease to hunt after superfluities, and seeme to stand in need thereof (that is to say) too vet those things which they know not what to doe with. When a Physitian commeth into the chamber of a patient, whom he findeth lying along in his bed groaning, and refuling all foods, he taketh him by the hand, feeleth his pulle, asketh him certaine questions, and finding thathe hathno ague; This is a difeafe (quothhe) of the minde, and fo goeth his way; even to, when we see a worldly minded man altogether set upon his gets and gaines, pining away, and even a confumed with the greedie worme of gathering good, weeping, whining and fighing at expenfes, and when any money is to goe out of his purse, sticking at no paine and trouble, sparing for no indignitie, no unhonest and indirect meanes whatsoever, nor caring which way he gots to worke, whether it bee by hooke or crooke, fo that hee may gaine and profit thereby; having choise of houses and tenements, lands lying in everie countrey, droves, heards and flockes of cattell, a number of flaves, wardrobes of apparell and clothes of all forts: what shall we say that this man is ficke of unlesse it be the poverty of the fouler. As for want of money and good, one friend (as Menander faith) may cure and helpe with his bountifull hand; but that penunt and needinesse of the soule all the men in the world, that either live at this day, or ever wereby foretime, are not able to fatisfie and fuffice: and therefore of fuch Solon faid verie well,

No limit set, nor certaine bound, men have Of their de sire to goods, but still they crave.

For, those who are wise and of sound judgement are content with that measure and portion which nature hath set downe and affigned for them; such men know an ende, and keepethemselves within the center and circumference of their need and necessitie onely. But this is a peculiar propertie that avarice hath by it selfe. For a covetous desire it is, even repugnant to satisfy and hindereth it selfe that it never can have sufficient, whereas all other desires and sulfs at aiding and helpfull thereto. For no man (I trow) that is a glutton, sorbeareth to eate a good morcel of meat for gourmandise, nor drunkard abstaineth from drinking wine upon an appetit and love that he hath to wine, as these covetous wretches do, who spare their money and wind touch it, through a desire onely that they have of money. And how can we otherwise thinke, but it were a pitcous and lamentable case, yea and a disease next cousin to meeter mandesses, it is a man should therefore spare the wearing of a garment, because he is readie to chill and quake for cold, or forbeare to touch bread, for that he is almost hunger-staved; and even so not to handle his goods because he loveth them: certes, such a one is in the same plight and piteous perplexitie that Thrasonides was, who in a certaine comedie describeth his owne miseries:

At home it is within my power,

I may enjoy it everse hower: I wish a thing as if I were In raging love, yet I forbere: When I have lockt and feald up all Or else put foorth by count and tale My come to brokers for the ufe, Or other factours whom I chuse, I plod and plonder still for more, I bunt, I feeke to fetch in store, I chide and branle with fervants mine, The busbandman and eke the hine I bring to count; and then anon My debters all Icall upon: By Dan Apollo now I sweare, Was any man that earth did beare, Whom thou hast ever knowen or feene, In love more wretched to have beene?

sophocles being on a time demainded familiarly by one of his friends, whether he could yeak expecion panie with a woman if need were: Godbleffe me (quoth he) my good friend, talke 20 no more of that I pray you, I am free from those matters long since, and by the benefit of mine olde age, I have escaped the servitude of such violent and sursous mistress. And verily it is a good and gracious gift, that our lusts and appetites should end together with our strength and abilitie, especially in those delights and pleasures, which as Alexas saith neither man nor woman can well avoide. But this is not to be sound in avarice and desire of riches; for shee like a cust, sharpe and strewd queane, sorceth indeed a man to get and gather, but she forbiddeth him withall to sle and enjoy the same; shee stirreth up and provoketh his lust, but shee denieth him all pleasure. I remember that in old time Stratonicus taxed and mocked the Rhodians for their wastfull and superstuous expences in this manner: They build sumptuously (quoth he) as it they were immortall and should never die; but they fare at their boords as though they had but a so small while to liue. But these covectous misers gather wealth together like mightie magnificoes, but they spend like beggerly mechanicals; they endure the paine and travell of getting, and taste no pleasure of the enjoying.

Demades the Orator came one day to vifite Photion, and found him at dinner; but feeing but alittle meat before him upon the table, and the fame nothing fine and daintie, but course and fimple: I marvell (quoth he) ô Phoeion how you can take up with fo short a dinner and so small apittance, confidering the paines you doe endure in mannaging the affaires of State and common-wealth. As for Demades he dealt indeed with government, and was a great man in the city with the people, but it was all for his bellie, and to furnish a plentifull boord, insomuch as, suppoling that the citie of Athens could not yeeld him revenew and provision sufficient for to 40 maintaine his excessive gourmandise, he laid for cates and victuals out of Macedon, whereupon Antipater when he faw him an old man with a wrinkled and withered face, faid pleafantly: That he had nothing left now but his paunch and his tongue, much like unto a freepe, or fome other beast killed for facrifice when all is eaten besides. But thou most unhappie and wretched miser, who would not make a woonder at thee, condering that thou canst lead so base and beggerly a life, without focietie of men or courtefie to thy neighbors, not giving ought to any person, shewing no kindnesset to the friends, no bountie nor magnificence to the common-wealth, yet ftilldoftafflict thy poore (elfe, lie awake all the night long, to ile and moile like a drudge and hireling thy selfe, hire other labourers for day-wages, lie in the winde for inheritances, speake men faire in hope to be their heire, and debase thy selfe to all the world, and care not to whom so thousap and knee for gaine, having Ifay fo fufficient meanes otherwise to live at ease (to wit, thy niggardife and pinching parfimonie) whereby thou maift be dispensed for doing just nothing. It is reported of a certaine Bizantine, who finding an adulterer in bed with his wife, who though the were but foule, yet was ilfavoured enough, faid unto him: O miferable caitife what necellitic hath driven thee thus to doe? what needes Sapragoras dowrie? well, goe to: thou takeft great painespoore wretch, thou filleft and flirreft the lead, thou kindleft the fire also underneath it. Necessarie it is in some fort, that Kings and Princes should seeke for wealth and riches, that these Governours also and Deputies muder them should bee great gatheres, yea and those also who reach at the highest places and aspire to rule and soveraigne dignities in great States and cities; all these (I say) have need perforce to heape up große summes of money, to the end that for their ambition, their proud port, pompe, and vaine-glorious humour, they might make sumptious seasts, give largesses, reteine a guard about their persons, send present abroad to other States, mainteine and wage whole armies, buie flaves to combat and fight at shrape to the outtrance: but thou makest thy selfe so much adoo, thou troublest and tomented both body and minde, living like an oister or a shell-snaile, and for to pinch and spare, art content to undergo and indure all paine and travell, taking no pleasure nor delight in the world ast terwards, no more than the Baine-keepers poore asse which earying billots and fagots of die brush and sticks to kindle sire and to heat the souphes, is evermore full of smoake, soot, asses, and sinders; but hath no benefit at all of the bane, and is never bathed, was med, under solve and made cleane. Thus much I speake in reproch and distaine of this miserable asses like avarice, this base raping and scraping together in maner of ants or pismires.

Now there is another kind of covetous nesses more savage and beast-like, which they professe who backbite and flander, raife malicious imputations, forge falle wils and teltaments, lie in wait for heritages, engge and coufen, and intermeddle in all matters, will bee feene in everie thing, know all mens states, busie themselves with many cares and troubles, count upon their fingers how many friends they have yet living, and when they have all done, receive no fruition or benefit by all the goods which they have gotten together from all parts, with their cunning calls & fubril flifts. And therefore like as we have in greater hatted and detellation, vipers, the av venemous flies Cantharides, and the flinging spiders called Philangia & Tarantale, than either beares or lions, for that they kill folke and ftinge them to death; but receive no good or benefit at all by them when they are dead; even so be these wretches more odious and woorthy to be hated of us, who by their miferable parfimonie and pinching doe mifchiefe, than those who by their riot and waltfulneffe be hurtfull to a common-weale, because they take and catch from others that which they themselves neither will nor know how to use. Whereupon it is that such as these when they have gotten abundance, and are in maner full, rest them for a while, and doe no more violence as it were in time of truce and furcease of hostilitie; much after the maner as Demostheres faid unto them who thought that Demades had given over all his lewdnesse and knavery : O (quoth he) you fee him nowfull as lions are, who when they have filled their bel 30 lies, prey no more for the lice, untill they be hungrie againe: but such covetous wretches as be imploied in government of civill affaires, and that for no profit nor pleafare at all which they intend, those I say never rest nor make holiday, they allow themselves no truce nor cessation from gathering & heaping more together still, as being evermore emptie, & have alwaies need of al things though they have all. But fome man perhaps will fay: These men (I assure you) do save& lay up goods in flore for their children and heires after their death, unto whom whiles they live they will part with nothing: If that be so, I can compare them very well to those mice and cats in gold mines, which feed upon the gold-ore, and licke up all the golden fand that the mines yeeld, so that men can not come by the golde there, before they be dead and cut up in maner of anatomics. But tell me(I pray you) wherefore are thefe fo willing to treasure up so much mo-40 ney, and fo great substance, and leave the same to their children, inheritours, and successors after them ? I verily believe to this end, that those children and heires also of theirs should keepe the fame still for others likewife, and so to passe from hand to hand by descent of many degrees; like as earthen conduct-pipes by which water is conveied into some cesterne, withhold and reteine none of all the water that passeth through them, but doe transmit and send all away. from them, ech one to that which is next, and referve none to themselves; thus doe they until fome arise from without, a meere stranger to the house, one that is a sycophant or very tyrant, who thall cut off this keeper of that great stocke and treasure, and when he hath dispatched and made a hand of him, drive and turne the course of all this wealth and riches out of the usuall chanell another way; or at leastwife untill it fall into the hands (as commonly men say it doth) of 50 the most wicked and ungracious imp of that race, who wil disperse and scatter that which others have gathered, who will confume and devour all unthriftily, which his predeceffors have gotten and spared wickedly : for not onely as Euripides faith, but also covetous carles & pinching peni-fathers, leave children behind the that be loofe & rietous & spend-thrifts; like as Diegenes by way of mockery said upon a time: That it were better to beaMegarians ram than his fonne: for wherein they would feeme to instruct and informe their children, they spoile and mar them cleane, ingrafting into their hearts a defire and love of mo-Bey, teaching them to be covetous and base minded pinch-penies, laying the foundation (as it were) in their heires of fome ftrong place or fort, wherein they may furely guard and keepe their inheritance. And what good leftons and precepts be these which they teach them: Gaine and spare, my sonne, get and save; thinke with thy selfe and make thine account that thou shalt be effeemed in the world according to thy wealth and not otherwife. But furely this not to infruct achilde, but rather to knit up fast or fow up the mouth of a purse that it may hold and keepe the better whatfoever is put into it. This onely is the difference that a purfe or moneybag becommeth foule, fullied and ill-favoring after that filver is put into it; but the children of coverous persons before they receive their patrimonies or atteine to any riches, are filled alreadie even by their fathers with avarice, and a hungrie defire after their substance : and verily fuch children thus nourtred, reward their parents againe for their schooling with a condigne salarie and recompense, in that they love them not because they shall receive much one day by them, but hate them rather for that they have nothing from them in present possession alreadie, for having learned this lefton of them; To esteeme nothing in the world in comparison of wealth and riches, and to aime at nought els in the whole course of their life, but to gather a deale of goods together, they repute the lives of their parents to be a blocke in their way, they with in heart that their heads were well laid, they do what they can to shorten their lives, making this reckoning; That how much time is added to their olde age, fo much they lose of their youthfull yeeres. And this is the reason, why during the life of their fathers, fecretly and under hand they steale (after a fort, by fnatches) their pleasure, and enjoy the same; They wil make femblance as if it came from other, when they give away money and distribute it among their friends, or otherwise spend it in their delights; whiles they catch it privily from under the very wing of their parents, and when they goe to heare and take out their leffons, they will be fure to picke their purses if they can, before they goe away; but after their parents be dead and gone, when they have gotten into their hands the keies of their coffers and fignets of their bags, then the case is altered, and they enter into another course and fashion of life: you shall have my yoong mafters then, put on a grave and auftere countenance, they will not feeme to laugh, nor be spoken to, or acquainted with any body; there is no talke now of anointing the body for any exercile, the racket is cast aside, the tennis court no more haunted, no wrestling practised, no going to the schooles either of the Academic or Lycene, to heare the lectures and disputations of Professors and Philosophers. But now the officers and servants be called to an audit and account; now they are examined what they have under their hands; now the writings, billes, obligations and deeds are fought up and peruled; now they fall to argue and reason with their receivers, flewards, factours and debters; fo sharpe-fet they are to their negotiations and affaires; fo full of cares and bufinefle, that they have no leafure to take their dinners or noone-meales; and if they fup, they can not intend to go into the baine or hot-house before it be late in the night; the bodily exercises wherein they were brought up and trained in, be laid downe; no swimining nor bathing any more in the river Diree; all fuch matters be cast behinde and cleane forgotten. Nowifa man fay to one of these: Will you go and heare such a Philosopher reade a lecture, or make a fermon: How can I go? (will he fay againe) I have no while fince my fathers death. O miserable and wretched man, what hath hee left unto thee of all his goods, comparable to that which he hath bereaved thee of, to wit; Repole and Libertie: but it is not thy father so much, as his riches flowing round about thee, that environeth and compaffeth thee fo, as it hath gotten the masterie over thee; this hath set foot upon thy throat, this hath conquered thee; like unto that shrewd wife in Hesiodus,

Those children wastfull prove and bad, Who servile slaves for parents had.

Who burnes aman without amatch or brand of scorching fire, And drives him to gray old age before that time require.

caufing thy foule (as it were) to be full of rivels and hoarie haires before time, bringing with it carking cares and tedious travels proceeding from the love of money, and a world of affaires without any repofe, whereby that alacrity, cheerefulneffe, worship and sociable courtesse which ought to be in a man, are decayed and faded cleane to nothing.

But what meane you fir by all this? (will fome one haply fay unto me) See you not how there be some that bestow their wealth liberally with credit and reputation? unto whom I arrivere thus:

thus: Have you never heard what Aristotle said: That as some there are who have no use at all of their goods, so there be others who abuse the same; as if he should say: Neither the one nor other was seemely and as it ought to be: for as those get neither profit nor honour by their riches, so these suited in the less of these which are necessary for nature? but these who are so rich and wealthy above the rest, what have they more to content nature, than those who live in a meane and competent of the certes, riches (as Theo. phrassimaliath) is not so great a matter that wee should love and admire it so much, if it bettnee that Callius the wealthiest person in all Athens, and Ismenias the richest citizen of Thebes, the the same things that Socrates and Epaminons as did. For like as Agathon banished the flute, cornet, to and such the discourses of men who are present at the table are sufficient to enterteine mirch; even so may he aswell rid away out of houses, hangings, coverlets and carpets of purple, costly and sun port and to may he aswell rid away out of houses, hangings, coverlets and carpets of purple, costly and sun port and to the proper men do. I would not as Hesiodus saits

That plough or helme should hang in smoake to drie, Or painfull tillage now be laid aside, X or works of oxe and mule for ever die, Who serve our turnes to draw, to till, to ride;

but rather that these goldsmiths, turners, gravers, perfumers and cooks would be chased and sent as away, for a finuch as this were indeed, an honest and civill banishment of unprofitable artificers as forreiners, that may be spared out of a citty. Now if it be so, that things requisite for the negeffitie of nature, be common aswell to the poore as the rich, and that riches doe vaunt and frand to much upon nothing els but superfluities, and that Scopas the Thessalian is worthily co. mended in this; That being requested to give away and part with somwhat of his houshold stuffe which he might spare and had no need of: Why (quoth he) in what things els consisteth the felicitie of those who are reputed happie and fortunate in this world above other men, but in these fuperfluities that you feeme to aske at my hands, and not in fuch as be necessarie and requisite? If it be so I say, see that you be not like unto him that praiseth a pompe and solemne shewof plaies and games more than life indeed, which standeth upon things necessary. The procession 30 and solemnitie of the Bacchanales which was exhibited in our countrey, was woont in old time to be performed after a plaine and homely manner, merily and with greatjoy: You should have seene there one carying a little barrell of wine, another a branch of a vine tree; after him comes one drawing and plucking after him a goate; then followeth another with a basket of dried figs; and last of all one that bare in shew Phallus, that is to say, the refemblance of the genitall member of a man: but now adaies all these ceremonies are despised, neglected, and in maner not at all to be seene, such a traine there is of those that carie vessels of gold and filver, fo many fumptuous and costly robes, such stately chariots richly set out are driven & drawen with brave steeds most gallantly dight, besides the pageants, dumbe-shewes and maskes, that they hide and obscure the auncient and true pompe according to the first institution; and even 40 fo it is in riches; the things that be necessarie and serve for use and profit, are overwhelmed and covered with needleffe toics and superfluous vanities, & I affure you the most part of us be like unto young Telemachus, who for want of knowledge and experience, or rather indeed for default of judgement and discretion when hee beheld av estors house furnished with beds, tables, hangings, tapistrie, apparell, and well provided also of sweete and pleasant wines, never reckoned the mafter of the house happie for having so good provision of such necessarie and profitable things: but being in Menelaus his house, and seeing there store of Ivorie, gold, and filver, and the mettall Elestrum, he was ravished and in an ecstasie with admiration thereof, and brake out in these words:

Like unto this, the pallace all within I judge to be,

Of Jupiter that mightie god who dwels in azure skie:

How rich, how faire, how infinite are all things which I fee!

Off heart, as I do them behold, is ravify t woonderouffie.

But Socrates or Diogenes would have faid thus rather:

How many wretshed things are here?

bow needleffe all and vaine?

When I them view, I laugh thereat, of them I am not faine.

Andwhat faiest thou foolith and vaine for as thou art? Where as thou shouldest have taken from thy verie wife her purple, her jewels and gaudie ornaments, to the end that flee might no more long for fuch superfluitie, nor runne a nodding after forrein vanities, farre fetcht and deere bought; doeft thou contrariwife embellish and adorne thy house, like a theatre, scaffold to and stage to make a goodly fight for those that come into the Shew place? Loe wherein lieth the felicitie and happines that riches bringeth, making a trim flew before those, who gaze upon them, and to tellifie and report to others what they have seene : set this aside (that they be not shewed to all the world) there is nothing at all therein to reckon. But it is not so with temperance, with philosophie, with the true knowledge of the gods, so farre foorth as is meete and behoovefull to be knowen, for these are the same still and all one, although everie man attaine not thereto but all others be ignorant thereof. This pietie (I say) and religion hath alwaies a greatlight of her owne and resplendant beames proper to it selfe, wherewith it doth thine in the foule, evermore accompanied with a certaine joy that never cealeth to take contentment in her owne good within, whether any one fee it or no, whether it bee unknowen to gods and 20 men or no, it skilleth not. Of this kinde and nature is vertue indeed, and trueth, the beautie alfo of the Mathematicall sciences, to wit, Geometrie and Astrologie; unto which who will thinke that the gorgeous trappings and capparisons, the brooches, collars and carkans of riches are any waies comparable, which (to fay a truth) are no better than jewels and ornaments good to trim yoong brides and fet out maidens for to be seene and looked at? For riches, if no man doe regard, behold, and fet their cies on them (to fay a trueth) is a blinde thing of it felfe, and fendeth no light at all nor raies from it; for certainely lay: That a rich man dine and sup privately alone, or with his wife and some inward and familiar friends, he troubleth not himselfe about furnishing of his table with many services, daintiedishes, and festivall fare; he stands not so much upon his golden cups and goblets, but useth those things that be ordinarie, which goe about 30 evertiedate and come next hand, as well vessell as viands; his wife fits by his side and beares him companie, not decked and hung with jewels and spangles of gold, not arraied in purple, but in plaine attire and simply clad; but when he makes a feast (that is to fay) sets out a theater, wherein the pompes and (hewes are to meet and make a jangling noise together, when the plaies are to be represented of his riches, and the solemne traine therof to be brought in place; then comes abroad his brave furniture indeed other he fetcheth out of the ship his faire chaufers and goodlypots; then bringeth hee foorth his tich three-footed tables; then come abroad the lampes, candlesticks, and branches of filver; the lights are disposed in order about the cups; the cupbearers, skinkers and tafters are changed; all places are newly dight and covered; all things are then stirred and remooved that faw no funnelong before; the silver plate, the golden veffels, and those that be set and enriched with pretious stones; to conclude, now veitels, and those that be let and entretice with a time they confesse there is no show els but of riches; at such a time they confesse themselves and will be knowen wealthy. But all this while whether a rich man suppe alone, or make a feast, temperance is away and true contentment.

OF THE NATURALL LOVE OR KINDNES OF

PARENTS TO THEIR CHILDREN.

The Summarie.

Ifely faid one, (who foever it was) That to banifh amitie and friendflip from among men, were as great hart to the focietie of mankinde, as to deprive them of the light and beat of the Sunne: which being verified and found true in the whole courfe of this life, and in the maintenance of all estates; not without great cause Nature halb cast and sprinkled the seed thereof in the generation and nourishment of a race and linge, 20

whereoffee growth evident testimonies in brute beasts, the bester to moove and moite us to our duty,
That we may see therefore this pretious seed and graine of amitie, how it doth slower and frustissen the world, we must begin at the love and naturall kindnesse of fathers and mothers to their children; for if this be well kept and mainteined, there proceed from it an infinite number of contentments which domuch assivage and case the inconveniences and dissomnodities of our life. And Plutarch entring into this matter, showeth first in generality: That men learnesses our life. And Plutarch entring into this matter, showeth first in generality: That men learnesses of our life. And eshoole of brute beasts, with what affection they should beget, mourish and bring up their children; afterward he doth panicularise thereof, and enrich be same argument by divers examples. But for that he would not have un thinke that he extolled dumbe beasts above man and woman, he observeth and setteth downever well the difference that is of amities, discoursing in good and modest tearmes autouching the generation on and nouriture of children, and briefly by the way represented hunto un themiserable entrance of man into this race upon earth, where he is to runne his course, this chance, he provet be that the nourishing of infants both no other casse and reason, she well this what defect and fault so wer may come between and be medled amone, yet it can not altogether abolish the same.

OF THE NATURALL LOVE OR KINDNES OF PARENTS to their children.

Hat which mooved the Greeks at first, to put over the decision of their controversies to forraine judges, and to bring into their countrey, strangers to be their umpires, was the distrust and dissidence that they had one in another, as if they consessed thereby that justice was indeed a thing necessaries for mans lite, but it grew not among them: And is not the case even fo as touching certaine questions disputable in Philosophie 2 for the determining whereof, Philosophiers (by reason of the sundry and divers opinions which so are among them) have appealed to the nature of brute beasts, as it were into a strange city, and remitted the deciding thereof to their properties and affections, according to kinde, as being neither fubject to partiall favour, nor yet corrupt, depraved and polluted. Now furely, a common reproch this must needs be to mans naughtie nature and leawd behaviour; That when we are in doubtfull question concerning the greatest and most necessary points perteining to this present life of ours, we should goe and learch into the nature of horses, dogs and birds for resolution; namely, how we ought to make our marriages, how to get children, and how to reare and nourish them after they be borne, and as if there were no figne (in maner) or token of nature imprinted in our felves, we must be faine to alledge the passions, properties and affections of brute beasts, and to produce them for witneffes, to argue and prove how much in our life we transgresse and go aside from the rule of nature, when at our first beginning and entrance into this world, we finde such trouble, disorder and confusion; for in those dumbe beasts beforefaid, nature doth retaine and keepe that which isher owne and proper, simple, entire, without corruption or alteration by any strange mixture; wheras contrariwife, it feemeth that the nature of man, by difcourfe of their reason and custome together, is mingled and confused with so many extravagant opinions and judgements, set roftom all parts abroad (much like unto oile that commeth into perfumers hands) that thereby it is become manifolde variable, and in every one severall and particular, and doeth not retaine that which the owne indeed, proper and peculiar to it selfe; neither ought we to thinke it a ftrange matter and a woonderfull, that brute beafts void of reason, should come necrer unto nature, and follow her steps better, than men endued with the gift of reason: for furely, the verice fenfeleffe plants heerein surpaffe those beafts beforefaid, and observe better the instinct of nature; for confidering that they neither conceive any thing by imagination, nor have any motion, affection or inclination at all; fo verily their appetite (such as it is) varieth not nor stirreth to and fro out of the compaffe of nature, by meanes whereof, they continue and abide as if they were kept in and bound within close-prison, holding on still in one and the same course, and not 20 stepping once out of that way wherein nature doth leade and conduct them: as for beasts, they have not any fuch great portion of reason to temper and mollistic their natural properties, neither any great subtilitie of sense and conceit, nor much defire of libertie; but having many inffincts, inclinations and appetites, not ruled by reason, they breake out by the meanes thereof other-whiles, wandering aftray, and running up and downe to and fro, howbeit, for the most part, not very farre out of order, but they take fure holde of nature; much like a ship which lieth in the rode at anchor, well may the daunce and be rocked up and downe, but the is not carried away into the deepe at the pleafure of windes and waves; or much after the maner of an affe or hackney, travelling with bit and bridle, which go not out of the right & fireight way, wherein the master or rider guideth them; whereas in man, even reason herselfe, the mistresse that ruleth 20 and commandeth all, findeth out new cuts (as it were) and by-waies, making many starts and excursions at her pleasure to and fro, now heere, now there; whereupon it is that she leaveth no plaine and apparant print of natures tracts and footing.

Confider I pray you in the first place the mariages (if I may so terme them) of dumbe beasts and reason lesse creatures; and namely how therein they solow precisely the rule and direction of nature. To begin withall; they fland not upon those lawes that provide against such as marrienot, but lead a fingle life; neither make they reckoning of the acts which lay a penaltie upon those that be late ere they enter into wedlocke, like as the citizens under Lycurgus and Solon, who stood in awe of the faid statutes; they feare not to incurre the infamic which followed those persons that were barren and never had children; neither doe they regard and seeke after 40 the honours and prerogatives which they atteined, who were fathers of three children, like as many of the Romains do at this day, who enter into the state of matrimonic, wedde wives beget children, not to the end that they might have heires to inherit their lands and goods, but that they might themselves be inheritors & capable of dignities & immunities. But to proceed unto more particulars, the male afterwards doth deale with the female in the act of generation not at all times; for that the end of their conjunction and going together is not groffe pleafure so much, as the engendring of young and the propagation of their kinde: and therefore at a certeine season of the yeare, to wit, the very prime of the spring, when as the pleasant winds so apt for generation do gently blow, and the temperature of the aire is friendly unto breeders, commeth the female full lovingly and kindly toward her fellow the male, even of her owne accord 50 and motion (as it were) trained by the hand of that fecret inflinet and defire in nature; and for her owne part, the doth what the can to woo and follicite him to regard her, as well by the sweet fent of her flesh, as also by a speciall and peculiar ornament and beautic of her body, thewing herselfe fresh and cheerefull, full ofdew and verdure of greene herbes, pure and neat I warrant you; in this manner doth the prefent her-felfe unto the male and courteth him: now when the perceives once that the is fped and hath conceived by him, the leaveth him and retireth apart in good fort full decently; and then her whole care is to provide for that which she goeth withall, fore casting how to be delivered of it in due time, and bethinking how to fave, preserve, and reare it when it is fallen and brought foorth. And certes it is not possible to expresse sufficiently and woorthily the particulars that are done by these dumbe creatures (but onely this, that every thing proceedeth from the tender love and affection which they have to their young ones) in providence, in patience, in abstinence.

We all acknowledge the Bee to be wife, we call her fo, we celebrate her name for producing and working so diligently that yellow honie, yea and we flatter in praising her, feeling as we do the sweetnesse of the said honie, how it tickleth and contenteth our tongue & taste; and all this while what one is there of us that maketh any account of the wifedome, wit, and artificiall fubtiltie that other creatures thew, as well in the bringing forth their young, as the foltring and nouriture of them ? for first and formost doe but consider the sea bird called Alcyon, no sooner to doth the perceive herfelfe to bee knit with egge, but the falleth prefently to build herneft. the gathereth together the chine-bones of a certeine fea fish which the Greekes call Banking, that is to fay, the fea-needle, these the coucheth, planteth, windeth and interlaceth one within another, to artificially working the fame and weaving them close together in a round and large forme, after the maner of a fifthers leape or weele net; and when the hath knit and fortified the fame exactly with many courses of the faide bones driven and united jointly together in good order, the exposeth it full against inundation and dashing of the sea waves, to the end that the fuperficiall outfide of the worke beaten upon gently and by little & little with the water, being thickned and felted thereby might be more folide and firme, and fo it prooveth indeed; for fo hard it groweth by this meanes, that scarcely any stone can crush it, or edged instrument of iron 20 cleave it; but that which is yet more woonderfull, the mouth and entrie of the faid neft is compoted and wrought proportionably just to the measure and bignesse of the bird Aleyon aforefaid, fo as no creature bigger or leffe than her felfe, no nor the very fea (as men fay) nor the least thing in the world can get into it. And will you see moreover what kindnesse and natural affection the sea weefils or sea dogs doe shew unto their little ones? They breed their young whelpes or kitlings alive within their bellies, and when they lift, let them foorth and fuffer them to run abroad for reliefe and to get their foode, and afterwards receive them into their bodies againe, enclosing them whiles they be asleepe themselves, cherishing them cowched in their bowels and wombe. The she beare a most fell, savage and cruell beast, bringeth foorth her young whelpes, without forme or fashion, unknit and unjointed, having no diftin alimmes or 30 members to be seene; howbeit with her tongue as it were with a toole and instrument for the purpose, the keepeth such a licking of them, the formeth and fathioneth those membranes where in they were lapped in her wombe in fuch fort, that the feemeth not onely to have brought foorth her young, but also to have wrought them afterwards workeman like to their shape and proportion. As for that lion which Homer describeth in this wise,

to feeke abroad for praie In forest wilde; no fooner meets with hunters in the waie, But looking flerne with bended browes which cover both his eies,
He makes a fland, and them affronts in fierce and threatning wife.

Thinke you not by this description that he resembleth one who is bent to capitulate and stands upon termes of composition with the hunters for to save the life of his little ones? To speake in a word, this tender love and affection of beasts toward their young, maketh them that other wise be timorous, hardie and bold; those that be slow and idle by nature, laborious and painfull, and such as of themselves are greedy and ravenous, to be spare and temperate in their seeding, like as the bird whereof the same Homer speaketh, ls'hich bring sin mouth unto her nest, fuch food as she abroad Could get to seed her naked young, and doth her-selfe destraud.

For content the is even with her owne hunger to nourish her little ones, and the same food or bait that she hash for them, being so neere as it is unto her owne craw and gestier, she holdest close and fast in her bill, for searce less thee might swallow it downe the throat ere sheewere aware;

Or like the birch running about her young whelps, at the fight Of strangers, baies and barkes apace, and ready is to fight.

No doubt the feare which the hath lest her little one should take harme redoubleth her courage, and maketh her more hardie and angrie than before: as for the partridges when they be laid for by the fowler, together with their covin of young birds, they fuffer them to flie away as well as they can, and make shift to save themselves, but the old rowens full subtilly seeme to wait the comming of the faid hunters, abiding untill they approach neere unto them, and by keeping to about their feet, traine them still away after them, ready ever as it were to be caught; now when the fowler shall feeme to reach unto them with his hand, they will runne a little or take a short flight from him, and then they state againe, putting him in new hope of his pray and bootie, which every-foot he thinketh to take with his hand: thus they play mock-holiday with the fowlers, and yet with some danger to themselves for the safetie of their young, untill they have trained them a great way off, who fought for their lives. Our hens which we keepe about our houfes so ordinarily, and have daily in our eies, how carefully doe they looke unto their young chickens whiles they receive fome under their wings, which they spred and hold open for the nonce that they may creepe in, others they fuffer to mount upon their backs, gently giving them leave to climbe and get up on every fide, and this they doe not without great joy and to contentment, which they tellifie by a kind of clocking and speciall noise that they make at such atime; if when they becalone without their chickens, and have no feare but of themselves a dogge or a ferpent come in their way, they flie from them; let their brood be about them when fuch a danger is prefented, it is woonderfull how ready they will be to defend the fame, yea and to fight for, even above their power. Do we thinke now that nature hath imprinted fuch affections and paffions in thefeliving creatures, for the great care that the hath to mainteine the race and posteritie (as it were) of hens, dogs, or beares; or doe we not rather make this construction of it, that the fhameth, pricketh, and woundeth men thereby when we reason and discourse thus within our felves, that these things bee good examples for as many as follow them, and the reproches of those that have no sense or feeling of naturall affection; by which no doubt 30 they do blame and accuse the nature of man onely, as if she alone were not affectionate without fome hire and reward, nor could skill of love but for gaine and profit? for admired he was in the theaters that thus fpake first:

For hope of gaine one man will love another, Take it away, what one will love his brother?

This is the reason (according to the opinion and doctrine of Epicurus) that the father affecteth his some, the mother is tender over her childe, and children likewise are kind unto their parents: but fet-case that brute beasts could both speake and understand language, in some open theater, and that one called to meet together a fufficient affembly of beefs, hories, dogs, and fowles, certes if their voices were demanded upon this point now in question, hee would fet downe in 40 writing, and openly pronounce, that neither bitches loved their whelpes, nor mares their foles, hens their chickens, and other fowles their little birds in respect of any reward, but freely and by the instinct of nature: and this would be found a true verdict of his, instiffed and verified by all thole paffions and affections which are observed in them: and what a thame and infamie unto mankind is this to grant and avouch, that the act of generation in brute beafts, their conception, their breeding, their painfull deliverie of their young, and the carefull feeding and cherithing of them be natures works meerely, and duties of gratuitie; and contrariwife that in men they be pawnes given them for fecuritie of interest, hires, gages, and carnest pennies respective to some profit and gaine which they draw after them? But furely as this project is not true, so it is not woorth the hearing, for nature verily as in favage plants and trees, to wit, wilde vines, 50 wilde figge trees, and wilde olives the doth ingenerate certeine raw and unperfect rudiments, (fuch as they be) of good and kinde fruits; so the hath created in brute beasts a natural love and affection to their young, though the fame be not absolute nor fully answerable to the rule of jultice, ne yet able to passe farther than the bonds and limits of necessitie. As forman, a living creature, endued and adorned with reason, created and made for a civill societie, whom the hathbrought into the world forto observe lawes and justice, to serve honour and worship the gods, to found cities and governe common-wealths, and therein to exercise and performe al offices of bountie: him she hath bestowed upon noble, generous, faire and fruitfull seeds of all these things, to wit, a kinde love and tender affection toward his children; and these she followeth still, and persistent therein, which she insused together with the first principles and elements that went to the frame of his body and soule: for nature being every way persect and exquisite, and namely in this inbred love towardinfants; wherein there wanteth nothing that is necessarie, neither from it is ought to be taken away as supershous; I thath nothing (as Erasistratus was woont to say) vaine, frivolous and unprofitable, nothing inconstant, and shaking too and fro, inclining now one way, and then another. For in the first place, as touching the generation of man, who is able to expresse her prudence sufficiently? neither haply may it shand with the rule of decent modestie to be over-curious and exquisite in delivering the proper names and tearnes thereto belonging: for those naturall parts serving in that act of gene. To ration and conception secret as they be and hidden, so they neither can well, nor would will hingly be named, but the composition and framing thereof, so aptly made for the purpose, the disposition and situation likewise occurrent, we ought rather to conceive in our minde than utter in speech.

Leaving therefore those privie members to our private thoughts, passe we to the confection. disposition and distribution of the milke, which is sufficient to shew most evidently her providence, in defire and diligence; for the superfluous portion of blood which remaineth in a womans bodie, over and above that which serveth for the use whereunto it is ordeined, floting up and downe within her afterwards, for defect or feeblenesse of spirits wandereth (asit were) to and fro, and is a burden to her bodie; but at certaine fet-times & daies, to wit, in every monthly 19 revolution, nature is carefull and diligent to open certeine feluces and conducts, by which the faid superfluous blood doth void and passe away, whereupon shee doth not onely purge and lighten all the bodie befides, but also cleanfeth the matrice, and maketh it like a piece of ground brought in order and temper, apt to receive the plough, and defirous of the feed after it in due feafon: now when it hath once conceived and reteined the faid feed, fo as the fame take root and be knit, presently it draweth it selfe strait and close together round, and holdeth the conception within it; for the navill (as Democritus faith) being the first thing framed within the matrice, and ferving in stead of an anchor against the waving and wandering of it to and fro, holdeth fure the fruit conceived, which both now groweth and heereafter is to be delivered (asia were) by a fure cable and strong bough, then also it stoppeth and shutteth up the faid riverets to and passages of those monethly purgations; and taking the foresaid blood, which otherwise would run an void by those pipes and conducts, it maketh use thereof for to nourish, and (asit were) to water the infant, which beginneth by this time to take some confistence and receive shape and forme, folong, untill a certaine number of daies which are necessarie for the full growth thereof within be expired; at which time it had need to remove from thence for a kinde of nutriment else-where in another place; and then diverting the faid course of blood with all dexierity & a skilfull hand (no gardener nor fountainer in drawing of his trenches and chanels with all his cunning fo artificially and employing it from one use to another, the hath certains cefternes (as it were) or fountaine-heads, prepared of purpose from a running source most readie to receive that liquor of blood quickly, and not without some sense of pleasure and content-40 ment; but withall, when it is received, they have a power and facultie, by a milde hear of thenaturall spirits within them, and with a delicate and forminine tendernesse, to concoct, digest, change and convert it into another nature and qualitie, for that the paps have within themnaturally, the like temperature and disposition answerable unto it: now these teats which spontout milke from the cocks of a conduct, are so framed and disposed, that it floweth not foorth all at once, neither do they fend it away fuddenly : but nature hath fo placed the dug,t hat as it endeth one way in a spongeous kinde of slesh full of small pipes, and made of purpose to transmitthe milke, and let it diffill gently by many little pores and fecret passages, so it yeeldeth anipplein maner of a faucet, very fit and ready for the little babes mouth, about which to nuzzle and nudgell with it prety lips it taketh pleafure, and loveth to be tugging and lugging of it; but to no 50 purpose and without any fruit or profit at all, had nature provided such tooles and instruments for to engender and bring foorth a childe; to no end (I fav) had the taken fo good order, ufed to great industry, diligence and forecast, if withall she had not imprinted in the heart of mothers? woonderfull love and affection, yea, and an extraordinarie care over the fruit of their wombe, when it is borne into the world: for

Of creatures all which breath and walke upon the earth in light, None is there wretched more than man new borne into this light.

And who foever faith thus of a yoong infant newly comming forth of the mothers wombe, maketh no lie at all, but speaketh trueth; for nothing is there so imperfect, so indigent and poore, fonaked, so deformed, so foule and impure, than is man to see to presently upon his birth, confidering that to him (in maner alone) nature hath not given fo much as a cleane paffage and way into this light; fo furred he is all over & polluted with blood, so ful of filth and ordure, when he entreth into the world, refembling rather a creature fresh killed & flaine, than newly borne; that no bodie is willing to touch, to take up, to handle, dandle, kiffe and clip it, but fuch as by nature are lead to love it: and therefore, whereas in all other living creatures, nature hath provided that their udders and paps should be set beneath under their bellies, in a woman onely, she hath feated them aloft in her breafts, as a very proper and convenient place, where shee may more readily kiffe, embrace, coll and huggle her babe while it fucketh; willing thereby to let us underfland, that the end of breeding, bearing and rearing children, is not gaine and profit, but pure love and meere affection. Now, if you would fee this more plainly proved unto you, propose (if you please) and call to remembrance the women and men both in the olde world, whose hap was either first to beare children, or to see an infant newly borne; there was no law then to command and compell them to nourith and bring up their young babes; no hope at all of reciprocall pleafure or thanks at their hands that indured them; no expectance of reward and re-20 compense another day to be paied from them, as due debt for their care, paines and cost about them: nay, if you goe to that, I might fay rather: That mothers had some reason to deale hardly with their yoong infants, and to beare in minde the injuries that they have done them, in that they endured fuch dangers and fo great paines for them:

As namely, when the painfull throwes
as sharpe as any dart,
In travell pinch a woman neere,
and pierce ber to the bart:
Which midwives, sunocs daughters then,
do put her to, poore wretch,
With many a pang, when with their hand they make ber body stretch.

But our women fay; It was never Homerus (furely) who wrote this; but Homerus rather: that is to fay, some Poetreffe or woman of his poeticall veine, who had bene herselfe at such a busines, and selve the dolourous pangs of child-birth, or els was even then in labour, and upon the point to be delivered, seeling a mixture of bitter and sharpe throwes in her backe, belly and flanks, when shee powred out these verses: but yet, for all the forow and deare bargaine that a mother hath of it, this kinde and naturall love doth till so bend, incline and leade her, that not with flanding she be in a heat still upon her travell, full of paines and after-throwes, panting, trembling and shaking for very anguish, yet she neglecteth not her sweet babe, nor windeth or shrinketh 40 away from it; but the turneth toward it, she maketh to it, she smileth and laugheth upon it, she taketh it into her armes, the hugleth it in her bosome, and kiffeth it full kindly: neither all this whiles gathereth she any fruits of pleasure or profit, but painfully (God wot) and carefully

She laps it then in raggs full foft,
With fwadling bands livewraps it oft,
By turnes live cooles and keeps it warme,
Loth is she that is should take harme.
And thus aswell by night as day,
Paives after paines she taketh ay.

Nowtell me (I pray you) what reward, recompense and profit do women reape for all this troujo ble and painfull hand about their little ones? None at all (surely) for the present, and as little in struce expectance another day, considering their hopes are so farre off, and the same so uncertaine. The husbandman that diggeth and laboureth about his vine at the Aequinox in the Spring, pressent grapes out of it and maketh his vintage at the Aequinox of the Autumne. He that soweth his corne when the starres called Pleiades, doe couch and goe downe, reapeth and hath his harvest afterwards when they rise and appeare againe; kine calve, mares soale, hennes hatch, and soone after there commeth profit of their calves, their colts and their chickens: but the reasing and education of a man is laborious, his growth is very slow and late; and whereas long it is ere he commeth to proofe and make any shew of vertue, commonly most fathers die before that day. Neocles lived not to see the noble victorie before Salanus that Themistoeles his sonne atchived: neither saw Multiades the happie day wherein Cimon his sonne won the fielde at the samous battell necre the river Eurynidon: Xantippus, was not so happy as to heare Penicles his sonne, out of the pulpit preaching and making orations to the people; neither was it the good fortune of Ariston to be at any of his sonne Platoes lectures and disputations in Philosophie: the fathers of Euripides and Sophoeles, two renowmed Poets, never knew of the victories which they obteined, for pronouncing and rehearsing their tragedies in open theater, they might heare them peradventure when they were little ones to stammer, to listoe, to feel and put syllables together, or to speake broken Greeke, and that was all. But ordinary it is that men to live to see, heare, and know when their children sall to gaming, revelling, masking, and banquetting, to drunkennesse, wanton whooring, love and such like misdemeanors. So as in these regards this one Mot of Euenus in an Epigram of his, deserveth to be praised and remembred.

See how great paines all fathers undergo, What daily griefes their children put them to.

And yet for all this, fathers cease not still to nourish and bring up children, and such most of a who stand least in need of their children another day; for a meere mockery it were, and a ridculous thing if a man should suppose; that rich & wealthy men do facrifice unto the gods, and make great joy at the nativitie and birth of their children, because that one day they thall feede and fullcine them in their old age, and interre them after they be dead; unleffe perhaps it may 20 be faid, they rejoice thus and be so glad to have and bring up children, for that otherwise they should leave none heires behind them; as who would fay, it were so hard a matter to finde out and meet with those that would be willing to inherite the lands and goods of strangers. Certes the fands of the sca, the little motes in the sunne raised of dust, the feathers of birds together with their variable notes, be not fo many in number, as there be menthat gape after heritages, and be ready to fucceed others in their livings. Danass (who as they fay was the father of 50, daughters) if his fortune had beene to be childleffe, I doubt not but he should have had more heires than so to have parted his goods and state among them, and those verily after another fort than the heires of his owne body. For children yeeld their parents no thanks at all for being their inheritours, neither in regard thereof do they any service, dutie, or honour unto them; 10 for why? they expect and looke for the inheritance as a thing due and of right belonging unto them: but contrariwife you heare how those strangers that hang and hunt about a man who hath no children, much like to those in the comædies, singing this song,

O sir, no wight shall do you any harme, I will revenge your wrongs and quarrels ay: Hold heare, three-halfe-pence good to keepe you warme Purse it, drinke it, sing wo and care away. As for that which Euripides saith, These worldly goods procure men friends to chuse,

And credit most, who then will them refuse.

It is not fimply and generally true, unlesse to those as have no children; for such indeed are fure to be invited and seasted by the rich; lords and rulers will make court and be serviceable to such; for them great oratours and advocates will plead at the bar without see, and give their counsell gratis,

How mightie is a rich man with each one, So long as his next heire is knowne to none?

whereas you shall see many in the world, who before time having a number of friends and honour enough and no sooner had a little childeborne unto them, but they lost all their friends, credit, and reputation at once, so that by this reckoning the having of children maketh nothing at all to the authoritie of their parents, so that in regard thereof, it is not that they doe so so love their children; but surely the cause of this their kindnesse and affection proceedeth altogether from nature, and appeareth no lesse in mankind than in wilde beasts: Howbeit otherwhiles this naturall love aswell as many other good qualities in men, are blemished and obscured by occasion of vice that buddeth up afterwards; like as we see wilde briers, bushes and brambles to spring up and grow among good and kind feeds, for otherwise we might as well collect and say that men love not themselves because many cut their owne throates, or wilfully fall down headlong from steepe rocks and high places. For Oedipus

With bloudy hand his owneen-lids did force, And plucked out his eies upon remorce.

Hegefita disputing and discoursing upon a time of abstinence, caused many of his auditours and scholars to pine themselves to death.

Such accidents of many forts there be, Permitted by the gods we daily fee.

But al of them like as those other passions and maladies of them ind before named, transport aman out of his owne nature, and put him befide himfelfe, so as they testifie against themselves that this is true, and that they do amiffe heerein; for if a fow having farrowed a little pigge, de-10 youre it when the hath done, or a bitch chance to teate in peeces a puppic or whelpe of her own litter, presently men are amazed at the fight thereof, and woonderfully affrighted, whereupon they facrifice unto the gods certaine expiatorie facrifices, for to divert the finister præsages thereof, as taking it to a prodigious woonder, as confessing thereby, that it is a propertie given to all living creatures, even by the inftinct and inftitution of nature; To love, foster and cherrish the fruit of their owne bodies: fo farre is it from them to destroy the same. And yet, notwithftanding her corruption and depravation in this behalfe: Like as in mines, the gold (although it be mixed with much clay, and furred all over with earth) shineth & glittereth thorow the same, and is to be seene afarre off; even so nature amid the most depravate maners and corrupt passions that we have, sheweth a certeine love and tender affection to little ones. To conclude, no wheras the poore many times make no care at all to nourish and reare up their children, it is for nothing els but because they seare lest having not so good bringing up nor so civill education as they ought, they should proove servile in behavior, untaught, unmanerly, rude, and void of all good parts; and judging (as they do) povertie to be the extremity of all mileries that can befall to man, their heart will not ferve them to leave unto their children this hereditarie calamity, as a most grievous and dangerous disease.

OF THE PLVRALITY OF FRIENDS.

The Summarie.

N certaine discourses going before, it appeareth what a benefit and good thing friend-N certeine discourses going before, it appeareth what a benefit and good thing friend-solve solves and now Plutarch addeth thereto a certaine sorrection very necessary, in re-gard of our nature which is given alwaies to bend unto extremities, and not able long to holde the golden-meane. Like as therefore, it bewraieth a miserable, wretched and cursed mind to be desirous for to leade a life withous acquaim ance and samiliarity with any person; even so to make friends (as they say) hand over head and upon every occasion, is peradventure unpossible, but surely not expedient. Our authour therefore, willing to reforme this disordinate affection that is in many, who because they would have a number of friends, often times have not one asfured, sheweth that it is farre better for a man to get one fast and faithfull friend, than a great multitude of whom he can not make any certaine account; propounding as a remedie for this coverous minde 50 of entertaining such a plurality of friends, the examples of those who are contented with few, and by that meanes thinke their estate more sure and stedfast. After this, he treateth of the choise of friends, but especially of one. Then discourseth he of that which is requisite in true friendship, annexing thereto many proper and apt finilitudes, which represent as well the benefit that sincere affection bringeth, as the hurt which commeth of famed and counterfeit amitie. Thu done, he proveth, that to enterteine anumber of friends, is a very hard matter, yea, and unpossible; for that amon is not able to converse with them, nor to frame and sort with them all, but that he shall procure himselfe enemies on all sides : and when he hath enriched and adorned the same with notable examples, he proceedet hto describe.

describe, what use a man is to make of friendship, and with what sort and condition of men he ought to joine in amity: but this is the conclusion; That an honest and vertuous man can not quit himselfe well and performe his devoire unto many friends at once.

OF THE PLURALITIE of friends.

Ocrates upon a time demanded of Menon the Thessalian, who was 10 esteemed very sufficient in all litterature, and a great schoole-man, exercised in long practise of disputations, and named to be one (as Empedocles faith) who had attained to the very height and perfection of wifedome and learning, what vertue was; and when he had answered readily and boldly enough, in this wife: There is a vertue (quoth he) of a yoong childe, and of an olde gray beard; of a man, and of a woman; of a magistrate, and of a private person; of ama. fter, and of a fervant: I con you thanke (quoth Socrates againe, replying unto him) you have done it very well: I asked you but of one vertue, and you have raifed and let flie a whole swarme (as it were) of vertues, gueffing and 10 collecting not amiffe by fuch an answere, that this deepe clearke, who had named thus many vertues, knew not fo much as one. And might not a man feeme to fcome and mocke us welle. nough, who having not yet gotten one friendship and amity certaine, are afraid (forfooth) lest ere we be aware, we fall into a multitude and pluralitie of friends: for this were even as much as if one that is maimed and starke blinde, should feare to become either Briareus the giant, with an hundred armes and hands, or Argus, who had eies all over his bodie. And yet we praise and commend exceffively and beyond all measure the young man in Menander, when he saith:

Of all the goods which I do holde, To thinke ech one (I would be bolde) Right woonderfull, if I might finde The stadow onely of a friend.

But certeinly this is one cause among many others, & the same not the least, that we cannot be possessed of any one assured amity, because we cover to have so many much like vnto these common ftrumpers and harlots, who for that they profittute their bodies fo often and to fo manie men, cannot make any reckoning to hold & reteine any one paramor or lover fast and sure unto them; for that the first commers seeing themselves neglected and cast off by the enterteinment of new, retire and fall away from them, and feeke elfewhere; or rather much after the maner of that * tofter-childe of lady Hypfipyle,

Who being fet in meddow greene Wish pleasant flowers all faire befeene, One after other crops them fill, Hunting this game with right good will: For why, his heart tooke great content In their gay hew and sweety sent: So little wit and small * discretion Archemorus.

The infant had, and no * repletion. even so every one of us for the defire of noveltie, and upon a satietie and fulnesse of that which is prefent and in hand, fuffreth himfelfe ever to be caried away with a new-come friend that is fresh and flowring; which fickle and inconstant affection causeth us to change often and to begin many friendthips and finish none; to enter still into new amities and bring none to per-50 fection; and for the love of the new which we purfue and feeke after, wee paffe by that which we held already and let it go. To begin then first and formost at antiquity (as it were) from the goddesse Vesta (according to the old proverbe) let us examine and consider the common fame of mans life which hath beene delivered unto us from hand to hand time out of minde, by the fueceffion and progresse of so many ages from the old world unto this day, and take the same for a witnesse and counseller both in this matter, wee shall finde in all the yeeres past, these onely couples and paires of renowmed friends, to wit, Thefem and Pirithom; Achilles and Patroclus Orestes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon; Epaminondas and Pelopidas. For friendship is indeed (as I may fo fay) one of these cattell that love company and defire to feed and pasture with fellowes; but it can not abide heards and droves, it may not away with these great flocks, as jayes, dawes and choughes do. And whereas it is commonly faid and thought, that a friend is another owne felfe, and men give unto him the name of integs or smess in Greeke, as if a man would fay, tines, that is, fuch another: what implieth all this, but that friendship should be reduced within the measure and compasse of the duall number, that is, of twaine. Well, this is certaine, we can buy neither many flaves nor purchase many friends with a small piece of coine: but what may he this piece of money that will fetch friends? Surely, kinde affection or good will, and a lovely 10 grace joined with vertue, things I may tell you for are, as looke thorowout the world and the whole course of nature, you shall find nothing more geason. No marvell then, if it be unpossible either to love many or to be loved of many, perfectly and in the height of affection. But like as great rivers, if they be divided into many chanels, and cut into fundry riverets, cary but an ebbe water, and run with no ftrong ftreame; even so a vehement and affectionate love planted in the minde, if it be parted many and divers waies becommeth enervate and feeble, and commeth in maner to nothing. This is the reason in nature, that those creatures which bring forth but one and no more, love their yoong more tenderly and entirely, than others do theirs. Homer alfo when he would fignifie a childe most dearely beloved, calleth it pishon THAU) eTOV, that is to fay, only begotten and toward old age, to wit, when the parents have no more betweene them, nor ever 20 are like or doe looke to have another: for mine owne part, I would not defire to have that paren, that is to fay, one friend, and no more; but furely, I could wish that with other he were more that is to fay, one friend, and no more; but furely, I could wish that with other he were more that is to fay, one friend, and no more; but furely, I could wish that with other he were more than the could be a second or the co yea, and offeres, that is to fay, long and late first ere he be gotten, like as a sonne which is borne toward the latter daies of his parents, yea, and fuch a one, as (who according to that proverbe fo common in every mans mouth) hath eaten with me a measure of falt. And are not many now adaies called friends? what els? if they have but drunke once together at the taverne, or met in the tennis court, or els turned into a tabling house, and plaied at dice and hazzard one with the other, or haply light in company at one hostelric and lodged together, and in one word, they do contract and gather friends in this maner out of common innes, wreftling places, and ordinary walkes in the markets or publike galleries. And verily, the common fort, when they fee 30 every morning in the houses of rich men and mightie rulers, a great multitude and concourse of people, with much ado and hurry, giving attendance there to falute them and bid them good morrow, kiffing their right hands, & glad if they may touch them, acc opanying them in maner of a guard when they go out of their lodging; oh, they imagine & repute fuch potentates wondrous happie, as being furnithed with fuch numbers of friends; and yet furely, as many as they be, they shal see more slies ordinarily in their kitchins: and to say a troth, like as these slies will be gone if no cates and yiands be stirring; so these friends will tary no longer than gaine and profit is to be gotten.

Pluralitie of friends.

Certes, true and perect friend thip requireth thefe three things especially; Vertue, as being honest and commendable; Societie, which is pleasant and delectable; and Profit, which is need-40 full and necessarie: for a man must admit and receive a friend upon judgement and after triall made, he ought to delight and joy in his company, and he is to make use of him as occasion serveth: all which three are contrarie unto pluralitie of friends, but especially that which is principall, to wit, judgement upon a triall: and to proove this to be true; fee first and formost whether it bee possible in a small time to make proofe and triall of singing men or quiresters, that they may keepe a good concent and harmonic together in their fong; or to make choice of oare-men, who shall agree in their rowing, to rise and fall with their oares just together; or of housholde servants such as wee purpose to make the bailist and stewards of our goods, or the governors and bringers up of our children? much more unlikely then is it, that we should have proofe of many friends in a little space, who will be ready to enter the triall with us of all 50 maner of fortune, and of whom every one will be prest and willing

For neither is a thip that or haled into the fea against fo many stormes & tempests; nor me do let & pitch fo many stakes in a pallisado for the defence of any place; or in havens raise banks, and oppose dams, against the like dangers, or in feare of so many perils, as friendship promileth fuccour and refuge for, if it be founded furely and aright upon good proofe and fufficient experience. As for such as before triall and experiment made do intrude themselves comming and going for friends, fuch when they be put to the trial & touch indeed, & then found like evil money, counterfeit or light, they that go without them, be glad in their minde, and as many as have them, wish with all their hart & pray to God for to be rid of them. But furely this is a trou. blefome & comberous thing, neither is it an easie matter to void and cast off such a friendship as this, so displeasant & offensive: for like as if some kind of bad meat do trouble and offend the Homacke, a man can neither reteine and hold it still, but it will put him to paine and breed hurt & corruption, nor yet put it off and fend it out in such fort as it went in, but all filthy and loath. fome, as being furred over with fline, and mixed confusedly with other humours, and whollie altered from the former state; even so an ill friend either tarieth with us still to his owne griefe and ours both, or elfe away he goeth perforce with euill wil, malice and enmitte like bitter cho. 10 ler that is vomited out of the stomacke. It is not good therefore to receive and admit of friends over-lightly and over-foone, nor to fet our mindes and knit our affections to those that come next hand, and prefent themselves first, ne yet love those incontinently that seeke to us and sol. low us; but rather to feeke after them and follow them our felves that are worthy of friendship: for we must not alwaies choose that which is easie to be had & willing to be gotten; for we putby gorfe and furzen buffies; we tread under foot briers and brambles though they catch hold of us, and hang unto us as we walke whether we will or no; whereas wee go forward to the olive tree and the vine; and even so it is not alwaies decent & good to entertaine into our familiarite one that is readie to embrace and hang about us; but rather fuch ought we our felves affectionately to embrace whom we have tried to be profitable unto us, and who deferve that we should 20 love and make account of them. And like as Xeuxis the painter answered sometime to those who found fault with him for his flow hand in painting: I confesse indeed (quoth he) that I am long in drawing a picture, for I purpose that my worke should continue long; and even so that friendship and familiaritie is like to last and be preserved long which was a good while in proofe and triall. Is it then no case matter to make triall and choise of many friends together? and is it no hard thing to converte & keepe companie with many at once, or rather is this also impossible? for furely it is converfation and fellowihip, whereby we enjoy the benefit of friendthip, and the most sweet and pleasant fruit of amitie consistesth in keeping continuals societie, and daily frequenting one anothers companie, like unto those who uttered these words,

For during life we will not fit in counfell from our friends, Nor yet refolve of doubsfull points before we know their minds.

As Homer reporteth in one place: and in another Menelaw speaking of Ulysses, faith thus, Nought else us twaine our mutuall love, and pleasures shall depars Untill death close up hoth our cies and strike us to the bart.

But this pluralitie of friends whereof we now speake, seemeth to do cleane contrarie; for whereas the simple amitte of twaine draweth us together, holdeth & uniteth us by frequent and 40 continual conversation, sellowship, and duties of kindenesse.

Much like as when the figtree juice, you put white milke among, It crudles, knits, and bindes the fame, no lesse then rennet strong.

according to the words of Empedoeles; and furely defirous it is to make the femblable union and concorporation: this friendship of many separateth, distractesh and divertesh us, calling and transporting us fundry waies, not permitting the commixture and sodering (as it were) of good will and kinde affection to grow into one, and make a perfect joint by familiar convertation, enclosing & fastning every part together. But the same anon bringesth with all a great 19 inequalitie in offices and reciprocall services meet for friends, and breedeth a certeine soolish bashfulnesse and streining of courtesse in the performance thereof, for by occasion of many friends those parts in amitie, which otherwise are case and commodious, become difficult and incommodious: And why?

All men do not agree in humor one, and no matvell, for our verie natures do not all incline in affection the fame way; neither are we

at all times conversant and acquainted with the like fortunes and adventures. To say nothing of their fundrie occasions and occurrences which serve not indifferently for all our actions: but like as the windes unto failers, they are with fome and against others; fometimes on our backes and other whiles full in our face. And fay that it may fall out fo, that all our friends at once do fland in need, and be defirous of one and the fame helpe and ministerie at our hands, it were verie hard to fit all their turnes and fatisfie them to their content; whether it be in taking out advice and counfell in any negotiations, or in treating about State matters, or in fuite after dignities, places of government, or in feasting and entertaining strangers in their houses: But suppose that at one & the same instant, our friends being diversly affected & troubled with sunto drie affaires, request all of them together our helping hand; as for example, one that is going to fea for to have our companie in that voiage; another who being defendant & to answere for himselfe in the law, to assist him in the court; and a third that is a plaintife, to second him in his plea; a fourth who either is to buy or fell, for to helpe him to make his markets; a fift who is to marrie for to facrifice with him, and be at his wedding dinner; and a fixt, who is to inter a dead corps for to mourne & folemnize the funerals with him: in such a medley and confusion as this, as if according to Sophocles:

A citie fmoakt within sence sweet, And ring with songs for murth someet, With plaints also and groanes resound, And all in one and selfe same stound.

Certes having so many friends, to affish and gratifie them all were impossible, to pleasure more were absurd, and in serving ones turne to reject many others, were offensive and hurtful; for this is a rule:

Who to his friend is well affected, Loves not himselfe to be neglected.

and yet commonly fuch negligences and forgetfull defaults of friends, we take with more patience, and put up with leffe anger and displeasure, when they shall come to excuse themselves by oblivion making these and such like answeres. Surely, you were but forgotten; it was out of my head, and I never thought of it: but he that shall alledge thus and fay: I was not your affistant in 30 the court, nor stood to you in your cause, by reason that I attended another friend of mine in a triall of his; or I came not to visite you whiles you had an ague, for that I was busilie employed ata feast, that such a one made to one of his friends; excusing his negligence to one friend, by his diligence to others; furely he maketh no fatisfaction for the offence already taken, but increaleth the fame and maketh it woorfe than before, by reason of jealousie added thereto; howbeit most men as it should seeme aime at nothing elsebut at the profit and commoditie which friendship bringeth and yeeldeth from without, & never regard what care it doth imprint and worke within; neither remember they that he whose turne hath beene served by many friends, must likewise reciprocally be ready to helpe them as their need requireth. Like as therefore the giant Briaress with his 100 hands feeding 50 bellies, had no more fustenance for his whole bo-40 diethan we, who with two hands furnish and fill one belly; even so the commoditie that wee have by many friends bringeth this discommoditie withall, that we are to be emploied also to many, in taking part with them of their griefs and paffions, in travailing and in being troubled together with them in all their negotiations and affaires: for we are not to give care unto Euripides the poet when he faith thus,

> In mutuall love men ought a meaneto keepe, That it souch not heart roote nor marrow deepe, Affections for to change it well befits, To rise and fall,now hot now coole by fits.

giving us to understand that friendship is to be used according as need requireth more or lesse, so like to the helme of a ship, which both holdesh it hard, and also giveth head, or the tackling which spread and draw, hoise and strike saile, as occasion serveth. But contrariwise, rather (good Euripides) we may turne this speech of yours to emittie, & admonish men that their quartels & contentions be moderate and enter not to the heart and inward marrow (as it were) of the soule, that hatted (I say) and malice, that anger, offences, defiances, and suspitions, be so intertained as that they may be soone appeased, laid downe & forgotten. A better precept is that yet of Pytha-goras, when he teacheth us not to give our right hand to many that is to say, not to make many men our friends, nor to affect that popular amitie common to all, and exposed or offred to every one that commeth, which no doubt cannot chuse but bring many passions with it into the heart, among which, to be diffquieted for a friend, to condole or grieve with him, to control into troubles, and to plunge ones felfe into perils for his fake, are not very easie matters to be borne by those that carie an ingenuous minde with them, and be kind-hearted; but the faying of wife Chilon a profession of philosophie is most true, who answering unto a man that vaunted how he had not an enimie; It thould feeme then (quoth he) that thou haft never a friend; for certeinly enunties enfue presently upon amities, nay they are both interlaced together; neither is it the part of a friend not to feele the injuries done unto a friend, nor to participate with him in all ignomines, harred, and quarrels that he incurreth; and one enimie evermore will be fure to fulfect the friend of another, yea and be ready to malice him; as for friends oftentimes they to envie their owne friends, they have them in jealoufie, and traduce them every way. The oracle answered unto Timesian when he consulted about the planting and peopling of a new colonie in this wife:

Thou think's to lead a swarme of bees full kind. But angree waspes, thou shalt them shortly find.

Semblablic they that feeke after a bee-hive (as it were) of friends, light ere they be aware upona walpes nell of enimies: where there is a great ods and difference even in this, that the revenging remembrance of an enimie for wrong done, over-weigheth much the thankfull memorie of a friend for a benefit received; and whether this be true or no, confider in what maner Alexander the great entreated the friends of Philotas and Parmenio; how Dionysius the tyrant used the fami- 10 liars of Dion; after what fort Nero the emperor dealthy the acquaintance of Plantus; or Tiberius Cafar by the wel-willers of Sejanus, whom they caused all to be racked, tortured and put to death in the end. And like as the costly jewels of golde, and the rich apparell of king Creons daughter, ferved him in no flead at all, but the fire that tooke holde thereof, flaming light out fuddenly, borned him when he ran unto her to take her in his armes, and so consumed father and daughter together; even so you shall have some, who having never received any benefit at all by the prosperitie of their friends, are entangled notwithstanding in their calamities, and perish topethe with them for companie; a thing that ordinarily and most of all they are subject unto, who be men of profession, great clearks, and honourable personages. Thus Thesew, when Perithow his friend was punished and lay bound in prison

> Wich fetters sure to him tied was. Farre stronger than of yron or braffe.

Thueydides also writeth; That in the great pestilence at Athens, the best men and such as made greatest profession of vertue, were they who did most with their friends that lay sicke of the plague: for that they never spared themselves, but went to visit and looke to all those whom they loved and were familiarly acquainted with. And therfore it is not meet to make so little regard and reckoning of vertue, as to hang and fasten it upon others, without respect, and (as they fay) hand over head, but to referve the comunication thereof to those who be worthy; that isto fay, unto fuch who are able to love reciprocally, and know how to impart the like againe. And verily, this is the greatest contrariety and opposition which crosseth pluralitie of friends, in that 40 amitie in deed is bred by fimilitude and conformitie: for confidering that the very brute bealts not endued with reason, if a man would have to ingender with those that are of divers kinds, are brought to it by force, and thereto compelled, informuch, as they shrinke, they couch downe upon their knees, and be ready to flee one from another; whereas contrariwife, they take pleafure and delight to be coupled with their like and of the fame kinde, receiving willingly and enterteining their companie in the act of generation, with gentleneffe and good contentment: how is it possible that any found and perfect friendship should grow betweene those who are in behaviour quite different, in affections divers, in conditions opposite, and whole course of life tendeth to contrary or fundry ends? True it is, that the harmonie of musicke, whether it be in long or inftrument, both fymphony by antiphony (that is to fay) the accord arifeth from discord and 50 of contrarie notes is composed a sweet tune, so as the treble and the base concurre, after a sort, (I wot not how) & meet together, bringing forth by their agreement that found which pleafeth the eare: but in this confonance and harmonic of friendflip, there ought to be no part unlike or unequall, nothing obscure and doubtfull, but the same should be composed of all things agreeable, to wit, the fame will, the fame opinion, the fame counfell, the fame affection, as if one foule were parted into many bodies. And what man is he, so laborious, so mutable, so variable, and apt to take every fashion & form? who is able to frame unto all patterns, and accommodate himselfe to so many natures, and will not rather be ready to laugh at the Poet Theogras, who giveth this leffon:

Put on a minde (I thee do wish) As variable as Polype fish, Who ay refemble will the roch, To which he neerely doth approch.

and yet this change and transmutation of the said polype or pourcuttle fish, entreth not deeply in but appeareth superficially in the skin, which by the closenesse or laxitie thereof, as he drawes it in or lets it out, receiveth the defluctions of the colours from those bodies that are neere unto 10 it; whereas amittes do require that the maners, natures, passions, speeches, studies, defires and inclinations may be conformable; for otherwife to doe, were the propertie of a Proteum, who was neither fortunate nor yet verie good and honest, but who by enchantment and forcerie could eftloones transforme himselse from one shape to another in one and the same instant; and even so he that enterteineth many friends, must of necessitie be conformable to them all; namely, with the learned and studious, to be ever reading; with professours of wrestling, to beftrew his bodie with dust (as they doe) for to wrestle; with hunters, to hunt; with drunkards, to quaffe and caroufe; with ambitious citizens, to fue and manage for offices, without any fetled mansion (as it were) of his owne nature for his conditions to make abode in. And like as naturall Philosophers do holde: That the substance or matter that hath neither forme nor any coao lour, which they call Materia prima, is a subject capable of all formes, and of the owne nature fo apt to alter and change, that fometimes it is ardent and burning, otherwhiles it is liquid and moilt; now rare and of an airie substance, and afterwards againe groffe and thicke, relembling the nature of earth; even fo must the minde applied to this multiplicitie of friends, bee subject to many passions, fundry conditions, divers affections pliable, variable and apt to change from one fashion to another. Contrariwise, simple friendship and amitie betweene twaine, requireth a staied minde, a firme and constant nature, permanent and abiding alwaies in one place, and reteining still the same fashions; which is the reason that a fast and affured friend is very geafon and hard to be found.

OF FORTVNE.

The Summarie.

og Ong time hash this Proverbe beene currant, That there is nothing in this world but good fortune and misfortune. Some have expounded and taken it thus; as if all things were carried by meere chance and aventure, or mooved and driven by inconfiant fortune, an idole forged in their brane, for that they were ignorant in the providence of the True God who conducteth ordinarily all things in this world by second causes and Subalterne meanes, yea the verie motion, will and workes of men, for the execution of his ordinance and purpose. Now Plutarch not able to arise and reach up to this divine and heavenly wisedome hidden from his knowledge, staieth below; and yet poore Pagan and Eihnike though he were, he consuteth that dangerous opinion of Fortune; shewing that it taketh away all distinction of good and evill, quen-10 cheth and putterhout the light of mans life, blending and confounding vice and vertue together. Afterwards he proovesh that prudence and wisedome, over-rules his blind fortune, by considering the maistrie and dominion that man hath above beasts: the arts also and sciences whereof he maketh profession, together with his judgement and will directly opposite and contrarie to all casualties and changes.

OF FORTVNE.

Lind fortune rul's mans life alway, Sage counsell therein beares no sway, faid one (who ever it was) that thought all humane actions depended upon meer casualtie, and were not guided by wisedome. What? and hath justice and equitie no place at all in this world? can temperance and modestie do nothing in the direction and managing of our affaires? Came it from fortune; and was it indeed by meere chance that Aristides made choise to continue in povertie, when it was in his power to make himselse a Lord of much wealth and many goods? or that Scipio when he had forced Carthage, tooke not to himselfe, nor so much as saw any part of all that pillage? And was it long of fortune, or by casualty that Philogrates having received of King Philip a great summe of gold, bought there. with harlots and daintie fishes? or that Lasthenes and Euthycrates betraied the citie Olymbus measuring soveraigne good and felicity of man by belly-cheere, and those pleasures which of all other be most dishonest and infamous? And shall we say, it was a worke of fortune that Akx. ander, some of Philip, not onely himselfe forbare to touch the bodies of the captive women taken in war, but also punished all such as offred them violence and injurie: and contrativise, 10 came it by ill lucke and unhappie fortune, that another Alexander the sonne of King Priamus flept and lay with his friends wife, when he lodged and entertained him in his house, and not only fo, but carried her away with him, and by that occasion brought all manner of calamitie upon two maine parts of the continent, to wit, Europe and Asia, and filled them both with those mileries that follow warres?

If we graunt that all these occurrents came by fortune, what should let us, but we might as well fay that cats, goats and apes be likewife by fortune given to be alwaies lickorous, lecherous, shrewd and sawcy. But in case it be true (as true it is) that the world hath in it temperance, justice and fortitude; what reason is there to say, that there is no prudence and wisdome therein? nowif it be yeelded that the world is not void of prudence: how can it be maintained that there should 30 not be in it sage counsell? For temperance (as some say) is a kinde of prudence; and most certeine it is, that justice should be affissed by prudence; or to say more truely, ought to haveit present with her continually. Certes, sage counsell & wisdome in the good use of pleasures and delights, whereby we continue honest, we ordinarily do call continence and temperance; the fame in dangers and travels, we tearmetolerance, patience and fortitude; in contracts and management of State affaires we give the name of loialtie, equitie and justice; whereby it commeth to paffe, that if we will attribute the effects of counfell and wifedome unto fortune, we must likewise ascribe unto her the works of justice and temperance. And so (beleeve me) to rob and steale, to cut purses, and to keepe whores, must proceed from fortune; which if it be so, let us abandon all discourse of our reason, and betake our selves wholly to fortune to be driven and ca-40 ried to and fro at her pleasure like to the dust, chaffe, or sweepings of the floore, by the puffes of fome great wind. Take away fage & discreet counsell; farewel then all consultation as touching affaires, away with deliberation, confideration and inquifition into that which is behovefull and expedient: for furely then, Sophocles talked idlely, and knew not what he spake in saying thus:

Seeke, and be fure to finde with diligence, But loofe, what you for-let by negligence.

And in another place where dividing the affaires of man he faith in this wife:

What may be taught, I strive to learne; what may likewise be found I feeke, for wishes all I pray, and would to God be bound.

Nowwould I gladly know, what is it that men may finde and what can they learne, in case all things in the world be directed by fortune? What Senate house of citie would not be diffolved and abolished? what counsell chamber of Prince should not be overthrowen and put downe, if all were at the disposition of fortune? we doe her wrong in reproching her for blindesse, when we runne upon her as we doe, blinde, and debasing our selves unto her; for how can wee chuse but stumble upon her indeed, if we plucke out our owne cies, to wit, our wisdome & dexteritie of counfell, and take a blinde guide to lead us by the hand in the courfe of this our life? Certes, this were even as much, as if fomeone of us should fay, the action of those that see, is fortune, and not fight or cies, which Plato calleth ewooden, that is, Light bearers : the action likewife of them that heare, is nothing elfe but fortune, and not a naturall power and facultie to receive the stroke or repercussion of the aire, carried by the care and the braine. But better it were (I trow) and so will everie wise bodie thinke to take heed how to discredit our senses so, as to submit them to fortune: For why? Nature hath bestowed upon us fight, hearing, taste and finelling, with all the parts of the body indued with the rest of their powers and faculties, as ministers of counfell and wifedome. For it is the foule that feeth, it is the foule & understanding that hea-10 reth, all therest are dease and blinde: and like as if there were no finne at all we should (for all the starres besides) live in perpetual night as Heraelitus saith; even so if man had not reason and intelligence, notwithstanding all his other senses, he should not differ in the whole race of his life from brute and wilde beafts; but now in that we excell and rule them all, it is not by chance and fortune: but Prometheus (that is to fay) the use and discourse of reason is the very cause that hath given us in recompence

Both horse and asse, with breed of beefs so strong

To cary us, and ease our labour long. according as we read in Aefelylus the poet. For a finish as otherwise fortune and nature both have beene more favourable, and beneficiall to most of the brute beasts in their entrance into 20 this life, than unto man; for armed they be with hornes, tusks, spurs, and stings; moreover as Empedocles faith,

The Urchin firikes with many a pricke, Which grow on backe both sharpe and thicke.

Againe there be many beafts clad and covered with scales and share; shod also with claws and hard hoofes: onely man as Plato faith is abandoned and for faken by nature, all naked, unarmed, unfhod, and without any vesture whatsoever, and that is, the use of reason, industrie, and providence.

But by one gift which she hath given, Amends | ve makes, and all is even.

For strength of mortall man is small, His lims but weake and finewes all: Yet by his wit and quick conceit, By cunning casts and subtill sleight, No beast in sea, or mount, so fell,

So wilde, or flie, but be doth quell. What beaft more nimble, more light and fwift than is the horse; but for man it is that he runneth in the race: the dogge is couragious and eager in fight, but it is in the defence of man: fishes yeeld a most delicate and sweet meat; and swine be full of good flesh, but both of them ferve as viands for the food and nourifhment of man: what creature is bigger or more wat-40 ble to fee to than is the elephant? howbeit he maketh man sport and pastime, he is shewed as a goodly fight in festivall folemnities where people bee affembled, he is taught to friske and daunce his measures, to fall upon his knees likewise and do reverence: and verily these and such likesleights and examples are exhibited not in vaine nor without good profit, but to this end, that thereby we may know how farfoorth reason & wisedome doth advance and lift up a man, above what things it maketh him furmount, and how by meanes thereof he ruleth all, and furpaffeth all:

> As fight with fists we are not good, nor yet intripping feet, In wrestling we may well be blam'd, our running is not fleet.

But in all these seats we are inseriour to brute beasts, howbeit for experience, memorie, wisedome and artificiall fleights (as Anaxagor as faid) wee go beyond them all, and thereby wee have the mastrie and use of them, making them to serve our turnes: we streine honie out of the combes of bees; we preffemilke out of beafts udders; we rob and spoile them; we drive and carie them away and whatfoever they have, infomuch as in all this there is nothing that can be justly auributed to forme, but all proceeds from counsell and fore-cast.

Furthermore, the works of carpenters are done by hand of man, so are they also of smithes and braffers, of masons, builders, gravers and imagers: in all which there is nothing to bee feene, that a man can say is done by chaunce or fortune, at leastwise when it is wrought absolutely and as it should be. And say that it may sall out otherwhiles that a good artisan, whether he be a cutter in brasse or a mason, a finith or a carpenter, may meet with fortune and doe some little thing by chance; yet the greatest peeces of worke, and the most number are wrought and sinished respectively by their arts, which a certaine poet hath given us secretly to understand by these verses,

March on your way ech artifane Who live upon your handy craft, On foorth I fay in comely traine, Your facred panniers beare aloft; Tou that Ergane dread and feare The daughter grim of Iupiter.

For this Ergane (that is to fay Minerva) all artifanes and artificers acknowledge and honor for their patronesse, and not fortune. True it is that the report goes of a certeine painter, who drawing the picture of an horse, had done veriewell in all respects, both in portraiture and also colours, save onely that he pleased not himselfe in painting the some and swelling froth which useth to gather about the bit as hee champeth upon the same, and so falleth from his mouth when he snuffeth and bloweth; this I say he liked not, neither thought he it workmanly done, insomuch as hee wiped it out many times and began it a new; but never was it to his a mind; at last in a pelting chase because it would frame no better, he takes me his spung sull as titwas of colours, and stang it against the table wherein hee wrought; but see the woondessull chance; this spunge lighting as it did upon the right place, gave such a print, and dashed so, as that it represented the froth that he so much desired most lively; and to my remembrance there is not in anie historie set downe an artificiall thing but this that fortune ever did,

Artificers use altogether in everie piece of worke, their squires, their rules, their lines and leavels; they goe by measures and numbers, to the end that in all their workes there should not be any thing found done either rashly or at aventure. And verily these arts are petie kindes of Prudence and so called; or rils and riverets flowing from Prudence, or certaine parcels rather of it, sprinkled and dispersed among the necessities of this life and thus much is covertly signi-30 fied by the fable of the fire that Prometheus divided by sparkles, which flew some heere some there; for femblahy, the small parcels and fragments of wisedome, being cut into fundrie portions, are ranged into their feverall ranks and become arts. A woonderfull thing how thefe arts and sciences thould have no dealing with Fortune nor need her helpe, for to attain unto their proper ends; and yet Prudence which is the greatest foveraigne and most perfect of themall, yea and the verie height of all the glorie, reputation, and goodnesse of man, should be just nothing. In the winding up and letting downe of the strings of an instrument, there is one kind of wisdome, and that is called Musicke; in the dressing and ordering of meates and viands there is another, which they name Cookerie; in washing and scouring of clothes and garments there is a third, to wit, the fullers craft. As for our little children, we teach them to draw on their shooes, 40 to make them readic and dreffe themselves in their clothes decently, to take meat in their right hand, and to hold bread in the left; an evident argument and proofe, that even fuch small matters as these, depend not of chance and fortune, but require skill and heed taking. Shall we say then that the greatest and most principall things that are, even those that be most materiall and necessarie for mans felicitie, use not wisedome, norparticipate one whit with providence and the judgement of reason? There is no man so blockish and voide of understanding, that after he hath tempered clay and water together, lets it alone and goeth his way when he hath fo done, looking that of the owne accord, or by fortune there will be bricks or tiles made thereof: neither is any one fuch a for, as when he hath bought wool & leather, fits him downe & praies unto fortune, that thereof he may have garments or (hooes: and is there any man fo foolish thinke you? 50 who having gathered together a great maffe of gold and filver, gotten about him a mightiered tinue of flaves and fervants, and being poffeffed of divers faire and stately houses with many a doore within and without, and those surely locked on everie side, having before him in his eiefight a fort of fumptuous beds with their rich and costly furniture, and of tables most precious, will repose soveraigne felicitie therein, or thinke that all this can make him to live happily, without paine, without griefe, secure of chaunge and alteration, if he have not wisedome withall? Statute Court 36.7

There was one that cavilled upon a time with Captaine Iphierases, and by way of reptoch & minding to proove that he was of no reckoning, demaunded what he was? For (quoth he) you are not a man at armes, nor archer, nor yet targuetier: I am not indeed I confesse (quoth Iphierates, but I am he who commaund all these, and employ them as occasion serveth; even so wisedome, is neither gold nor filver, it is not glorie or riches, it is not health, it is not strength, it is not beautie: what is it then? Surely even that which can skill how to use all these, and by means whereof each of these things is pleasant, honorable and prostable; and contrariwise, without which, they are displeasant, hurtfull and dangerous, working his destruction and dissonor who possesses the means and therefore right good counsell gave Promethem in Hessalus to his broto ther Epimethem in this one point:

Receive no gifts at any time, which heavenly Iove shall fend: But feethou do refuse them all, and backe againe them send.

Meaning thereby these outward goods of fortunes gift, as if he would have said: Goe not about to play upon a Flute, if thou have no knowledge in Musicke; nor to reade if thou know never a letter in the booke; mount not on horsebacke, unless thou canst tell how to fit him and ride; and even so he advised him thereby, not to seeke for office and place of government in common-weale, wanting wit as he did; nor to lay for tiches, so long as he bare a coverous minde and 20 wish not how to be liberall; nor to matrie a wise, for to bee his maister and to lead him by the nose: for not onely wealth and prosperite hapning above desert unto unadvised solke, giveth occasion (as Demosthenes said) unto them for to commit many sollies; but also wordly happines beyond all reason and demerit, causeth such as are not wise, to become unhappie and miserable in the end.

OF ENVIE AND HATRED.

The Summarie.

No this briefe Treatise concerning Envise and Hatred, Plutarch after he hath seewed in generall tearnes, that they be two different vices, and declared withat the properties of the one and the other, prooveth this difference by diversreasions and arguments ranged in their order: he discovereth the nature of envious persons and malicious; and showesh by a proper similitude that the greatest personages in the world, he secured from the clawes and pawes of envious persons, and yet for althat, sease not to have many enemies. And verily it semeth that the Author began this little worke, especially for to beat downe envise, and that the infamine thereof might so much more appeare; in somparing and matching it with than other desestable vice, the which notwith standing be saith is less and the set.

OF ENVIE AND HATRED.

T feemeth at the first fight, that there is no difference betweene envie and hatted, but that they be both one. For vice (to speake in generall) having (as it were) many hookes or crotchets, by meanes thereof as it stirreth to and fro, it yeeldeth unto those passions which hang thereto many occasions and opportunities to catch holde one of another, and so to be knit and enterlaced one within the other; and the same verily (like unto difeases of the body) have a sympathic and fellow-feeling one of anothers distemperature and inflammation; for thus it commeth to passe, that a malicious and spightfull man is as much grieved and offended at the prosperitie of another, as the envious person: and so we holde, that benevolence and good will is opposite unto them both, for that it is an affection of a man, withing good unto his neighbour; and envie in this respect resembleth hatred, for that they have both a will and intention quite contrary unto love: but for a smuch as no things like to the same, and the resemblances between them be not so effectuall to make them all one, as the differences to distinguish them a sunder; let us search and examine the said differences, beginning at the very source and original of these pass as Hatted then, is ingendred and arifeth in our heart upon an imagination and deepe apptehenfion that we conceive of him whom we hate, that either he is naught & wicked in general to every man, or els intending mischiese particularly unto our selves : for commonly it falleth out, that those who thinke they have received some injurie at such an oneshand, are disposed to hate him, yea, and those whom otherwise they know to be maliciously bent and wont to hurt others, although they have not wronged them, yet they hate and can not abide to looke upon them with patience; whereas ordinarily they beare envie unto fuch onely as feeme to prosper and to live in better state than their neighbours: by which reckoning it should seeme that envie is a thing indefinite, much like unto the difease of the cies Ophthalmia, which is offended with the 30 brightnesse of any light whatsoever; whereas hatred is determinate, being alwaies grounded upon some certeine subject matters respective to it selfe, and on them it worketh. Secondly, our hatred doeth extend even to brute beaths; for some you it all have, who naturally abhorre and can not abide to fee cats nor the flies cantharides, nor todes, nor yet fnakes and any fuch ferpents. As for Germanicus Cafar, he could not of all things abide either to fee a cocke or to heare him crow. The Sages of Persia called their Magi, killed all their mice and rats, aswell for that themselves could not away with them but detested them, as also because the god (for sooth) whom they worthipped, had them in horror. And in trueth, all the Arabians and Aethiopians generally, holde them abominable. But envie properly is betweene man and man; neither is there any likelihood at all, that there should be imprinted envie in favage creatures one against 40 another; because they have not this imagination and apprehension, that another is either fortunate or unfortunate, neither be they touched with any fenfe of honour or dishonour; which is the thing that principally and most of all other giveth an edge, and whetteth on envie; whereas it is evident that they hate one another, they beare malice and mainteine enmitte, nay, they go to warre as against those that be disloiall, treacherous, and such as are not to be trusted: form this wife doe eagles warre with dragons, crowes with owles, and the little nonnet or tit-moule fighteth with the linner, infomuch, as by report, the very bloud of them after they be killed, will not mingle together; and that which is more, if you feeme to mixe them, they will feparate and run apart againe one from the other: and by all likelihood, the hatred that the lion hath to the cocke, and the elephant also unto an hogge, proceedeth from feare : for lightly that which crea- 10 tures naturally feare, the fame they also hate; so that herein also a man may affigne and note the difference betweene envie and hatred, for that the nature of beafts is capable of the one but not of the other.

Over and besides, no man deserveth justly to be envied: for to be in prosperitie and in better state than another, is no wrong or injurie offered to any person; and yet this is it for which men be envied; whereas contrariwise, many are hated worthily, such as those whom in Greeke we call a synunity withat is to say, worthy of publike hatred; as also as many as do not she from such, detels a series.

them not nor abhorte their companie. And a great argument to verific this point, may be gathered from hence, namely, in that fome there be who confesse and take it upon them, that they hate many; but no man will be knowen that he envieth any: for in trueth, the hatred of wicked persons and of wickednesse; is commended as a quallitie in men praise-woorthy. And to this purpose serveth well that which was said of Chirillum, who reigned in Sparta, and was Lyenrgus his brothers sonne, whom when there were certeine that commended for a man of milde behaviour and of a relenting and gende nature: And how can it be (quoth he who was joined which him in the roiall government) that Charillum should be good, seeing he is not sharpe and rigorous to the wicked. And the Poet Homer describing the desormitie of Therspees his bodie, despainted his desects and impersections in sundrie parts of his person, and by many circumslocutions; but his perverse nature and crooked conditions he set downe briefly and in one word in this wise:

Worthy Achilles of all the hoft And fage Ulystes, he hased most.

for he could not chuse but be starke naught and wicked in the highest degree, who was so fullos hatred unto the best men. As for those who denie that they are envious, in case they be convinced manifeftly therein, they have a thousand pretenses and excuses therefore, alledging that they are angry with the man, or fland in feare of him whom indeed they beare envie unto, or that they hate him, colouring and cloaking this passion of envic with the vaile of any other to whatfoever for to hide and cover it, as if it were the only malady of the foule, that would be concealed and diffembled. It cannot chuse therefore, but that these two passions be nourished and grow as plants of one kinde, by the fame meanes, confidering that naturally they succeed one the other: howbeit, wee rather hate those that be given more to leawdnesse and wickednesse, and we envy fuch rather who seeme to excel others in vertue. And therfore Themislocles (being but a youth) gave out and faid, that he had done nothing notable, because as yet he was not enyied: for like as the flies cantharides fettle principally upon that wheat which is the fairest and come to full perfection; and likewise sticke unto the roses that are most out, and in the verice pride of their flowring; even fo envie taketh commonly unto the best conditioned persons, and to fuch as are growing to the height of vertue and honour: whereas contrariwife the leawdest 30 qualities that be, and wicked in the highest degree doe mightily moove and augment hatred: andheereupon it was that the Athenians had them in fuch deteftable hatred, and abhorted them so deadly, who by their flanderous imputations brought good Socrates their fellow-citizento his death, infomuch as they would not vouchfafe either to give them a coale or two of fire, or light their candles, or deine them an answer when they asked a question; nay they would notwash or bathe together with them in the same water, but commanded those servitours in the baines which were called Parachyte, that is to fay, drawers and laders of water into the bathing veffels, to let foorth that as polluted and defiled, wherein they had washed; whereupon they feeing themselves thus excommunicate and not able to endure this publike harred which they had incurred, being wearie of their lives, hung and strangled themselves. On the contrary 40 fide it is often feene, that the excellency of vertue, honor and glory, and the extraordinarie fuccesse of men is so much, that it doth extinguish and quench all envie. For it is not a likely or credible matter that any man bare envie unto Cyrus or Alexander the great, after they were become the onely lords and monarches of the whole world: but like as the funne when he is directly and plumb over the head or top of any thing, causeth either no shadow at all, or the same very finall and short by the reason that his light overspreadeth round about; even so when the prosperitie of a man is come to the highest point and have gotten over the head of envie, then the faid envie retireth and is either gone altogether, or else drawen within a little roome by reason of that brightnesse over-spreading it: but contrariwise the grandence of fortune and puissance in the enimies, doth not one jot abreviate or allay the hatred of their evill willers; and sothat this is true, may appeare by the example of Alexander about named, who had not one that envied him, but many enimies he found and those malicious, and by them in the end, he was traiteroufly for-laied and murdered.

Semblably, adverfities may well flaie envie and cause it cease, but enmitte and hatred they do not abolith; for men never give over to despite their enimies, no not when they are brought lowe and oppressed with calamities; whereas you shall not see one in miserie envied. But most true is that saying found of a certeine sophister or great profession in our daies: That envious persons of all other be ever pittifull and delight most in commiseration: so that heerein lieth one of the greatest differences betweene these two passions; that hatred departeth not from those persons of whom it hath once taken hold, neither in the prosperitie nor adversitie of those whom they hate; whereas envie doth avoid and vanish away to nothing upon extremitie aswell of the one as the other.

Over and besides we may the better discover the difference also of them by the contraries: for hatred, enmitie, and malice cease presently so soone as a man is perswaded that he hath caught no harmonor susteined injurie by the party; or when he hath conceived an opinion that such as he hated for their leawdnesse are reformed and become honest men; or thirdly if he have te ceived some pleasure or good turne at their hand; for evermore the last favor that is shewed(as Thueydides faith) though it be leffe than many others, yet if it come in feafon and a good time, is able to do out a greater offence taken before. Now of these three causes before specified, the first doth not wash away envie; for say that men were perswaded at the first that they received no mongacall, yearhay give not over for all that to beare envie still: and as for the two later they do irritate and provoke it the rather: for fuch as they esteeme men of qualitie and good woorth, those they doe cie-bite more than before, as having vertue the greatest good that is: and notwithstanding that they do reape commoditie & find favour at their hands, who prosper more than they; yet they grieve and vexe thereat, envying them still both for their good mind to benefit them, and for their might and abilitie to performe the fame; for that the one procesdeth from vertue, and the other from an happie estate, both which are good things,

We may therefore conclude, that envie is a passion farre different from hatred, since it is to that wherewith the one is appealed and mollified, the other is made more exasperate and gree. vous. But let us confider a little in the end the scope and intention aswel of the one as the other. Certes the man that is malicious, purposeth fully to do him a mischiese whom he hateth; so that this passion is defined to be a disposition and forward will to spic out an occasion & opportunitie to wait another a shrewd turne; but surely this is not in envie: for many there be who have an envious eie to their kinsfolke and companions, whom they would not for all the good in the world fee either to perish or to fall into any greevous calamitie; onely they are greeved to see them in such prosperitie, and would impeach what they can their power, and ecclypsethe brightnesse of their glorie; mary they would not procure nor desire their utter overthrow, nor any diffresses remedilesse or extreame miseries; but it would content and suffice them to take to downe their height, and as it were the upmost garret or turret of an high house which overlooketh them.

HOWAMANMAY RECEIVE PROFIT BY HIS ENEMIES.

The Summarie.

Mong the dangerous effects of envie and haved, this is not the least nor one of the last, that they shoot (as it were) from wishin our adversaries, for to slide and enter into w and take possession in our hearts, making us beleeve that we shall impeach one evill by so another; which is as much as to defire to cleanse one ordure by a new, and to quench a great fire by putting into it plentie of oile. As for hatred it hath another effect nothing leffe pernicious, in that it maketh us blinde, and caufeth us that we can not tell at which end of turning to take our enemies, nor know our selves how to reenter into the way of vertue. Plutarch willing to cus off such effects by the helpe of morall Philosophie, taketh occasion to begin this discourse with a sentence of Xenophon; and prooveth in the first place by divers similatudes: That a manmay take profit by his enemies: and this he laieth abroad in particulars, shewing that their ambushes and manistions serve min very great stead. After this, he teacheth in the true way how to be reveneed of those that hate us, and what we ought to consider in blaming another. Now for asmuch as our life is lubject to many injuries and calumniations, he instructeth us how a man may turne all to his owne commoditie : which done, he presentesh foureremedies and expedient meanes against their standerous language and how we frould confound our enemies: The first is, To comeine our ownet on gues, without rendring evill for evill : the second is, To doe them good, to love and praise their vertues : the third. To out-goethern in well doing : and the last, To provide that vertue remaine alwaies on our side. in fuch fort, that if our enemies be vicious, yet we per fift in doing good; and if they cary some frew and apparence of goodness, we endevour so be indeed and without all comparison better than they.

Profit by our enemies.

HOW A MAN MAY RECEIVE profit by his enemies.

See that you have chosen by your felse (ô Cornelius Pulcher) the meetest course that may be in the government of common wealth; wherein having a principall regard unto the weale-publike, you thew your felfe most gracious and courteous in private to all those that have accesse and repaire unto you. Now for a smuch as a man may well finde fome countrey in the world, wherein there is no venimous beaft, as it is written of Candie, but the management and administration of State affaires was never knowen yet to this day cleere from envie, jealousie, emulation and contention, passions of all other most apt to engender and breed enmities, unto which it is fubica; for that if there were nothing els, even amity & friends hip it selfe is enough to entangle and encomber us with enmitties; which wife Chilon the Sage knowing well enough, demanded upon a time of one (who vaunted that he had no enemies) whether he had not a friend. In regardhereof a man of State and policie, in mine opinon (among many other things wherein he 30 ought to be well studied) should also thorowly know what belongeth to the having of enemies, and give good care unto the faying of Xenophon, namely: That a man of wit and understanding isto make his profit and benefit by his enemies. And therefore having gathered into a pretic Treatife, that which came into my minde of late to discourse and dispute upon this matter, I have fent unto you written and penned in the very fame tearmes as they were delivered, having this eie and regard as much as poffible I could, not to repeat any thing of that which heretofore I had written touching the politike precepts of governing the weale publike, for that I fee that you have that booke often in your hand.

Our fore-fathers in the olde world contented themselves in this: That they might not be wounded or hurt by strange and savage beasts brought from forren countreys, and this was the 40 end of all those combats that they had against such wilde beasts; but those who came after, have learned moreover, how to make use of them; not onely take order to keepe themselves from receiving any harme or dammage by them; but (that which more is) have the skill to draw fome commoditie from them, feeding of their flesh, clothing their bodies with their wooll and haire, curing and healing their maladies with their gall & rennet, arming themselves with their hides and skinnes; infomuch as now from henceforth, it is to be feared (and not without good cause) lest if beasts should faile, and that there were none to be found of men, their life should become brutish, poore, needie and favage. And fince it is so, that whereas other men thinke it fufficient not to be offended or wronged by their enemics, Xenophon writeth: That the wife reape commodity by their adversaries, we have no reason to derogate any thing from his credit, but to So beleeve him in fo faying, yea, and we ought to fearch for the method & art to attaine and reach unto that benefit, as many of us (at least-wife) as can not possibly live in this world without enemies. The husbandman is not able with all his skill to make all fort of trees to cast off their wildenature, and become gentle and domesticall. The hunter can not with all his cunning, make tame and tractable all the favage beafts of the forrest; and therefore they have fought and devised other meanes and uses to make the best of them; the one finding good in barren and fruitlesse plants, the other in wilde and savage beatls. The water of the sea is not porable, but brackish and hurtful unto us, howbeit, fishes are nourished therewith, and it serveth mans turne alfo alfo to transport passengers (as in a waggon) into all parts, and to carrie what soever a man will. When the Satyre would have kissed and embraced fire the first time that ever he sawit, Prome. them admonished him and said:

If thou it touch, t'will burne anon. but it yeeldeth light and heat, and is an instrument serving all arts, to as many as know how to use it well; semblably, let us consider and see whether an enemy being otherwise harmefull and intractable, or at leaft-wise hard to be handled, may not in some fort yeeld as it were a handle to take hold by, for to touch & use him so as he may serve our turne and minister unto us some comodity. For many things there are befides, which be odious, troublefome, comberous, hurtfull to and contrarie unto those that have them or come neere unto them; and yet you see that the ve. rie maladies of the bodie give good occasion unto some for to live at rest and repose; I meane fequestred from affairs abroad, & the travailes presented unto others by fortune, have so exercifed them that they are become thereby strong and hardy: and to say more yet, banishment and losse of goods, hath beene the occasion unto divers, yea and a singular means to give them. felves to their quiet studie & to philosophie; like as Diogenes and Crates did in times past. Zem himselse when newes came unto him that his ship wherein he did venture and trafficke was split and cast away: Thou hast done well by me fortune (quoth he) to drive me againe to my scholars weed. For like as those living creatures which are of a most found and healthfull constitution,& have befides ftrong ftomacks, are able to concoct & digeft the ferpents & fcorpions which they 10 devoure; nay fome of them there be which are nourithed of flones, scales, and shels, converting the fame into their nutriment by the strength and vehement heat of their spirits; whereas such as be delicate, tender, foft, and crasse, are ready to call and vomit if they taste a little breadone ly, or doe but fip of wine; even fo foolith folke doe marre and corrupt even friendship and amitie; but those that are wise can skill how to use enmittee to their commoditie, and make them ferve their turnes. First and formost therefore in my conceit, that which in enmitte is most hurtfull, may turne to be most profitable unto such as be warie and can take good heed : and what is that you will fay? Thine enimic as thou knowest well enough watcheth continually, fpying and prying into all thine actions, he goeth about viewing thy whole life, to fee where he may finde any vantage to take hold of thee, and where thou lieft open that he may affaile and 30 furprise thee; his fight is so quicke that it pierceth not onely through an oke, as Lynceus did, or ftones and shels; but also it goeth quite through thy friend, thy domesticall servants, yea and every familiar of thine with whom thou daily doest converse, for to discover as much as possibly he can what thou doest or goest about; he foundeth and searcheth by underwining and secret waies what thy deffeignes & purposes be. As for our friends, it chaunceth many times that they fall extreme ficke, yea and die thereupon before we know of it, whiles we defer and put off from day to day to go and visit them, or make small reckoning of them; but as touching our enimics we are so observant, that we curiously enquire & hearken even after their very dreames; the diseases, the debts, the hard usage of men to their owne wives, and the untoward life betweene them, are many times more unknowen unto those whom they touch and concerne, 40 than unto their enimie: but aboue all, he sticketh close unto thy faults, inquisitive he is after them and those he traceth especially: and like as the gaies or vultures flie unto the stinking sent of dead carions and putrified carcales, but they have no finell or fent at all of bodies found and whole; even fo those parts of our life which are diseased, naught and ill affected, be they that move an enemie; to these leape they in great haste who are our ill willers, these they seize upon, and are ready to worry and plucke in peeces; and this it is that profiteth us most, in that it compelleth us to live orderly, to looke unto our steps that we tread not awry, that we neither do or fay ought inconsiderately or rashly; but alwaies keepe our life unblameable, as if we observed a most strict and exquisite diet; and verily this heedfull caution repressing the violent passions of our minde in this fort, and keeping reason at home within dores, engendreth a certeine so ftudious desire, an intention and will to live uprightly and without touch: for like as those cities by ordinary warres with their neighbour cities, and by continual expeditions and voiages, leatning to be wife, take a love at length unto good lawes and found government of state; even so they that by occasion of enmity be forced to live soberly, to save themselves from the impuration of idlenesse and negligence, yea, and to do everie thing with discretion and to a good and profitable end, through use and custome shall be brought by little and little (cre they be aware) unto a certeine fetled habit that they cannot lightly trip and do amisse, having their manners framed in passing good order, with the least helping hand of reason and knowledge beside; for they who have evermore readily before their cies this sentence:

Profit by our enemies.

This were alone for Priamus, and his sonnes likewise all, Oh how would they rejoice at heart, in case this should befall.

cettes would quickly be diverted, turned and withdrawne from fuch things, whereat their enimies are wont to joy and laugh a good: fee we not many times stage plaiers, chanters, musicians and fuch artificers in open threaters, who ferve for the celebration of any folemnitie unto to Batchin or other gods, to play their parts careleffely, to come unprovided, and to carie themfelves I know not how negligently, nothing forward to shew their cunning and doe their best, when they are by themselves alone and no other of their owne profession in place? but if it chance that there be emulation and contention betweene them and other concurrents who shall do best; then you shall see them not onely to come better prepared themselves, but also with their instruments in very good order; then shall you perceive how they will bestir themfelves in trying their strings, in tuning their instruments more exactly, & in fitting every thing about their flutes and pipes, and affaying them. Hee then who knoweth that he hath an enimie ready and provided to be the concurrent in his life, and the rivall of his honour and reputation, will looke better to his waies and stand upon his owne guard; he will (I fay) sit fast and oolooke circumspectly about him to all matters, ordering his life and behaviour in better fort : for this is one of the properties of vice, that when we have offended and trespassed, we have more reverence and stand rather in awe of our enemies lest we be shamed by them than of our friends. And therefore Scipio Nasica when some there were that both thought and gave out that the Romane estate was not settled and in safetie, considering that the Carthaginians who were wont to make head against them and keepe them occupied, were now vanquished and defeated, the Athenians likewife fubdued and brought underfubjection: Nay mary (quoth he) for it is cleane contrarie, and even now are we in greatest danger, being at this passe that we have left our selves none to feare, none to reverence.

And hereto moreover, accordeth well the answere that Diogenes made, like a Philosopher 30 and a man of State indeed: One asked him how he should be revenged of his enemie: Marie (quoth he) by being a vertuous and honest man thy selfe. Men seeing the horses of their enemies highly accounted of, or their hounds praised and commended, do grieve thereas, if they perceive also their land well tilled and husbanded, or their gardens in good order, fresh and slowing, they fetch a sigh and forrow for the matter. What (thinke you then) will your enemie do? how will he fare, when you shall be seene a just man, wise and prudent, honest and sober, in words well advised and commendable, in deeds pure and cleane, in diet neat and decent?

Reaping the fruit of wildome and prudence, Sowen in deepe furrow of heart and confcience, From whence there firing and bud continually Counfels full fage, with fruits abundantly.

Pindarius the Poet faid: That those who are vanquished and put to soile, are so tongue-tied, that they can not say a word; howbeit, this is not simply true, nor holdeth in all, but in such as perceive themselves overcome by their enemies, in dilligence, goodnesse, magnanimity, humanity, bounty and beneficence: for these be the things (as Demostheres saith) which stent the tongue, close up the mouth, stop the wind-pipes and the breath, and in one word, cause men to be filent and dumbe.

Resemble not leaved folke, but them out-goe In vertuous deeds, for this thou maist well doe.

Wouldest thou doethine enemie who hateth thee a great displeasure in deed ? Never call 50 him by way of reproch, buggerer, wanton, lassivious, ruffian, seurrile scoffer, or coverous micher; but take order with thy selfe to be an honest man every way, chaste, continent, true indeed and word, courteous and just to all those that deale with thee; but tish ou be directed lan opprobrious speech, and to revile thine enemy, then take thou great heed afterwards that thou come not necre in any wife to those vices which thou reprochest him with, enter into thy selfe, and examine thine owne conscience, search all the corners thereof, looke that there be not in thy soule some putrified matter and rotten corruption, for seare less thine owne vice within may hit thee home, and require thee againe with this verse out of the tragicall Poet:

If thou chance to upbraid thine enemie with ignorance, and call him unlearned, take thou greater paines at thy booke, love thou thy studie better, and get more learning: if thou twit him with cowardife, and name him dastard, stirre up the vigour of thine owne courage the rather. and thew thy felfe a man fo much the more: half thou given him the tearmes of beaftly whote. master or lascivious lecher, wipe out of thy heart the least taint and spot that remaineth hidden therein of concupifcence and fenfuallitie; for nothing is there more shamefull or caufeth grea. ter griefe of heart, than an opprobrious and reprochfull speech returned justly upon the author thereof. And as it seemeth that the reverberation of a light doth more offence unto the feeble it cies; even so those reproches which are retorted and sent backe againe by the trueth, upon a man that blased them before, are more offensive: for no lesse than the North-east winde Canin doth gather unto it clouds; fo doth a bad life draw unto it opprobrious speeches; which Plate knowing well enough, when foever he was prefent in place, and faw other men do any unfeemly or dithonest thing, was woont to retire apart, and say thus secretly unto himselfe: Doe not I all labour other while of this disease? Morcover, he that hath blamed and reproched the life of anot ther, if presently withall he would goe and examine his owne, reforming the same accordingly redreffing and amending all that he findes amiffe, untill he have brought it to a better flate, shall receive some profit by that reproving and reviling of his; otherwise it may both seeme (asitis no leffe indeed) a vaine and unprofitable thing. Commonly men cannot choose but laugh to when they fee either a bald-pate or a bunch-backe to taunt and scoffe at others for the same defects or deformities; and so in trueth, it were a ridiculous thing and a meere mockerie, to blame or reproch another in that, for which he may be mocked and reproched himselfe. Thus Leothe Byzantine cut one home that was crumpt shoulderd and buncht-backt, when he seemed to hit him in the teeth with his dimme and feeble eie-fight: Doest thou twit me (quoth he) by any imperfection of nature incident unto a man, when as thy felfe art marked from heaven, and car riest the divine vengeance upon thy backe? Never then reproove thou an adulterer, if thy selfe be an uncleane wanton with boies; nor feeme thou to upbraid one with prodigalitie, if thoube a covetous miser thy selfe. Alemaon reviled Adrastus (upon a time) in this wise: Thou

A sister hast by parents twaine,

Whose hands her husband deare have slaine.

But what answered Adrassus? He objected not unto him the crime of another, but paicth him home with his owne, after this maner:

But thou thy selfe hast murdered Thine owne kinde mother, who thee bred.

In like fort, when Domitius (upon a time) feemed to reproch Crassus, faying: Is it not true, that when your lamprey was dead which was kept full deintily for you in a stew, you wept therefore? Crassus presently came upon him againe with this bitter reply: And is it not true, that you when you followed three wives of yours one after another to their funerall fire, never shed tearefor the matter? It is not so requisit or necessaries wis (as the vulgar fort doe thinke) that hee who so checketh and rebuketh another; should have a ready wit of his owne, and a naturall gift in doing it, or a loud and big voice, or an audacious and bold face; no, but such an one he ought to be, that cannot be noted and taxed with any vice: for it should seeme that Apollo addressed this precept of his [Know i by selfe] to no person so much as to him who would blame and sinde saute with another; for feare left such men, in speaking to others what they would, heare that agains which they would not. For it happeneth ordinarily as Sophoeles saith: That such an one

Who lets his tongue runne foolifuly, In noting others bitterly, Shall heare himfelfe (unwillingly) The words he gave so wilfully.

Lo what commoditie and profit enfueth upon reproching an enemie.

Neither commeth there leffe good and aduantage unto a man by being reproched by another, and hearing himselfe reviled by his enemies: and therefore it was well and truely saide of Antist benes, that such men as would be saved and become honest, another day ought of necessite to have either good friends, or most spitefull and bitter enemies: for as they with their kind remonstrances and admonitions; so these with their reprochfull tearines were like to reforme their sinfull life. But for assume a maity and friendship now adaies speaketh with a small and low voice when faults thould freely be reprooved, and is very audible and full of words in Battering, altogether mute and dumbe in rebukes and chaftifements; but what femaineth now but that we should heare the truth from the mouth of our enemies ? much like unto Telephini who for default of a physician that was a friend to cure him, was forced to commit his wound on ulcer to the iron head of his enemies speare for to be healed; and even so those that have no well willers that dare freely reprove their faults, must perforce endure with patience the flinging tongue of their enemie and evill willer in chaftifing and rebuking their vices, not regarding to much the intent and meaning of the ill speaker, as the thing it selfe, and the matter that he speaketh; and looke how he who enterprifed the killing of Prometheus the Theffallan, ran him fo to deepe with his fword into the impostume or swelling botch which he had about him, that he let foorth the corruption, and faved his life by the breaking and iffue thereof; even fo for all the world it falleth out many times, that a reprochfull speech delivered in anger or apon evil will is the cause of healing some maladie of the soule, either hidden or unknowne altogether, on elle neglected: but the most part of those who are in this maner reproched, never consider whe ther the vice wherewith they are touched be in them or no, but they looke rather if they can finde some other vice to object unto him, who hath thus chalenged them; and much like unto wreftlers, they never wipe away their owne duft, that is to fay, the reproches that be fallned upon themselves, and wherewith they be defamed, but they bestrew one another with dust, and afterwards trip up one anothers heeles, and tumble downe one upon another, weltering in the 30 fame, and foiling one another therewith: whereas indeed it behooved rather that a man where he findeth himfelfe tainted by his enemie, to endevour for to do away that vice wherewith he is noted and defamed, much rather than to fetch out any spot or steine out of his garment, which hath beene shewed him : and although there be charged upon us some standerous ima putation that is not true; yet nevertheleffe we are to fearch into the occasion whereupon fuch an opprobrious speech might arise and proceed, yea and take heed we must and seare, lest ere webe aware we commit the like or come necre unto that which hath beene objected unto us; Thus for example fake Lacydes king of the Argives, for that hee did weare his haire curiously fer, in maner of a perruke, and because his gate or maner of going, seemed more delicate and nice than ordinary, grew into an ill name and obloquy of effeminate wantomseffe. And Poma 30 prim the great could not avoid the like suspicion, because he used otherwhiles to scratch his head with one finger onely, and yet otherwise he was so farre from feminine wantonnesse and incontinence as any man in the world. Craffin was accused for to have had carnall companie with one of the religious nuns or votaries of Festa, for that being desirous to purchase of her a faire peece of land and house of pleasure which she had, he reforted oftentimes privately unto her, spake with her apart, and perhaps made court unto her for to have her good wil in that respect onely. Posthumia likewise another vestall virgin, for that the was given much to laugh upon a small occasion, and withall would not sticke to enterteine talke with men; more boldly peradventure than became a maiden of her profession, was so deepely suspected of incontinence, that the was brought judicially into question about it, howbeit found unguilty, and ac-40 quit the was; but when Spurius Minutius the high-prieft for the time being, affoiled her and pronounced the sentence of her absolution, minding to dismisse her of the court, he gave her agentle admonition by the way, that from thence forward the should forbeare to use any words leffe modeft & chafte then the carriage of her life was. Themistacles like wife not withfranding he was most innocent indeed, was called into question for treason, because he interteined amitie with Paulanias, lent and wrote oftentimes unto him, and so by that meanes gave suspicion that he minded to betray all Greece. When as therefore thou art charged with a falle crimination by thine enemie, thou must not neglect it and make final account thereof because it is not true, but rather looke about thee and examine what hath beene done or faid, either by thee or anis one of those who affect and love thee, or converse with thee, sounding and tending any way to so that imputation which might give occasion or likelihood thereof, and carefully to beware and avoid the same: for if by adverse and heavy fortune whereunto others have inconsiderately tallen, they are deerely taught what is good for them, as Atterope faith in one tragedie:

Fortune hath taken for her falarie, My decrett goods of which I am bereft, But we fine taught by that great miferie For to be wife, and fo fine hash me left.

What should let or hinder us, but that we may learne by a master that costern us nought and takerly nothing for his teaching (even our enemie) to profit and learne formers has that we knew not before ? for an enemie perceiveth and findeth in us many things more than a friend, by reafon that (as Plate faith) That which loveth is alwains blinde in the thing that is loved a whereas he who hateth us besides that he is very curious and inquisitive into our impersections, he is not meale mouthed (as they fay) nor will spare to speake, but is ready enough to divulge and blace all abroad. King Hierachanced upon a time being at words with one of his enemies to be tolde in reprochfull maner by him of his flinking breath; whereupon being fomewhat difmated in himselfe he was no sooner returned home to his owne house, but he chid his wife; How comes this to passe (quoth he?) what say you to it? how hapneth it that you never sold me of it? the woman being a simple, chaste, & harmlesse dame: Sir (faith she) I had thought all mens breath had fmelled fo. Thus it is plaine, that fuch faults as be object and evident to the fenfes, groffe and corporall, or otherwise notorious to the world, we know by our enemies sooner than byour friends and familiars.

Over and befides, as touching the continence and holding of the tongue, which is not the least point of yertue, it is not possible for a man to rule it alwaies, and bring it within the compaffe and obedience of reason, unlesse by use and exercise, by long custome and painfull labour he have tamed and maftered the woorst passions of the soule, such as anger is tor a wordthan hath escaped is against our willes, which we would gladly have kept in; of which, Homer faith thus and a ball day

Out of the mouth a word did fly For all the range of teeth fast-by.

And a speech that we let fall at aventure (a thing hapning often-times, and especially unto those whose spirits are not well exercised, and who want experience; who runne out, as it were, and breake forth into passions) this (I say) is ordinary with such as be hastic and cholerike, whole judgement is not setled and stated, or who are given to a licentious course of life: for sucha word, being (as divine Place faith) the lightest thing in the world, both gods and men have mamy a time paied a most grievous and heavie penalty; whereas Silence is not only (as Hippocrates faith) good against thirst, but also is never called to account, nor amerced to pay any fine; and that which more is, in the bearing and putting up of taunts and reproches, there is observed in it 20 a kinde of gravitie befeeming the person of Socrates, or rather the magnanimity of Hercules, if it betrue that the Poet faid of him:

Of bitter words he leffe account did make Than dath the flie, which no regard doth take.

Neither verily is there athing of greater gravitie, or fimply better, than to heare a maliciouse nemie to revile, and yet not to be moved nor grow into passions therewith,

But to passe by aman that loves to raile, Asrocke in fea, by which we swimme or faile.

Moreover, a greater effect will enfue upon this exercise of patience, if thou canst accustomethy felfe to heare with filence thine enemie whiles he doth revile, for being acquainted therewith, thou shalt the better endure the violent fits of a curst and shrewd wife chiding at home; to heare also without trouble the sharpe words of friend or brother; and if it chance that father or mother let flie bitter rebukes at thee or beat thee, thou wilt fuffer all, and never fliew thy felfedilpleased and angrie with them. For Socrates was woont to abide at home Xanthippe his wife aper rillous shrewd woman and hard to be pleased, to the end that he might with more case converse with others, being used to endure her curstnesse. But much better it were for a man to come with a minde prepared and exercised before-hand with hearing the scoffes, railing language, and grie taunts; outragious and foule words of enemies and strangers, and that without angerand Thew of disquietnesse, than of his domesticall people within his owne house. Thus you see how a man may thew his meekneffe and patience in enmities; and as for fimplicity, magnanimitie 30 and a good nature in deed, it is more seene here than in friendship : for it is not so honest and commendable to do good unto a friend, as dishonest, not to succour him when he standethas need and requesteth it.

Moreover, to forbeare to be revenged of an enemie if opportunitie and occasion is offered, and to lethim goe when he is in thy hands, is a point of great humanitie and courtefie; but him that hath compassion of him whe he is fallen into adversity, succoreth him indistresse, at his requelt is ready for to the w good will to his children, and an affection to fufteine the flate of his house and familie being in affliction; who sever doth not love for this kindnesse, nor praise the goodnesse of his nature.

Of colour blacke (no doubt) and tincture fweart, Wrought of stiffe steele or yron he hath an heart, Or rather forg'd out of the Diament, Which will not store hereat, nor once relent.

Cafer commanded that the statues erected in the honour of Pompeius, which had bene beaten downe and overthrowen, should be fet up againe; for which act Cicero faid thus unto him: In rearing the images of Pompeius, ô Cefar, thou halt pitched and erected thine owne. And therefore we ought not to be sparie of praise and honour in the behalfe of an enemie especially when he deserve th the same; for by this meanes the partie that praiseth shall winne the greatet praise himselse; and besides, if it happen againe that he blame the said enemie, his acculation shall be the better taken, and carie the more credit, for that he shall be thought not so much to hate the person as disallow and mislike his action. But the most profitable and goodliest matter of all, is this: That he who is accustomed to praise his enemies, and neither to grieve or envie at their well-fare, shall the better abide the profperitie of his friend, and be furthest off from envying his familiars in any good successe or honour that by well-doing they flave atchieved. And is there any other exercise in the world, that so can bring greater profit unto our foules, or worke a better disposition and habit in them, than that which riddeth us of emulation and the humour of envie? For like as in a city, wherein there bemany things necessarie, though otherwise simply evill, after they have once taken sure sooting, and are by custome established in maner of a law, men shall hardly remove and abolish, although they have bene hurr and endammaged thereby; even fo enmity, together with hatred and malice, bringeth in envic, jealousie, contentment and pleasure in the harme of an enemie, remembrance of wrongs received, and offences paffed, which it leaveth behinde in the foule, when it felfe is gone; over and befides, cunning practifes, fraud, guile, deceit, and fecret forlayings or ambushes, which seeme against our enemies nothing ill at all, nor unjustly used, after they be once feeled and have taken root in our hearts, remaine there fast, and hardly or un-30 nethate removed; informuch as if men take not heed how they use them against enemies, they shall be so inured to them that they will be ready afterwards to practise the same with their verie friends. If therfore Pythagors did well & wifely in acquainting his scholars to sorbeare cruelty and injustice, even as farre as to dumb and brute beafts; whereupon he misliked fowlers, and would request them to let those birdes slie agains which they had caught; yea and buy of fishers whole draughts of fishes, and give order unto his disciples to put them alive into the water againe, infomuch as nee expressely forbad the killing of any tame beast whatsoevers certes it is much more grave and decent, that in quarrels, debates, and contentions among men; an enemie that is of a generous minde, just, true, and nothing treacherous, should repreffe, keepe downe, and hold underfoot the wicked, malicious, cautelous, base, and ungentle-40 man-like paffions; to the end that afterwards in all contracts and dealings with his friend they breakenot out, but that his heart being cleere of them, he may absteine from all mischievous practiles. Seaurm was a profeffed enemie and an accuser of Domition judicially; now there was adometicall fervant belonging to the faid Domitim, who before the day of triall and judgement, came unto Scaures faying, Thathe would discover unto him a thing that he knew not of, the which might ferve him in good freed when he should plead against his master; but Seaurus would not fo much as give him the hearing; nay he laid hold on the party, and fent him away bound unto his lord and master, Cato (the younger) charged Mur ana, and indited him in open court for popularitie and ambition, and declaring against him that he fought indirectly to gaine the peoples favour and their voices to be chosen Confull; now as he went up and downe To to collect arguments and proofes thereof, and according to the maner and cultome of the Romanes, was attended upon by certeine perfons who followed him in the behalfe of the defendant, to observe what was done for his better instruction in the processe & suit commenced; thefe fellowes would oftentimes be in hand with him and aske whether he would to day fearch for ought, or negotiate any thing in the matter and cause concerning Mar ana? If he said, No; fuch credite and trust they reposed in the man that they would rest in that answere, and go their waies; a fingular argument this was of all other to proove his reputation, and what opinion men conceived of him for his justice; but fure a farre greater testimonic is this, and that passeth altherest, to proove that is we be accustomed to deale justly by our very enemies, we shal never shew our selves unjust, cautelous, and deceitfull with our friends. But forasmuch as every lake (as Simonides was wont to say) must need shave a cop or crest growing upon her head; and so likewise all men by nature do carie in their head I wot not what jealousie, emulation, and envic, which is if I may use the words of Pindarus,

A mate and fellow (10 be plaine)
Of brain-ficke fooles and persons vaine.

A man should not reape a small benefit & commoditie by discharging these passions upon his enemies, to purge & clense himselse quite thereof, & as it were by certeine gutters or chanels, to derive and drein them as farre as possibly he can from his friends and familiar acquaintance: 14 whereof I suppose Onomademus a great politician, & wife States-man in the Isle Chios was well advised, who in a civile diffention being sided to that faction which was superior, & had gotten the head of the other; coulelled the rest of his part not to chase & banish out of the city al their adverfaries, but to leave some of them still behind: For feare (quoth he) least having no enemies to quarrel withall, we our felves begin to fall out and go together by the cares; femblably if we fpend these vitious passios of ours upon our enemies, the lesse are they like to trouble & molest our friends: for it ought not thus to be as Hesiodus saith: That the potter should envy the potter, or one minstrell or musician spite another; neither is it necessarie that one neighbor should be in jealousse of another; or cousens and brethren be concurrents & have emulation one at ano. ther; either striving to be rich or speeding better in their affaires; for if there be no other way or 10 meanes to be delivered wholy from contentions, envies, jealousies, & emulations, acquaint thy felfe at leastwife to be stung and bitten at the good successe of thine enemies; whet the edge & sharpen the point (as it were) of thy quarrellous & contentious humour, & turne it upon them and spare not : for like as the most skilfull and best gardiners are of this opinion, that they shall have the sweeter roses and more pleasant violets, if they set garlicke or sow onions neere unto them, for that all the ftrong and stinking favour in the juice that feedeth and nourish the saide flowers, is purged away and goeth to the faid garlick and onions; even fo an enimie drawing unto himselse and receiving all our envie and malice, will cause us to be better affected to our friends in their prosperitie, and lesse offended if they out go us in their estate; and therefore in this regard we mult contend and strive with our enimies about honour, dignities, govern 30 ment, and lawfull meanes of advancing our owne estates, and not onely to be greeved and vexed to see them have the better and the vantage of us, but also to marke and observe evene thing whereby they become our fuperiors, and fo to straine and endevour by carefull diligence, by labour and travell, by parlimonie, temperance, and looking neerely to our felves, to furpaffe and go beyond them; like as Themistocles was wont to fay: That the victorie which Miltrades atchieved in the plaine of Marathon brake his fleepes, and would not let him take his nights refl: for he who thinketh that his enemie furmounteth him in dignities, in patronage of high matters and pleading of great causes, in management of state affaires, or in credit and authoritie with mightie men and grand Segniors, and in flead of striving to enterprise and do some great matter by way of emulation, betaketh himselfe to envie onely, and so sits still doing nothing, 40 and loofeth all his courage, furely he bewraieth that he is possessed with naught else but an idle, vaine, & enervat kind of envy. But he that is not blinded with the regard & fight of him whom he hateth, but with a right & just eie, doth behold & consider al his life, his maners, deseigns, words and deeds, shall soone perceive & find that the most part of those things which he envieth were atchieved and gotten by fuch as have them, which their diligence, wifedom, forecast & vertuous deeds: he thereupon bending all his spirits & whole mind therto, wil exercise (I trow) & sharpen his own defire of honor, glory & honesty, yea & cut off contrariwise, that yawning drowlines & idle floth that is inhis hart. Set case moreover, that our enemies by flattery, by cautelous shifts & cunning practifes, by pleading of cases at the bar, or by their mercenarie and illiberall servicein unhonest & foule matters, seem to have gotten some power, ether with princes in courts, or with so the people in States & cities; let the same never trouble us, but contrariwise cheere up our harts and make us glad in regard of our owne libertie, the pureneffe of our life and innocencie unreprochable, which we may oppose against those indirect courses and unlawfull meanes. For all the gold that is either above ground or underneath (according as Plato faith) is not able to weight against vertue. And evermore this sentence of solon we ought to have in readines:

Many a wicked man is rich; And vertuousmen are many poore : But change we never will with fish Nor give our goodnesses for their store, And why? wertue is durable, Whereas their wealth is mutable.

much lesses, will we exchange the acclamations and shouts of a popular multitude in theaters, which are woon with a feast; nor the honors and prerogatives to sit uppermost at a table neere unto the chamberlaines, minions, favorites, concubines, or lieutenants generall of Kings and Princes. For nothing is desireable, nothing to be affected, nothing indeed honest that progedeth from an unhonest cause: But he that loveth (according as Plato saith) is alwaies blinded to by the thing which is loved, and sooner do we perceive and marke any unseemely thing that our enemies doe. Howbeit, to conclude, neither our joy and contentinent conceived by observing them to do amisse, nor our griese and displeasure in seeing them do well, ought to be idle & unprofitable unto us; but this reckoning and account we are to make of both; that in taking heed how we fall into their faults we may become better, and in imitating their good parts not worse than they.

HOW A MAN MAY PER-CEIVE HIS OWNE PROCEE

IN VERTUE.

The Summarie.

able for to teach menthe meanes to avoid both extreames, and to hold the meane be-impene. And this is the verse thing that our Author doth in this present treatise: for as he laboureth to distrobe as it were the lovers of vertue and turne them out of their habit of perverseignorance, wher with most part of the world is alwaies clad; so he is desirous to keepe them from 40 putting on the habilliment and garments of pride and vaine oftentation, that they might be arrated with the apparell of vertue, in such fore that in taking knowledge of that good whereof they have alreadie some part, they might ender our and do what they can to get a greater portion from day to day, untill they come unto an affored contentment wherein they may rest. Then teacheth he how to know what aman bath profited in the schoole and exercise of vertue, shewing that he ought to consider first, whether he recule from vice by little and little, wherein he confuteth the opinion of the Stoicks, who imagined that no man was good unlesse he became vertuous all at once. This done, he adjoinst h foure rules to know the faid profit and progressem vertue, to wit, When we perceive our heart to tend unto good without any intermission: When our affection redeemeth and regaineth the time that is lost, growing so much the more, as it was before stated and hindred: When we begin to take our whole pleasure 30 and delight therein : lastly, When we surmount and overcome all impeachments that might turne us aside out of the way of vertue. After all this, he entreth into the matter more specially, and sheweth how aman is to employ himselfe in the studie of wisedome; what vices he ought to flie, wherein his mind and spirits should be occupied; and the profit that he is to reape and gather from Philosophers, Poets and Historians. Item, with what affection we ought to speake in the presence of our neighbours, whether it bepublikely or in private; of what fortour actions should be; and to what end and scope we are so addresse and direct them, giving a lustre unto all these discourses by excellent similitudes; taxing and reprooving the faults committed or dinarily by them who make a certaine semblance and outward shew of aspiring unto versue. Having thus discoursed of these points asoresaid, he proposets and see to how me againe divers rules which may resolve us in this advancement and proceeding forward of our sing goodnesseen; that we ought to love reprehensions; to take beed even unto our dreamen; to examine our passions, and so to hope well, if we perceive that they waxe milde and gentle to imitate good things; in no wife to hear any speech of evill; to take example by the best persons, to rejoice and be glad, to have witnessed and beholders of our good will and intention; and not to often eme any sinessed trespects of the view of the continual, but to avoide and shun them all: last of all, he costien by his treatise with an elegant similitude, wherein he discovered and laieth open the masure as well of the victious as the vertaw; thresholds, wherein he discovered and laieth open the masure as well of the victious as the vertaw; thresholds to make the meanes of aspiring and attaining unto versue, so much the more amiable to each person.

HOW A MAN MAY PERceive his owne proceeding and going

T is not possible (my good friend Sossius Senecio) that a man by any meanes should have a feeling in himselfe, and a conscience of his owne amendement and progresse in vertue, if those good procee- so dings do not daily make some diminution of his follie, but that the vice in him weighing in equall ballance against them all, doe holde him downe

Like as the lead plucks downe then et, Which for to catch the fish was set.

For so verily in the art of Musicke or Grammar, a man shall never know how farre he is proceeded, so long as in the studying and learning thereof, he diminish no part of his ignorance in those arts, but still findeth himselseas unmuficall and unlettered as he was before; neither the cure which the Phyfician emploieth about his patient, if it worke no amendment at all, nor alleviation of the disease seeming in 10 some fort to yeeld unto medicines and to flake, can procure any sensible difference and change unto a better state, before that the contrary disposition and habit be restored perfectly to the former health, and the body made found and strong againe. But certeinly, as in these cases there is no amendment to be accounted of, if those that seeme to amend do not perceive the change by the diminution and remission of that which weighed them downe, and finde themselves to encline and bend (asit were) in a ballance to the contrary; even so it fareth with those that make profession of philosophie; it can not be granted that there is any progresse or sense at all of profitting, to long as the foule cast not off by little and little, and purge away her folly, but until such time as shee can atteine (forsooth) unto the sovereigne and perfect good, continueth in the meane-whilefully possessed of vice and sinne in the highest degree; for by this meanes it would so follow, if at one instant and moment of time a wife man should passe from extreame wickednes unto the supreame and highest disposition of vertue: That he had all at once and in the minute of an houre fled vice and cast it from him fully, whereof in a long time before he was not able to be rid of one little portion. But you know full well already that those who holde such extravagant opinions as these, make themselves worke enough, and raise great doubts and quellions about this point, namely, How a man thould not perceive and feele himfelfe when he is be come wife, and be either ignorant or doubtfull that this growth and increase commeth in long processe of time by little and a little, partly by addition of something, and partly by subtraction of other, untill one arrive gently unto vertue, before he can perceive that he is going toward it. Now if there were fo quicke and sudden a mutation, as that he who was to day morning most 30 vicious, should become in the evening as vertuous; and if there ever were known to happen unto any man fuch a change, that going to bed a very foole and fo fleeping, should awake and rile a wife man, and taking his leave of yelterdaies follies, errours and deceits, fay unto them:

My vaine lying dreames so vaine, a-day, aday,

Nought worth you were, I now both fee and fay.

Is it possible that such a one (I say) should be ignorant of this sudden change, and not perceive so great a difference in himselse, not feele how wisedome all at once hath thus lightened and is huminated.

huminated his foule ? for mine owne part, I would rather thinke that one upon carnell prayer transformed by the power of the gods from a woman to a man (as the tale goes of Caneus) thould be ignorant of this Metamorpholis, than he who of a coward, a foole and a diffolute or loofeperson become hardie, wife, fober and temperate; or being transported from a sensual and beaftly life unto a divine and heavenly life, should not marke the very instant wherin such a change did befall. But well it was faid in olde time: That the stone is to be applied and framed unto the rule, and northerule or fquire unto the stone. And they (the Stoiks I meane) who are not willing to accommodat their opinions unto the things indeed, but wrest and force against the course of nature, things unto their owne conceits and suppositions, have filled all philosoto phie with great difficulties and doubtfull ambiguities; of which this is the greateft: In that they will feeme to comprise all men, excepting him onely whom they imagine perfect, under one and the fame vice in general: which strange supposition of theirs hath caused that this progresse and proceeding to vertue, called Hersen, Teemeth to be a darke and obscure riddle unto them, or a meete fiction little wanting of extreame follie; and those who by the meanes of this amendment be delivered from all passions and vices that be, are held thereby to be in no better state, nor leffe wretched and miferable, than those who are not free from any one of the most enormious vices in the world; and yet they refute and condemne their owne felves; for in the difputations which they holde in their schooles, they set the injustice of Aristides in equal ballance to that of Phalaris, they make the cowardife and feare of Brafides, all one with that of Dolon; yea, 40 and compare the follie or errour of Melitm and Plate together, as in no respect different; howbeit; in the whole course of their life, and management of their affaires, they decline and avoid those as implacable and intractable; but these they use and trust in their most important busineffe, as persons of great worth and regard: but we who know and see that in every kinde of sinne or vice, but principally in the inordinate and confuled state of the soule there be degrees according to more or leffe; and that heerein differ our proceedings and amendments, according as reason by little and little doth illuminate, purge and cleanse the soule in abating and diminishing evermore the visiofitie thereof, which is the shadow that darkneth it, are likewise fully perfwaded that it is not without reason to be affured, that men may have an evident sense and perceivance of this mutation, but as if they were raifed out of fome deepe and darke pir, that the 30 same amendment may be reckoned by degrees in what order it goeth forward. In which computation we may goe first and formost directly after this maner, and consider, whether like as the who under faile fet their course in the maine and vast ocean, by observing together with shelength and space of time, the force of the winde that driveth them, doe cast and measure howfarre they have gone forward in their voiage, namely, by a probable conjecture how much infuch a time and with fuch a gale of winde it is like that they may paffe; fo also in philosophic aman may give a gelle and conjecture of his proceeding and going forward, namely, what he may gaine by continual marching on still, without stay or intermission otherwhiles in the mids of the way, and then beginning a fresh againe to leape forward, but alwaies keeping one pace, gaining and getting ground still by the guidance of reason. For this rule was not given respectively to the encrease of summes of money alone, and in that point truely spoken, but it may likewise extend and reach to other things, and namely to the augmentation ofvertue, to wit, when with reason and doctrine continuall use and custome is joyned, which maketh mastrie and is effectuall to bring any worke to end and perfection; whereas these intermissions at times without order and equalitie, and these coole affections of those that studie Philosophie, make not onely many staies and lets in proceeding forward as it were in a journey, but that which is worfe, cause going backward, by reason that vice which everinore lies in wait to fet upon a man that idlely frandeth ftill never so little haleth him a contrary way. True 50 it is that the Mathematicians do call the planets Stationarie, and fay they stand still, while they ceale to moove forward; but in our progreffe and proceeding in philosophie, that is to fay, in the correction of our life and maners, there can be admitted no intervall, no pause or ceffairon, for that our wit naturally being in perpetuall motion in maner of a ballance, alwaies caffeth with the least thing that is, one way or other, willing of it selfe either to encline with the better orelie is forcibly caried by the contrary to the worfe. If then according to the oracle delivered unto the inhabitants of Carka, which willed them if they minded afterwards to live in peace, they should make war both night and day without intermission; thou finde in thy felfe and thine owne conficience, that thou hast fought continually with vice as well by night as by day, of at least wife that thou hast not often left thy ward, and abandoned thy station in the garrison, not continually admitted the heralds or messengers between comming from far as it were to patie and compound, to wit, pleasures, delights, negligences, and amusements upon other matters by all likelihood thou mail with confidence and alacritie be affured to go forward and make an end of thy course behind. Moreover, say that there fall out some interruptions and staies betweene, that thou live not altogether canonically and like a philosophers yet if thy latter proceedings be more constant than the former, and the fresh courses that thou takest longer than the other, it is no bad signe, but it testifieth, that by labour and exercise idlenesse is conquered, and sloth utterly chased away; to whereas the contrary is a very ill figue, to wit, if by reason of many cessations and those comming thicke one after another, the heat of the former affection be cooled, languish and weareth to nothing: for like as the shoote of a cane or reed whiles it hath the full strength and greatell force, putteth forth the first stem reaching out in length, streight, even, smooth, & united in the beginning, admitting few knots in great distances between, to stay and put backe the growth and riling thereof in height; but afterwards as if it were checked to mount up aloft by reason of short winde and failing of the breath, it is held downe by many knots, and those necre one to another, as if the spirit therein which coveteth upward found some impeachment by the way, fmiting it backe, and caufing it as it were to pant and tremble; even so as many as at first tooke long courses and made haste unto philosophie or amendment of life, and then afterwards meet 20 eftioones with flumbling blocks, continually turning them out of the direct way, or other meanes to distract and plucke them aside, finding no proceeding at al to better them, in the end are wearie, give over, & come short of their journeis end; whereas theother above faid hathhis wings growing still to helpe his flight, and by reason of the fruit which he findeth in his course goeth on apace, cutteth off all pretenfes of excuse, breaketh through all lets, (which stand as a multitude in the way to hinder his paffage) which he doth by fine force and with an industrious affection to atteine unto the end of his enterprise. And like as to joy and delight in beholding of beautie present is not a figne of love beginning, for a vulgar and common thing this is, but rather to be greeved & vexed when the same is gone or taken away; even so many therebe who conceive pleasure in philosophie, and make semblance as if they had a fervent defire to the 20 studie thereof; but if it chance that they be a little retired from it by occasion of other businesse and affaires, that first affection which they tooke unto it vanishes havay, and they can well a bide to be without Philosophie;

If little still to little thou do ad, A beape at length, and mickle will be had.

as one poet faith; will feeme unto thee moderate and nothing hot in frequenting the philosophicall schoole and conferring together with thee about philosophie; but let him be plucked from it, and drawen apart from thee, thou shalt see him enstamed in the love thereof, impatient, and weary of all other affaires and occupations; thou shalt perceive him even to forget his own friends, fuch a passionate desire he will have to philosophie. For we ought not so much to de-40 light in learning and philosophic whiles we are in place, as we do in sweet odors, perfumes, and ointments, and when we are away and separated therefro, never grieve thereat, nor seeke after it any more; but it must imprint in our hearts a certeine passion like to hunger and thirst when it is taken from us, if we wil profit in good earnest & perceive our owne progresse and amendement; whether it be, that marriage, riches, some friendship, expedition or warfare come between, that may drave him away and make separation, for the greater that the fruit is which he gathered by Philosophie, so much the more will the griefe be to leave and forgoe it. To this first signeof progresse in Philosophic may be added another of great antiquitie out of Hesiodus; which is it be not the verie same, certes it commeth necre unto it, and this he describeth after this son, namely, VV hen a man findeth the way no more difficult, rough & craggy, nor exceeding steep 50 and upright, but casie, plaine, with a gentle descent, as being indeed laid even and smooth by exercise, and wherein now there begins light cleerely to appeare and shine out of darkenes, in stead of doubts, ambiguities, errors, and those repentances and changes of minde, incident unto those who first betake themselves to the studie of Philosophie; after the manner of them who having left behinde them a land which they know well enough, are troubled whiles they cannot deferie and discover that for which they fet faile and bend their courses, for even so it is with these perfons, who when they have abandoned these common and familiar studies whereto they were inused before they came, to learne, apprehend and enjoy better, oftentimes in the verie middle of their course are caried round about and driven to returne backe agains the same, way, they came. Like as it is reported of Sexim a noble man of Rome, who having given over the honorable offices and magistracies in the citie, for love of Philosophie, afterwards finding himselfemuch moubled in that studie, and not able at the beginning to brooke and digest the reasons and discourses thereof, was so perplexed, that he went veriencere to have throwen himselse into the sea out of a gallie.

The semblable example we read in histories, of Diogenes the Sinopian, when he first went to the studie and profession of Philosophie: for when about the same time it chanced that the Ato thenians celebrated a publike folemnitie with great featling and fumptuous fare, with theatricall plaies and pastimes, meeting in companies and affemblies to make merrie one with another, with revels and daunces all night long, himfelfe in an odde corner of the market place lay lapped round in his cloathes, purpofing to take a nap and fleepe; where and when he fell into certaine fantastical imaginations which did not a little turne and trouble his braines, yea and breake his heart, discoursing thus in his head: That he upon no constraint or necessitie, should thus wilfully betake himselfe to a laborious & strange course of painful life, sitting thus by himfelfe mopifh, sequestred from all the world, & deprived of all earthly goods; In which thoughts and conceits of his, he spied (as the report goeth) a little mouse creeping & running towards the crums that were fallen from his lofe of bread, and was verie bufic about them, whereupon hee 20 tooke heart againe, reprooved and blamed his owne feeble courage, faying thus to himfelfe: What faiest thou Diogenes? Seest thou not this filliecreature what good cheere it haketh with thy leavings? how merrie fine is whiles the feedeth thereupon? and thou (like a trim man indeed asthou art) doest waile, weepe and lament, that thou drinkest not thy selfe drunke as those doe yonder; nor lie in foft and delicate beds, richly fet out with gay and coftly furniture. Now when fuch temptations and distractions as thesebe, returne not often, but the rule and discourse of reason presently riseth up against them, maketh head, turneth upon them suddenly againe (as it were) in the chace and purfued in the route by enemies, and so quickly discomfitteth and dispatcheth the anxietie and dispaire of the minde, then a man may be affirred that he hath profited indeed in the schoole of Philosophie, and is well settled and confirmed therein. But forasmuch 20 as the occasions which doe thus shake men that are given to Philosophie, yea and otherwhiles plucke them a contrarie way, doe not onely proceed from themselves by reason of their owner infirmitie and so gather strength; but the sad and serious counsels also of friends, together with thereproofes and contradictoric affaults made upon them by adversaries, betweene good earnelt and game, doe mollifie their tender hearts, and make them to bow, bend and yeeld, which otherwhiles have beene able in the end to drive some altogether from Philosophie, who were wellentred therein: It may be thought no fmall figne of good proceeding, if one can endure the same meekly without being mooved with such temptations, or any waies troubled and piuched when hee shall heare the names and furnames of such and such companions and equals otherwise of his, who are come to great credit and wealth in Princes courts; or be advanced by 40 mariages, matching with wives who brought them good dowries & portions; or who are wont togo into the common Hall of a citie, attended upon and accompanied with a traine and troup of the multitude, either to attaine unto some place of government, or to plead some notable sause of great consequence: for he that is not disquieted, astonied, or overcome with such asfaults; certaine it is and we may be bold to conclude that he is arrested (as it were) and held sure ashe ought to be by Philosophie. For it is not possible for any to cease affecting and loving thosethings, which the multitude doth so highly honor and adore, unlesse they be such as admire nothing else in the world but vertue. For to brave it out, to contest, and make head against men, is a thing incident unto some by occasion of choler, unto others by reason of folly; butto contemne and despise, that which others esteeme with admiration, no man is able to performe, 50 without a great measure of true and resolute magnanimitie: In which respect such persons comparing their state with others magnific theinselves, as Solon did in these words:

And good men there be many poore:
But we will not exchange with fich,
Nor give our goodnes for their flore.
For vertue ay is durable,
Whereas riches beaustable.

And Diogener compared his peregrination and flitting from the city of Corinth to Achene, and againe his removing from Thebes to Cormth, unto the progresses and chariges of abode that the great king of Perfia was wont to make; who in the Spring featon held his Court as Suffe; in Win. ter, kept house at Babylon; and during Summer, passed the time and sojourned in Media; stain law hearing upon a time the faid king of Perfia to be named, The great kings And why thunk he) is he greater than my felfe a unleffe it be that he is more just and righteous. And William writing unto Antipater as touching Alexander the great, faid. That it became not him onely valunt much and glorifie himfelfe for that his dominions were fo great, but also any man els liath no leffe cause who is instructed in the true knowledge of the gods. And Zeno seeing Theophra: few in great admiration because he had many scholars: Indeed (quoth he) his auditory or quite is greater than mine, but mine accordeth better and makes sweeter harmonie than his. When as therefore thou halt so grounded and established in thine heart that affection unto vernie. which is able to encounter and stand against all externall things, when thou hast voided one of thy foule all envies, jealoufies, and what affections foever are woont either to tickle or to fret.or otherwise to depresse and cast downe the minds of many that have begunne to professe philosel. phie; this may serve for a great argument and token that thou art well advanced forward, and half profited much; neither is it a finall figne thereof, if thou perceive thy language to be changed from that it was wont to be; for all those who are newly entred into the schoole of philosophie (to speake generally) affect akinde of speech or stile which aimeth at glory and vaineostentation: fome you shall heare crowing aloud like cocks and mounting up aloft, by reason of their levity and haughty humour, unto the fublimitie and splendor of physicall things or secrets in nature; others take pleafure (after the maner of wanton whelps, as Plato faith) in tugging and tearing evermore whatfoever they can catch or light upon; they love to be doing with littgious questions, they goe directly to darke problemes and sophisticall subtilties, and most of them being once plunged in the quillits & quidities of Logicke, make that (as it were) a means or preparative to flesh themselves for Sophistrie: mary there be, who goe all about collecting and gathering together fententious fawes and histories of ancient times; and as Anachar fis was wont to fay: That he knew no other use that the Greeks had of their coined pieces of mony bin to rell and number them, or els to call account and reckon therewith; even fo do they nothing els but count and measure their notable sentences and sayings, without drawing any profit or 10 commodity out of them: and the same befalleth unto them, which one of Places familiats applied unto his scholars by way of allusion to a speech of Ariphanes : this Antiphanes was wont to fay in merriment: That there was a city in the world, whereas the words fo foone as ever they were out of the mouth and pronounced, became frozen in the aire, by reason of the coldnesses the place, and so when the heat of Summer came to thaw and melt the same, the inhabitants might heare the talke which had bene uttered and delivered in Winter; even fo (quoth he) it is with many of those who come to heare Plato when they be young; for whatsoever he speaketh and readeth unto them; it is very long ere they understand the same, and hardly when they are become olde men: and even after the fame fort it fareth with them abovefaid, who stand thus affected univerfally unto Philosophic, untill their judgement being well setled and growen to as found resolution, begin to apprehend those things which may deepely imprint in the mindea morall affection and paffion of love, yea, and to fearch and trace those speeches, whereof the tracts (as Aesope was woont to say) leade rather in, than out. For like as Sophocles said merrily upon a time, by way of derifion: That he would first cut off the haughtie and stately invention of zie schylus, and then abridge his affected, curious and artificiall disposition, and in the third place change the maner and forme of his elocution, which is most excellent, and fullest of sweet after ctions; even fo, the students in Philosophie, when they shall perceive that they passe from orations exquifitly penned and framed for oftentation in frequent and folemne affemblies, unto morall speeches, and those that touch the quicke, aswell the milde and gentle motions, as the hote and violent passions of the minde, then begin they indeed to lay downe all pride and vani-10 sy, and profit truely in the schoole of Philosophie.

Confider then, not onely in reading the works of Philosophers, or in hearing their lectures, first and formost, whether thou art not more attentive to the words than to the matter; or whether thou be not carried with a greater affection to those who deliver a more subtill and curious composition of sentences, than such as comprise profitable, commodious, substantiall & sleshy matters (if I may so say) but also in perusing Poemes, or taking in hand any history, observe well and take heed, that there escape thee not any one good sentence tending properly to the refore mation of maners or the alleviation of paffions: for like as (according to Simonides) the bee fetleth upon flowers for to fucke our of it the yellow honic, whereas others love onely their colour or pleafant fent, and neither care nor feeke for any thing els thereout; even fo, when other men be converfant in Poemes for pleafure onely and paffime, thou finding and gathering fomewhat out thereof woorth the noting, fhalt feeme at the first fight to have fome knowledge already thereof by a certeine cultome and acquaintance with it, and a love taken unto it as a good thing and familiar unso thee. As for those that reade the books of Plato and Xenophon, in no other segard but for the beautie of their gallant file, feeking for nought els but for the purity of specch, and the very naturall Atticke language, as if they went to gather the thin dew or tender nousle or downe of herbs; What will you say of such a but that they love physicke drugs, which have either a lovely. colour or a pleasant smell onely; but otherwise the medicinable vertues thereof and properties either to purge the bodic or mitigate any paine, they neither desire to know nor are willing to use.

Moreover, fuch as are proceeded farther, yet profited more, have the skill and knowledge how to reape fruit not onely out of words spoken or books written, but also to receive profit out of all fights, spectacles, and what things soever they see, gathering from thence whatsoever is fit and commodious for their purpose; as it is reported of Aesehylm and other such as he : For Aclebylus being upon a time at the Ifthmian games, beheld the fight of the sword fencers that fought at sharpe, and when one of the faid champions had received a grievous wound, where-20 upon the whole theater fet up a crie, he jogging one that was by him (named Ion of Chios) See younot (quoth he) what use and exercise is able to do? the partie himselfe that is hurt faith neyer a word, but the lookers on crie out. Brasides chanced among drie figs to light upon a fillie moule that bit him by the finger, and when he had shaken her off and let her goe, said thus to himselfe : See how there is nothing so little and so feeble, but it is able to make shift and fave it life, if it dare onely defend it felfe. Diogenes when he faw one make meanes to drinke out of the ball of his hand, cast away the dith or cuppe that hee carried in his budget. Loc, how attentive taking heed and continuall exercise maketh men ready and apt to marke, observe and learne from all things that make any way for their good. And this they may the rather doe when the joine wordes and deedes together, not onely in that fort (as Thueidides spea-30 keth of) by meditating, and exercifing themselves with the experience of present perils, but also against pleasures, quarrels, and altercations in judgements about defences of caufes and magistracies; as making proofe thereby of the opinions that they holde, or rather by carriage of themselves, teaching others what opinions they are to holde. For such as vet bee learners, and notwithstanding that, intermeddle in affaires like pragmaticall persons, fpying how they may catch any thing out of philosophic, and goe therewith incontinently in maner of juglers with their boxe, either into the common place and market, or into the schoole which young men frequent; or els to princes tables, there to fetthem abroad; we are not to thinke them philosophers; no more than those to be physicians, who only fell medicinable spices, drugs or compound confections; or to speake more properly, such a sophister or counter-40 feit philosopher as this, resembleth the bird that Homen describeth, which for footh, fo soone as he hath gotten any thing, carieth it to his scholars (as the faid bird doth in her mouth convey meat to her naked young ones that cannot flie)

And so himselfe he doth beguile

converting and distributing naught of all that which he hath gotten to his owne nourishment, nor so much as concocting and digesting the same: and therefore we ought of necessitie to regard and consider well whether we use any discourse and place our words so, that for our selves they may do good; and in regard of others, make no shew of vaine-glotic nor ambitious desire to be knowne abroad, but onely of an intention rather to heare, or els to teach.

But principally we are to observe whether our wrangling humour and desire to be cavilling about questions disputable, be allaied in us or no, as also whether we have yet given over to dewife reasons and arguments to assail others; like as champions armed with hurlebats of tough leather about their armes and bals in their hands, to annoy their concurrents, taking more pleasure and delight to fell and assail with one rap our adversarie, and so to lay him along on the earth, than to learne or teach him: for surely modestie, mildenesse and courtesse in this kinde will doe well; and when a man is not willing to enter into any conference or disputation, with a purpose to put downe and vanquish another, nor to breake out into fits of choler, nor having evicted his adverfarie to be readic as they fay to tread and trample him under foot, nor so feeme displeased and discontent if himselse have the foile and be put to the woors; be all good fignes of one that hath sufficiently profited. And this shewed Aristippus very well upon a time when he was so hardly pressed and overlaid in a certaine disputation, that he knew not what and fwer to make presently unto his adversarie a jolly bold and audacious sophister; but otherwise brainficke foole and without all judgement : for Aristippus feeing him to vaunt himfelfe, pufi fed up with vaine glorie, that he had put him to a non plus : Well (quoth he) I fee that for this time I go away with the worse, but furely when I am gone I will sleepe more soundly and quietly than you that have gotten the better. Moreover we may also proove and found our felves, when ther we have profited or no, even whiles we speake in publicke place; namely, if neither upon the fight of a greater audience than we looked for, we shrinke not for feare and falle heart, not contrariwife be discouraged to see sewer come to heare our exercises than we hoped for ; never when we are to make a speech to the people, or before a great magistrate, we leefe the opponent nitie thereof, for that we have not well premeditated thereof before, nor come provided of apt words to declare our mind, a thing that by report befell unto Demosthenes & Alcibiades: for All eibiades as he was passing ingenious and inventive of matter, so he wanted audacitie, and was not fo ready as some other to utter the same, but troubled eftsoones in his pleading and deliverie of it, informuch as many times in the very mids of his oration he would be out and to feeke for a proper and fit terme to expresse the conception of his minde, or els to recover that word againe which was flipt and escaped out of his memoric. As for Homer he had such an opinion of his 20 owne perfection, and his poeticall veine in the rest of all his worke, that he stucke not to set downe the very first verse of his poeme desective in measure, and not answerable to the rules of verfifying. So much the rather therefore likely it is, that they who fet nothing before their eies, nor aime at ought els but vertue onely and honestie, will make use of the present occasion and the occurrence of affaires, fall out as they will, without regard of applaule, hiffing or any other noise whatsoever in token of liking or disliking their speech.

Nowevery man ought to confider not onely his owne speeches, but also his actions, namely whether they carie with them more profit and found trueth, than vaine pompe and oftententation; for if the true love indeed of young folke, man or woman, requireth no witnesses, but resteth in the private contentment & enjoying of their sweet delights, although the same were 30 performed and their defires fully accomplished secretly betweene them without the privitie of any person: how much more credible is it that he who is enamoured of honesty and wisedome, using the company and felowship familiarly of vertue by his actions, and enjoying the same, shall finde in himselfe without saying one word an exceeding great contentment, and demaund no other hearers or beholders but his owne conscience? For like as he was but a vaine foole who called unto his maid in the house and cried with a loud voice: Diony sia come and see I am not proud and vain glorious now as I was wont to be; even so hee that hath done some vertuous and commendable act, and then goes foorth to tell it abroad and fpred the fruit there of in every place, certeine it is that fuch an one regards still outward vanities, and is caried with a covetous defire of vain-glorie, neither hath he ever had as yet a true fight indeed and perfect 40 vision of vertue, but onely a fantasticall dreame of her, imagining as hee lies afleepe, that hee feeth some wandring shadow and image thereof, and then afterward representeth thus unto his view that which he hath done, as a painted table to looke upon. Well then, it is the propertie of him that proceedeth in vertue, not onely when he hath bestowed fornthing upon his friend, or done a good turne unto one of his familiars, for to make no words there of; but also when hee hath given his voice justly, or delivered his opinion truely, among manie others that are unjust and untrue; or when he hath flatly denied the unhonest request, or stoutly croffed a bad motion of some rich man, great Lord or mightie Magistrate; or refused gifts and bribes; or proceeded so farre that being athirst in the night he hath not drunke at all; or hath refused to kissea beautiful boy or faire maiden & turned away from them comming toward him 50 as Agefilam did; to keepe althis to himfelfe and fay nothing: For fuch a one as is content to be prooved and tried by his owne selfe, not setting light by that triall and judgement, but joying and taking delight in his confcience, as being a fufficient witnes and beholder, both of good things and commendable actions, sheweth that reason hath turned in, to lodge and keepe resiance with him, that it hath taken deepe root there: and as Democritae faith: That he is well framed, and by cultome brought to rejoice and take pleasure in himselfe. And like as husbandmen are more glad and willing to see the cares of come hang downe their heads, and bend toward the earth, than those who for their lightness fland straight, upright, and staring aloss, for that they suppose fischeares are emptie, or have dittle or nothing in them, for all their faire thew; even fo, amongyoong men, students in Philosophie, they that have least in them of any weight, and be most voide, be those that are at the verie first most consident; set the greatest countenance; carrie the biggeft port in their gate, and have the boldeft face, fleewing therein how full they are of pride in themselves, contempt of all others, and sparing of none: but atterwards as they begin to grow on and burnish, furnishing and filling themselves with the fruits indeed of reason and learning; then and never before they lay away these proude lookes; then downe goes this vaine pride and outward oftentation. And like as we fee in veffels, whereinto menufe ng to powre in liquor, according to the quantitie and measure of the faid liquor that goeth in, the are which was there before flieth our; even fo to the proportion of those good things which attecestaine and true indeed, wherewith men are replemited, their vanitie giveth place, all their hypocrific vanisheth away, their swelling and pushing pride doth abate and fall, and giving over then to stand upon their goodly long beards and fide robes, they transferre the exercise of outward things into the minde and foule within, using the sharp bit of bitter reprehension principally against themselves. And as for others, they can finde in their hearts to devise, conferre, and talke with them more graciously and with greater courtefie; the manner of Philosophie, and reputation of Philosophers, they do not usurpe nor take upon them, neither do they use it as their addition in former time; and if haply one of them by some other be called by that 20 name, he wil not answere to it; but if he be a yoong gentleman indeed, after a smiling and pleafant manner, yea and blufhing withall for thame, he will fay thus out of the Poet Homer:

I am no God nor he avenly wight : Why doeft thou give to me their right? For true it is as deschylus faith:

Adam' fell young if the have knowen,

And tasted man once carnally; Her eie doth it bewrayanon,

It farkles fire sufficiously.

But a yoong man having truely tasted the profit and proceeding in Philosophie, hath these 30 fignes following him, which the Poetrefle Sappho fetteth downe in these verses:

When I you fee What do I atle? First (uddenly my voice doth faile, And then like fire a colour red; Under my skinne doth run and spread.

It would do you good to view his fetled & staied countenance, to behold the pleasant and sweet regard of his eie, and to heare him when he fpeaketh: for like as those who are professed in any confraternity of holy mysteries, at their first affembly & meeting together, burry in tumultuous fortwith great noise, infomuch as they thrust and throng one another; but when they come to celebrate the divine fervice thereto belonging, and that the facred reliques and ornaments are 40 once shewed, they are verie attentive with reverent searcand devout silence; so, at the beginning of the studie of Philosophie, and in the verie entrie (as it were) of the gate that leadeth untoit, a man shall see much adoe, a foule stirre, great audaciousnes, insolencie, and jangling words more than enough; for that fome there be, who would intrude themselves rudely, and thrust into the place violently, for the greedie desire they have to winne reputation and credit: but he that is once within and feeth the great light, as if the fanctuaries and facted cabinets or tabernacles were set open, anon he putteth on another habit, and a divers countenance with tilence and aftonishment, he becommeth humble, pliable and modest, readic to follow the difcourse of reason and doctrine, no lesse than the direction of some god. To such as these, me thinkes, I may do verie well to accommodate that speech which Menademus somtime in mitth so spake pleafantly: Many there be that faile to Athens (quoth he) for to goe to schoole there, who when they come first thither feeme * Sophi, that is, be wife, and afterwards proove * Philosophi, * Soot. that is, lovers of wifedome; then of Philosophers they become * Sophisters, that is, professors + 6.2.0 - 2011. and readers, untill in processe of time they grow to be * Idiots, that is to say, ignorant and fooles * So proces. to see to for the neerer that they approch to the use of reason and to learning indeed, the more "Idorus. do they abridge the opinion that they have of themselves, and lay downe their presumption. Among those that have need of physicke, some that are troubled with the tooth-ach, or have a telon or whitelaw on their finger, goe themselves to the physician for to have remedie; others who are ficke of an ague fend for the physician home to their houses, and defire to be eased and cured by him; but those that are fallen either into a fit of melancholy, or phrensie, or otherwife be distracted in their braines and out of their right wits, otherwhiles will not admit or receive the phylicans, although they came of themselves uncalled, but either drive themout of doores, or else hide themselves out of their fight, and so farre gone they bee and dangeroully ficke, that they feele not their owne fickneffe; semblably of those who finne and doe amisse, such bee incorrigible and uncurable, who are grievously offended and angry, yea, and in mortall hatred with those who seeme to admonish and reproove themfor their misbehaviour; but fuch as will abide them, and are content to receive and enterteine them, be in better flate and in a readier way to recover their health: marie he that yeeldeth himselfe to such as rebuke him, confessing unto them his errors, discovering of his owne accord his povertie and nakedneffe, unwilling that any thing as touching, his state should be hidden. not loving to be unknowen and fecret, but acknowledging and avowing all that he is charged with, yea, and who praieth a man to checke, to reprove, to touch him to the quicke, and fo craveth for helpe; certeinly herein he sheweth no small figure of good progresse and amendment; according to that which Diogenes was woont to fay : He that would be faved (that is to fay) be. come an honest man, had need to seeke either a good friend or a sharpe and bitter enemie, to the end that either by gentle reproofe and admonition, or els by a rigorous cure of correction. he may be delivered from his vices. But how much foever a man in a glorious bravery sheweth to those that be abroad either a foule and thred bare coat or a steined garment, or a rent shoo, 16 or in a kinde of a prefumptuous humilitie mocketh himfelfe in that peradventure he is of a very low stature, crooked or bunch-backed, and thinketh herein that he doth a woorthy and doughtie deed; but in the meane while covereth and hideth the ordures and filthineffe of his vile life, cloaketh the villanous enormities of his maners, his envie, malicionfneffe, avarice, fenfuall voluptuousnesse, as if they were beastly botches or ugly ulcers, suffering no bodie to touch them, nay, nor fo much as to fee them, and all for feare of reproofe and rebuke, certes, such a one hath profited but a little, or to speake more truely, never a whit at all; but he that is ready to encounter and fet upon these vices, and either is willing and able (which is the chiese and principall) to chaltife and condemne, yea, and puthimfelfe to forrow for his faults; or if not fo, yetin the fecond place at the least can endure patiently, that another man by his reprehensions &re- 20 monstrances should cleanse and purge him; certes evident it is, that such an one hatethand detesteth wickednes indeed, and is in the right way to Thake it off: and verily, we ought to avoid the very name and apperance onely thereof, and to be ashamed for to be thought and reputed wicked; but hee that grieveth more at the substance of vice it selfe, than the infamie that commeth thereof, will never be afraid, but can very well abide both to speake hardly of himselfe, and to heare ill by others, so he may be the better thereby. To this purpose may very wel be applied a prety speech of Diogenes unto a certain yonker, who perceiving that Diogenes had an eie on him within a taverne or tipling house, withdrew himselfe quickly more inward, for to be out of his fight: Never do fo (quoth he) for the farther thou flieft backward, the more shalt thou be still in the taverne; even so a man may say of those that be given to vice, for the more that any one of 40 them feemeth to denie his fault, the farther is he engaged, and the deeper funke in finne; like as pooremen, the greater thew that they make of riches, the poorer they be, by reason of their vanity and bragging of that which they have not. But hee that profiteth in deed, hath for a good president and example, to follow that famous Physician Hippocrates, who both openly confes led and also put downe in writing, that he was ignorant in the Anatomie of a mans head, and namely, as touching the seames or situres thereof; and this account will he make, that it were an unworthy indignitie, if (when fuch a man as Hippocrates thought not much to publish his owne errour and ignorance, for feare that others might fall into the like) hee who is willing to fave himselfe from perdition, can not endure to be reproved, nor acknowledge his owne ignorance and follie. As for those rules and precepts which are delivered by Fyrrho and Bion in this 50 case are not in my conceit the figures of amendment and progresse so much, as of some other more perfect and absolute habit rather of the minde; for Bion willed and required his scholars and familiars that converfed with him, to thinke then (and never before) that they had proceeded and profited in Philosophie, when they could with as good a will abide to heare men revile and raile at them, as if they spake unto them in this maner:

Of proceeding in vertue.

Good fir, you feeme no per fon leawd, nor feelish fot, iwis:

All baile, Faire chieve you and adieu, God send you alwaies blis.

And Pyrtho (asit is reported) being upon a time at fea, and in danger to be cast away in a termpelt, shewed unto the rest of his fellow passengers a porket feeding hard upon barley cast before him on thip boord: Loe, my mafters (quoth he) we ought by reason and exercise in Philosophie, to frame our felves to this paffe, and to attaine unto fuch an impaffibilitie, as to be moved and troubled with the accidents of fortune no more than this pig. But consider furthermore, what was the conceit and opinion of Zeno in this point; for hee was of mind that every man might and ought to know whether he profited or no in the schoole to of vertue, even by his very dreames; namely, if hee tooke no pleafure to fee in his fleepe any filthy or dithoneft thing, nor delighted to imagine that he either intended, did or approved any leawd, unjust or outragious action; but rather did beholde (as in a fetled calme, without winde, weather and wave, in the cleere bottome of the water) both the imaginative and also the passive facultie of the soule, wholly overspread and lightened with the bright beames of reafon: which Plato before him (as it should seeme) knowing well enough, bath prefigured and represented unto us, what fantasticall motions they be that proceed in sleepe from the imaginative & fenfual part of the foule given by nature to tyrannize & overrule the guidance of reason; namely if a man dreame that he feeketh to have carnall company with his owne mother, or that he hath a great minde and appetite to eate all strange, unlawfull and forbidden meats; as if then 20 the faid tyrant gave himselfe wholy to all those sensualities & concupiscences as being let loose at fuch a time, which by day the law either by feare or fhame doth represse & keepe downe. Like as therefore beafts which ferve for draught or faddle, if they be well taught and trained, albeit their governors and rulers let the reines loofe and give them the head, fling not out nor goe aside from the right way, but either draw or make pace forward stil, & as they were wont ordinarilykeepe the same traine and hold on in one course and order, even so they whose sensual part of the foule is made trainable and obedient, rame, and well schooled by the discipline of reason, will neither in dreames nor fickneffes eafily suffer the lusts and concupiscences of the flesh, to rage or breake our unto any enormities punishable by law; but will observe and keepe still in memorie that good discipline and custome which doth ingenerate a certeine power and effica-30 cieunto diligence, whereby they shall and will take heed unto themselves: for if the mind hath beneufed by exercife to refult paffions and temptations, to hold the bodie and all the members thereof as it were with bit & bridle under fubjection, in fuch for that it hath at comand the cies not to shed teares for pitty; the heart likewise not to leape & pant in seare; the natural parts not to tife nor stirre but to be still & quiet without any trouble at all, upon the fight of any faire and beautifull person, man or woman; how can it otherwise be but that there should be more likelihood that exercise having seized upon the sensual part of the soule and tamed it, should polish, lay even, reforme, and bring unto good order all the imaginations and motions thereof, even asfarre as to the very dreames and fantafies in fleepe: as it is reported of Stilpo the philosopher, who dreamed that he faw Neptune expostulating with him in anger, because he had not killed 40 abcefe to facrifice unto him as the manner was of other priefts to doe, and that himfelfe nothing aftonied or diffmaid at the faid vision should answer thus againe: What is that thou faist O Nepsune? commest thou to complaine indeed like a child (who pules and cries for not having a peece big enough) that I take not up some money at interest, and put my selfe in debt, to fill the whole citie with the fent and favor of roft and burnt, but have facrificed unto thee fuch as I had at home according to my abilitie and in a meane? whereupon Neptune (as hee thought) should merrily smile and reach foorth unto him his right hand, promising that for his fake and for the love of him he would that yeere fend the Megarians great store of raine and good foison of sea-loaches or fishes called Aphyra by that meanes comming unto them by whole sculles. Such then, as while they lie afleepe have no illusions arising in their 50 braines to trouble them, but those dreames or visions onely as be joious pleasant, plaine and evident, not painfull, nor terrible, nothing rough, maligne, tortuous and crooked; may boldly fay that these fantasies and apparitions be no other than the reslexions and raies of that light which rebound from the good proceedings in philosophie; whereas contrariwise the furious Pricks of luft, timorous frights, unmanly and base flights, childish and exceffive joies, dolorous forrowes, and dolefull mones by reason of some piteous illusions strange and absurd visions appearing in dreames, may be well compared unto the broken waves and billowes of the sea beating upon the rocks and craggie banks of the shore; for that the soule having not as yet that fetled perfection in it felfe which should keepe it in good order, but holdeth on a course still according to good lawes onely and sage opinions, from which when it is farthest sequestred and most remote, to wit, in sleepe, it sufferest it selfe to returne againe to the old wont and to be let loose and abandoned to her passions: But whether these things may be ascribed into that profit and amendement whereof we treat, or rather to some other habitude, having now gathered more strength and sirme constancie not subject by meanes of reasons and good instruction to shaking, I leave that to your owne consideration and mine together.

But now for a finuch as this total impaffibilitie (if I may fo fpeake) of the mind, to wit, a state fo perfect that it is void of all affections, is a great and divine thing; and feeing that this profit and proceeding whereof we write confifteth in a kind of remission and mildnesse of the said pass. ons, we ought both to confider ech of them apart and also compare them one with another, thereby to examine and judge the difference : conferre we shall every passion by it selfe, by ob. ferving whether our lutts and defires be more calme and leffe violent than in former time, by marking likewise our fits of feare and anger, whether they be now abated in comparison of those before, or whether when they be up and enflamed, we can quickly with the helpe of reafon remoove or quench that which was wont to fet them on worke or a fire: compare we shall them together, in case we examine our selves whether we have now a greater portion of grace and shame in us than of feare; whether we finde in our selves emulation and not envie; whe ther we covet honor rather than worldly goods; and in one word, whether after the manner of muficians we offend rather in the extremitie and exceffe of harmonie called Dorion, which is 10 grave, folemne, and devout, than the Lydian, which is light and galliard-like, that is to fay in clining rather in the whole maner of our life to hardnes and feveritie, than to effeminate fofneffe; whether in the enterprise of any actions we shew timiditie and slacknesse, rather thantemeritie and raffineffe, and last of all, whether we offend rather in admiring too highly the farings of men and the persons themselves, than in despising and debasing them too low : for like as we fay in physicke it is a good signe of health when diseases are not diverted and translated into the noble members & principal parts of the body; even fo it feemeth that when the vices of fuch as are in the way of reformation and amendement of life change into passions that are more milde and moderate, it is a good beginning of ridding them away cleane by little & little,

The Lacedamonian Ephori, which were the high countrollers of that whole State, demanded 30 of the Musician Phrynia, when he had fet up two strings more to his seven stringed instrument, whether he would have them to cut in sunder the trebles or the bases, the highest or the lowest but as for us, we had need to have our affections cut both above and beneath, if we desire to the duce our actions to a meane and mediocritie. And surely this progresse or proceeding of ours to perfection, professes that to let downe the lightest first, to cut off the extremitie of passin excesses, and to abate the acrimonic of affections before we doe any thing else, in which as saith Sophoeles:

Folke foolish and incontinent, Most furious be and violent.

As for this one point, namely that we ought to transferre our judgement to action, and not to so fuffer our words to remaine bare and naked words still in the aire, but reduce them to effect, we have alreadic faid, that is the chiefe propertic belonging to our progresse and going forward now the principall arguments and signes thereof be these; if we have a zeale and servent affection on to imitate those things which we praise; if we be forward and readie to execute that which we fo much admire, and contrariwife will not admit nor abide to heare of fuch things as we in our opinion dispraise and condemne. Probable it is and standeth with great likelihood that the Athenians al in general praised and highly esteemed the valour and prowesse of Militades; but when Themistocles said; that the victorie and Trophee of Miliades would not give him leave to fleepe, but awakened him in the night, plaine it is and evident, that he not onely praifed and admired, but had a defire also to imitate him, and do asmuch himfalse; semblably, we are to make 50 this reckoning, that our progresse and proceeding in vertue is but small, when it reacheth 100 farther than to praise onely and have in admiration that which good men have woorthily done, without any motion and inclination of our will to imitate the fame and effect the like. Forneither is the carnall love of the bodie effectuall, unleffe fome little jealoufiebe mixed withall, not the praise of vertue fervent and active, which doth not touch the quicke, and pricke the heart with an ardent zeale in stead of envie, unto good and commendable things, and the same delirous to performe and accomplish the same fully. For it is not sufficient that the heart should be turned upfide downe onely, as Alcibiades was woont to fay by the words and precepts of the philosopher reading out of his chaire, even untill the teares gush out of the cies: but he that truly doth profit & go forward, ought by comparing himselfe with the works & actions of good men, and those that be perfectly vertuous, to feele with all in his owne heart, as well a displeasure with himselfe, and a griefe in conscience for that wherein he is short and descrive, as also a joy affection and motion that never resteth and lieth still, but resemble th for all the world (according to the similated of Simonides:)

affecting and defiring nothing more than to be wholy united and concorporate with a good man, by imitation. For furely this is the paffion peculiar and proper unto him that truely taketh profit by the studie of Philosophic; To love and cherrish tenderly the disposition & conditions of him whose deeds he doth imitate and defire to expresse, with a certaine good will to render alwaies in words, due honor unto them for their vertue, and to affay how to fashion and conforme himselfe like unto them. But in whomsoever there is instilled or insused (I wot not what) contentious humor, envie, and contestation against such as be his betters, let him know that all this proceedeth from an heart exulcerated with jealousie for some authoritie, might and reputation, and not upon any love, honor, or admiration of their vertues. Now, when as we begin 20 to love good men in fuch fort that (as Plato faith) we effecte not only the man himselfe happie who is temperate; or those blessed who be the ordinarie hearers of such excellent discourses which daily come out of his mouth; but also that we do affect and admire his countenance, his port, his gate, the cast and regard of his eie, his smile and maner of laughter, insomuch as we are willing, as one would fay to be joined, fodered, and glued tinto him; then we may be affirred certainely that we profit in vertue; yea and so much the rather, if we have in admiration good and vertuous men, not onely in their prosperitie, but also (like as amorous solke are well enough pleased with the lisping or stammering tongue; yea and do like the pale colour of these whom for the flower of their youth and beautic they love and thinke it beforemeth them, as we reade of Ladie Panthea, who by her teares and fad filence, all heavie, afflicted and blubbered as fine was, 20 for the dolor and forrow that the tooke for the death of her husband, seized Araffes so as hee was enamoured upon her) in their adversitie, so as we neither start backe for feare, nor dread the banishment of Aristides, the imprisonment of Anaxagoras, the povertie of Socrates, or the condemnation of Phocion, but repute their vertue, defireable, lovely and amiable even with all thefe calamities, and runne directly toward her for to kiffe and embrace her by our imitation, having alwaies in our mouth at everie one of these crosse accidents this notable speech of Euripides:

Oh how each thing dosh well become, Such generous hearts both all and some!

For we are never to feare or doubt that any good or honest thing shall ever be able to avert from vertue this heavenly infoiration and divine inftinct of affection, which not onely is not grieved to and troubled at those things which seeme unto men most full of miserie and calamitie, but also admireth & defireth to imitate the. Hereupon also it followeth by good consequence, that they who have once received to deepe an impression in their hearts, take this course with themselves: That when they begin any enterprise, or enter into the administration of government, or when any finister accident is presented unto the, they set before their cies the examples of those who either presently are or heretofore have bene worthy persons, discoursing in this maner: What is it that Plato would have done in this case? what would have Epaminondas said to this? how would Lyenrgus or Agefilaus have behaved themselves herein? After this fort (I say) will they labour to frame, compose, reforme and adorne their manners as it were before a mirrour or lookingglasse, to wit, in correcting any unseemly speech that they have let fall, or repressing any passion 50 that hath rifen in them. They that have learned the names of the demi-gods called Idae Dacty-4, know how to use them as counter-charmes or preservatives against sudden frights, pronouncing the fame one after another readily and ceremoniously; but the remembrance and thinking upon great and worthy men represented fuddenly unto those who are in the way of perfection, and taking holde of them in all passions and perplexions which shall encounter them, holdeth them up, and keepeth them upright, that they can not fall; and therefore this also may go for one argument and token of proceeding in vertue.

Over and besides, not to be so much troubled with any occurrent, nor to blush exceedingly for shame as before-time, nor to seeke to hide or otherwise to alter our countenance or any thing els about us, upon the fudden comming in place of a great or fage personage unexpe. cted, but to perfift resolute, to go directly toward him with bare and open face, are tokens that a man feeleth his conficience fetled and affured. Thus Mexander the great feeing a meffenger running toward him apace with a pleasant and smiling countenance, and stretching foorth his handafarre off to him: Hownow good fellow (quoth hee) what good newes canft thou bring me more, unlesse it be tidings that Homer is risen againe? esteeming in trueth that his woorthy acts and noble deedes already atchieved, wanted nothing els, nor could be made greater than they were, but onely by being confecrated unto immortalitie by the writings of iomenoble fpirit; even fo a yoong man that groweth better and better every day, and hath reformed his to maners, loving nothing more than to make himselfe knowen what he is unto men of worth and honour; to show unto them his whole house and the order thereof, his table, his wife and childten, his studies and intents; to acquaint them with his sayings and writings; insomuch asother whiles he is grieved in his heart to thinke and remember, either that his father naturall that begat him, or his mafter that taught him, are departed out of this life, for that they be not alive to fee in what good estate he is in and to joy thereat; neither would he wish or pray to the gods for any thing fo much, as that they might revive and come againe above ground, for to be spe-Atators and cie-witnesses of his life and all his actions. Contratiwise, those that have neglected themselves and not endevoured to do wel, but are corrupt in their maners, can not without search and trembling abide to fee those that belong unto them, no not so much as to dreame of them, to Adde moreover, if you please, unto that which hath beene already faid, thus much also fora good token of progresse in vertue: When a manthinketh no sinne or trespasse small, but is very carefull and wary to avoid and shunne them all, For like as they who despaire ever to be rich, make no account at all of faving a little expense; for thus they thinke: That the sparing of a finall matter can adde no great thing unto their stocke, to heape it up; but contrariwise, hope when a man fees that he wanteth but a little of the marke which he shooteth at, causeth that the neerer he commeth thereto, his covetousnesse is the more; even so it is in those matters that perteine to vertue : he who giveth not place much, nor proceedeth to these speeches: Well, and what shall we have after this? Be it io now: It will be better againe for it another time: and fuch like: but alwaies taketh heed to himselfe in every thing; and whensoever vice infinuating it 30 felfe into the least finne and fault that is, feemeth to pretend and fuggest fome colourable excufes for to crave pardon, is much discontented and displeased; he (1 lay) giveth hereby goodevidence and proofe that he hath a house within cleane and near, and that he would not endure the least impuritie and ordere in the world to defile the fame : For (as defchylus faith) an opinion conceived once, that nothing that we have is great and to be effected and reckoned of, causeth us to be carelesse and negligent in small matters. They that make a palaisado, a rampier or rough mud wall, care not much to put into their worke any wood that commeth next hand, neither is it greatly materiall to take thereto any rubbish or stone that they can meet with, or first comment into their cie, yea, and if it were a pillar fallen from a monument or fepulchre; femblablydoe wicked and leawd folke, who gather, thrumble & heape up together all forts of gaine, all actions of that be in their way, it makes no matter what, but such as profit in vertue, who are alredy planted, and whose golden foundation of a good life is laid (as it were) for some sacred temple or rotal palace, will not take hand over head, any stuffe to build thereupon, neither will they worke by aime, but every thing shall be couched, laied and ranged by line and levell, that is to y aime, but every thing shall be couched, laied and ranged by line and levell, that is to say aime, but every thing shall be couched, laied and ranged by line and levell, that is to fay, by the squire & rule of reason: which is the cause (as we thinke) that Post-clet us the famous imager was wont to say: That the hardest piece of all the worke remained then to do, when the clay and the naile met together; signifying thus much: That the chire point of cunning and perfection was in the up-shoot and end of all.

OF SVPERSTITION

The Summarie.

T should sceme that Plutarch composed this booke in mockerie and derision of the T should seeme that Plutarch composed this booke in mockerie and derison of the lewes whom he toucheth, and girdeth at in one place, and whose religion he mingleth with the superstition of the Fagans; to assume hurpose (1 wis) as that which he delivered hin a discourse at the table, where every any orderned by the eternal and almightic God, with the Bacchanalles and such stinking orderned by the eternal and almightic God, with the Bacchanalles and such stinking orderned by the eternal and almightic God of the superstitute. ordures of idolaters; thinking verily that Bacchus was the god of the Iewes. This slaunder of his and falle calumniation ought to be imputed unto that ignorance of the true God, wherein Plutarch did 20 remaine inswapped: yet is not be the man alone who hath derided and floured the religion of the Iewes: but such scoffes and derisions of the sages and wise men of this world, especially and above all when they are addressed against God, fall upon the head of the authors and devisers thereof to their utter confusion. Moreover as touthing this point, that some have thought this present discourse wherin he endevoureth and laboureth to prove super stition to be more perilous than Athelfme is dangerous to be read, & conteines h false doctrine; for that supersition of the twaine wnot so bad : I say that in regard of the foolish devotion of Plutarch and such as himselfe, which in no wise deservet bthe name of religion, but windeed a derission and profanation of truepietic and goddinesse, it were not amisse to affirme that Superstition is more wretched and miserable than Athersme, considering that lesse hurtfull and dangerount is for a man not to have his minde and soule troubled at all and disquieted with a fantasticall 30 illusion of idoles and Chimæres in the aire, than to feare, honor and serve them in such fort as justice & humanity should in maner be abolished by such super stittous idolaters. To be short, that it were better to defeat and overthrow at once all false gods, than to lodge any one in his head, for to languish thereby in perpetual miserie. Concerning true religion and the extremities thereof, the case is otherwife, and the question disputable, which we leave to Divines and Theologians to scan upon, to discourse and determine, since our intention and purpose urgeth us not at this time to discourse heere-

But to returne unto our author, considering that which we come to touch; As heists cannot find how to prevaile and maintaine their opinion: for institute their processes and accusation against themselves, they cary every minute of an houre in their cauterized & secretaeon science: but he sheweth that to worship and serve many idols, is a thing without comparison more deplorable than to disavow and disclaime them all. But to prove this, after be had discovered the course of superstition & Athelson, and declated discrence of these two extremities, he saith in the sust place, that superstition is them adeclated discrence of these two extremities, he saith in the suff place, that superstition is them showed the superstition while the passions of the soule, proving the same by divers reasons, to wit; That the superstitious man is in continual perplexity, he dreadeth his owne toole no less than a cruell tyrant, and imagineth a thousand evils even after his death. After this he taketh a view of the Atheist, and oppose thim against the superstitions, resolving upon this point; that the superstitious persons more opposed him against the superstition and eversus, a specific as prosperitie, and to confirme and satisfie his assertion, he settleth down emany arguments and notable examples. Moreover he sheweth that the superstition, he settleth down emany arguments and notable examples. Moreover he sheweth that the superstition was person in an eminite of all deitie or godhead, he putteth cleane out of his heart, and treadeth undersome settle superstition and righteons settle for to please his idols, and in one word, that he is the most wretched caitise in the world. And for a conclusion he exhorted his so to set superstition, that we ched caitise in the world. And for a conclusion he exhorted his so to set superstition, that we hold our selves from falling into Atheisme, keeping in the middle betweene; of which point every good man ought to consider and thinke upon well andingood earnest in these latter times of the world, albeit he who advertise has thereof in this place, never knew what was trucreligion.

OF SUPERSTITION.

He ignorance and want of true knowledge as touching the gods divided even from the beginning i nto two branches, meeting on the one fide with stubborne and obstinate natures, as it were with a churlist peece of ground, hath in them engendred Impictic and Atheisme; and on the otherside, lighting upon gentle and tender spirits like a moist and soft soile, hath bred and imprinted therein superstition: now as all error in opinion and judgement, and namely in these matters, is hurtfull and dangerous enough; so if it be accompanied with some passion of the minde it is most pernitious. For this we must thinke, that every one of these passions resembleth a deception that is feaverous and inflamed; and like as the diflocations of any joints in a mans bodie out of their place joined with a wound be woorfe than others to be cured; even fo the diffortions and errors. of the minde meeting with fome paffion are more difficult to be reformed. As for example, let case that one doe thinke that the little motes and indivisible bodies called Atomi, together with voidnesse and emptinesse be the first elements and principles whereof all things are made; certeinly this is an erronious and false opinion of his; howbeit the same breedethno ulcer, no fea- 10 ver causing disordinate pulse in the atteries, nor yet any pricking and troublesome paine. Doth fome one hold that riches is the foveraigne good of man? This error and false opinion hatha rust or canker and a worme that eateth into the soule and transporteth the same besides it selfe. it suffreth it not to take any repose, it stingeth, it pricketh it and setteth it a gadding, it throweth it downe headlong (as it were) from high rocks, it stifleth and strangleth it, and in one wordit bereaveth it of all libertie & franke speech. Againe, are there some perswaded, that vertue and vice be substances corporall and materiall? this haply is a grosse ignorance and a foule error, howbeit not lamentable nor worthie to be deplored: but there be other judgements and opinions like unto this:

O vertue wretched and miferable,
Nought elfe but words and winde variable;
Thee ferv'd I daily with all reverence,
As if thou hadft beene fome reall effence:
Whereas injustice neglected I have,
Which would have made me a man rich and brave;
Intemperance eke have I cast behind.
Of pleasures all, she mother deere and kind.

Such as these verily we ought to pitie, yea and withall to be offended at, because in whose minds they are once entered and fetled they engender many maladies and paffions like unto wormes and fuch filthy vermine, But now to come unto those which at this present are in question: Im-40 pietie or Atheisme, being a false perswasion and lewd beliefe, that there is no soveraigne Nature most happie and incorruptible, seemeth by incredulitie of a God-head to bring miscreants to a certaine stupiditie, bereaving them of all sense and feeling, considering that the end of this misbeleefe that there is no God, is to be void altogether of feare. As for superstition, according as the nature of the Greeke word (which fignifieth Feare of the Gods) doth imply, is a paffionate opinion and turbulent imagination, imprinting in the heart of man a certaine fearfulnesse, which doth abate his courage and humble him downe to the verie ground, whiles he is perswaded that they be gods indeed, but fuch as be noyfome, hurtfull, and doing mischiese unto men: In fuch fort, that the impious Atheist having no motion at all as touching the Deitie and Divine power, and the superstitious person mooved and affected thereto after a perverse sort, and to otherwise than he should, are both out of the right way. For ignorance as it doth ingenerate in the one an unbeliefe of that foveraign Nature which is the cause of all goodness so it imprinteth in the other a misbeliefe of the Deitie, as being the cause of evill: so that as it should seeme, Impietie or Atheisme is a false judgement and opinion of the God-head; and superstition a pasfion proceeding from an erronious perswasion. True it is that all maladies of the soule are soule and the paffions naught; howbeit in fome of them, there is a kinde of (I wot not what) alacritie, haughtines and jollitic, proceeding from the lightnesse of the minde; and to say in a word, there is in manner not one of them all, destitute of one active motion or other, serving for action; but a common imputation this is and a blame laid generally upon all passions, that with their violent pricks (as it were) they incite, provoke, urge, compell, and force reason; onely feare, which being no leffe voide of audacitie and boldnesse, than of reason; carrieth with it a certaine blockifhnesse or stupiditie, destitute of action, perplexed, idle, dead, without any exploit or effeet whatfoever; whereupon it is named in Greeke Acieus, that is to fay, a Bond, and Tayes, that is to fay, Trouble, for that it both bindeth and also troubleth the minde. But of all forts of feare, there is none fo full of perplexitie, none fo unfit for action as that of superstition. The man who faileth not, is not afraid of the sea; neither searcth he the warres, who followeth not warfare; no to more than he who keepeth home and stirreth not out of doores, is afraid of theeves that rob by the high way fide; or the poore man that hath nought to loofe, of the Sycophant or promoter; nor he that liveth in meane estate, of envie; no more (I say) than he that is in Gaule searcth earth-quake, or in Aethiopia thunder and lightning : but the superstitious man that stands in feare of the gods, feareth all things, the land, the fea, the aire the skie, darkeneffe, light, filence and his verie dreames. Servants whiles they be a fleepe, forget the rigour and hardneffe of their mafters. Sleepe eafeth the cheines, gives and fetters, of those that ly by the heeles bound in prifon; dolorous inflammations, finart wounds, painfull ulcers and marimuls that eate and confume the flesh, yeeld some ease and alleviation unto patients whiles they be asleepe, according as he faith in the Tragedie:

> O fweet repole, o fleepe fo gracious That doest allay our maladies, How welcome art thou unto us, Bringing in scason remedies?

Thus faid he: But suspensition will not give a man leave thus to fay: For it alone maketh no truce during fleepe; it permitteth not the foule at any time to breath and take reft, no nor fuffereth it to plucke up her spirits and take heart againe by remooving out of her the unpleasant, tart and troublesome opinions as touching the divine power; but as if the sleepe of superstitious folke were a verie hell and place of damned persons, it doth present unto them terrible visions and monstrous fansies; it raiseth divels, fiends and furies, which torment the poore and 20 miferable foule; it driveth her out of her quiet repofe by her owne fearfull dreames, wherewith the whippeth, scourgeth, and punisheth herfelfe (as if it were) by some other, whose cruell and unreasonable commandements she doth obey; and yet here is not all; for, that which worse is fuch superstitious persons after they be awakened out of their sleepe and risen, do not as other men, despife their dreames, and either laugh thereat or take pleasure therein, for that they see there is nothing true in all their visions and illusions which should trouble and terrific them; but being escaped out of the shadow of those false illusions, wherein there is no harme or hurt at all, they deceive and trouble themselves in good earnest, spending their substance and goods infinitly upon magicians, juglars, enchanters, and fuch like deceivers whom they light upon, who beare a man in hand and thus fay unto him:

> If frighted thou be with fansies in sleepe, Or haunted with Hecate that beneath doth keepe.

Call for an old trot that tends thy backhouse, and plunge thy selfe in the sea water, and sit a whole day upon the ground,

O Greekes, you that would counted be most wise, These barbarous and wicked toics devise.

namely, upon a vaine and foolish supersition, enjoining men to begrime and beray themselves withdurt, to lie and wallow in the mire, to observe Sabbaths and cease from worke, to lie prostrate and groveling upon the earth with the face downeward, to fit upon the ground in open place, and to make many strange and extravagant adorations. In times past the maner was, as mong those especially who would enterteine and observe lawfull musicke, to command those that began to play upon the harpe or citterne, to sing thereto with a just mouth, to the end they should speake no dishonest thing; and even we also require and thinke it meet to pray unto the gods with a just and right mouth, & not to prie in the beast facisficed, to looke into the intrails, to observe whether the tongue thereof be pure and right, and in the meane time perverting and polluting our owne tongues with strange and absurd names, insecting and defiling the same with barbarous tearnes, offending thereby the gods, and violating the dignitie of that religion which is received from our ancestours; and authorised in our owne countrey. The Comicall

Poet faid pleasantly in one Comedie, speaking of those who laied their bedsteds thicke with golde and filver: Why do you make your fleepe deare and costly unto your selves, which is the only gift that the gods have given us freely ? even fo may a man very wel fay (and with great reafon) unto those that are superstitious : Seeing that the gods have bestowed upon us sleepe, for the oblivion and repose of our miseries, why makest thou it a very hel & place of continual and dolorous torment to thy poore foule, which can not flie nor have recourfe unto any other fleep but that which is troublefome unto thee ? Heraelitus was wont to fay: That men all the whiles they were awake, enjoied the benefit of no other world, but that which was common unto all: but when they flept, every one had a world by himselfe; but furely, the superstitious person hath not fo much as any part of the common world, for neither whiles hee is awake hath hee the true to use of reason and wisdome, nor when he sleepeth is he delivered from seare & secured; but one thing or other troubleth him still: his reason is asleepe, his seare is alwaies awake; so that neither can be avoid his owne harme quite, nor finde any meanes to put it by, and turne it off. Po. Lycrates the tyrant was dread and terrible in Samos, Periander in Corinth, but no man feared either the one or the other, who withdrew himfelfe into any free city or popular State; as for him who standeth in dread and feare of the imperial power of the gods, as of some rigorous and inexorable tyranny, whither shall he retire & withdraw himselfe ? whither shall he flie ? where shall he find a land, where that he meet with fea, without a god? into what fecret part of the world (poore man) wilt thou betake thy felfe, wherein thou maiest lie close and hidden, and be affured that thou art without the puissance and reach of the gods? There is a law that provideth for milera 20 ble flaves, who being so hardly intreated by their masters, are out of all hope that they shallbe enfranchifed and made free, namely; that they may demand to be folde againe and to change their master, if haply they may by that meanes come by a better and more easie servitude under another: but this superstition alloweth us not that libertie to change our gods for the better, nay, there is not a god to be found in the world, whom a superstituous person doth not dread, confidering that he feareth the tutelar gods of his native countrey, and the very gods protectors of his nativitie: he quaketheven before those gods which are known to be faviours propitious and gracious; he trembleth for feare, when he thinketh of them at whose hands we crave riches, abundance of goods, concord, peace, and the happie fuccesse of the best words and deeds that we have. Now if these thinke that bondage is a great calamitic, saying thus:

O heavie crosse and wofull miserie, Man and woman to be in thrall-estate: And namely, if their slaverie Be under lords unsorrunate.

how much more grievous thinke you is their fervitude which they endure, who can not flie, who can not runne away and escape, who can not change and turne to another. Altars there be, unto which bad fervants may flie for fuccour; many fanctuaries there be and priviledged churches for theeves and robbers, from whence no man is so hardy as to plucke and pull them out. Enemics after they are defeated and put to flight, if in the very rout and chafe they can take holde of fome image of the gods, or recover fome temple and get it over their heads once, are fecured 40 and afforced of their lives; whereas the superstitious person is most affrighted, scared, and put in feare by that, wherein all others who be affraid of extreamest evils that can happen to man, tepose their hope and trust. Never goe about to pull perforce a superstituous man out of sacred temples, for in them he is most afficted and tormented. What needs many words? In all men death is the end of life; but it is not so in superstition, for it extendeth and reacheth farther than the limits and utmost bounds thereof, making feare longer than this life, and adjoining unto death an imagination of immortall miferies; and even then, when there feemeth to be an end and ceffation of all forrowes & travels, be superstitious men perswaded that they must enter into others which be endleffe & everlafting: they dream of (I wot not what) deepe gates of a certein Plute or infernall God of hell, which open for to receive them; of fierie rivers alwaies burning; 50 of hollow gulfs and flouds of Styx to gape for them; of ugly and hideous darkeneffe to overfpread them, full of fundry apparitions; of gastly ghosts and forrowfull spirits, representing unto them grizlie and horrible shapes to see, and as fearefull and lamentable voices to heare: what should I speake of judges, of tormentors, of bottomlesse pits, and gaping caves, full of all forts of torture and infinite miseries. Thus unhappy and wretched superstition, by fearing overmuch and without reason, that which it imagineth to be nought, never taketh heed how it submitteth it selfe to all miseries; and for want of knowledge how to avoid this passionate trouble, occationed occasioned by the feare of the gods, forgeth and deviseth to it selfe an expectation of inevitable evils even after death. The impietie of an Atheist hath none of all this geere; most true it is, that his ignorance is unhappie, and that a great calamitie and miserie it is unto the soule, either to see amisse or wholly to be blinded, in so great & woorthy things, as having of many eies the principall and electest of all, to wit, the knowledge of God extinct and put out; but surely (as I said before) this passionate feare, this ulcer and fore of conscience, this trouble of spirit, this service abjection is not in his conceit; these goe alwaies with the other, who have such a suppositious opinion of the gods. Plato shith that mussicke was given unto men by the gods, as a singular meanes to make them more modest and gracious, yea and to bring them as it were to into tune, and cause them to be better conditioned, and not for delight and pleasure, not to tickle the cares: for falling out as it doth many times, that for default and want of the Muses and Graces, there is great confusion & disorder in the periods and harmonies, the accords and consonances of the minde, which breaketh out otherwhiles outragiously by meanes of intemperance and negligence; musicke is of that power that it setteth every thing againe in good order and their due place; for according as the poet Pindar we said.

Towhat soever from above, God Iupiter doth east no love, To that the voice melodious Of Muses seemeth odious.

20 Infomuch as they fall into fits of rage therewith, and be very fell & angrie; like as it is reported of tygers, who if they heare the found of drums or tabours round about them, will grow furious and starke mad, untill in the end they teare themselves in peeces: so that there commeth lesse harme unto them who by reason of deasenesse or hard hearing, have no sense at all of musicke, and are nothing mooved and affected therewith: a great infortunitie this was of blind Tireflas, that hee could not fee his children and friends, but much more unfortunate and unhappie were Athamas and Agave, who feeing their children, thought they faw lions and stags. And no doubt when Hereules tell to be enraged and mad, better it had beene and more expedient for him, that he had not feene nor knowne his owne children, than so to deale with those who were most deere unto him, and whom he loved more than all the world besides, as if they had beene 30 his mortall enemies. Thinke you not then, that there is the fame difference betweene the paffitons of Atheifts and superstitious folke? Atheifts have no sight nor knowledge of the gods at all; and the superstitious thinke there are gods, though they be perswaded of them amisse; Atheists neglect them altogether as if they were not; but the superstitious esteeme that to bee terrible, which is gracious & amiable; cruell and tyranlike, which is kind and fatherlike; hurtful and damageable unto us, which is most carefull of our good and profit; rough, rigorous, savage and fell of nature, which is void of choler and without passion. And hereupon it is that they beleeve-braffe founders, cutters in stone, imagers, gravers and workers in waxe, who shape, & represent unto them gods with bodies to the likenesse of mortall men, for such they imagine them to be, such they adorne, adore and worship, whiles in the meane time they despise philo-40 lophers and grave personages of State and government, who do teach and shew that the majeflie of God is accompanied with bountie, magnanimitie, love and carefull regard of our good: So that as in the one fort we may perceive a certeine sencelesse stupiditie and want of beleise in those causes from whence proceed all goodnesse; so in the other we may observe a distrust full doubt and feare of those which cannot otherwise be than profitable and gracious. In sum, impietie and Atheisme is nothing else but a meere want of feeling and sense of adeitic or divine power, for default of understanding and knowing the soveraigne good; and superstition is a heape of divers passions, suspecting and supposing that which is good by nature to bee bad; for superstitious persons seare the gods, and yet they have recourse unto them; they flatter them, and yet blafpheme and reproch them; they pray unto them, and yet complaine of them. 50 A common thing this is unto all men, not to be alwaies fortunate, whereas the gods are void of ficknesse, nor subject to old age, neither taste they of labour or paine at any time: and as Pindarus faith,

> Escape they do the passage of the firth Of roaring Acheron, and live alway in mirth.

But the paffions and affaires of men be intermedled with divers accidents and adventures which run as well one way as another. Now confider with me first and formost the Atheist in those things which happen against his minde, and learne his disposition and affection in such occurrences: if in other respects he be a temperate and modest man, beare he will his fortune patiently without faying a word; feeke for aide he will and comfort by what meanes he can; but if he be of nature violent, and take his misfortune impatiently, then he directeth and opposethall his plaints and lamentations against fortune and casualtie; then he crieth out that there is nothing in the world governed either by justice or with providence, but that all the affairesof man run confusedly headlong to destruction : but the fashion of the superstitious is otherwise. for let there never to finall an accident or milhap befal unto him, he fits him downe forrowing, and thereto he multiplieth and addeth other great and greevous afflictions, fuch as hardly be removed; he imagineth fundry frights, feares, fuspicions, and troublesometerrors, giving himselfe to all kinde of wailing, groaning, and dolefull lamentation; for he accuseth not any man, fortune, occasion, or his owne selfe; but he blameth God as the cause of all, giving out in plaine termes, that from thence it is that there falleth and runneth over him fuch a celeftiall influence of all calamitie and mifery, contesting in this wife, that an unhappie or unluckie man he is not, but one hated of the gods, woorthily punished and afflicted, yea and fuffring all defervedly by that divine power and providence: now if the godlefle Atheift be ficke, he discourfeth with himselfe and calleth to minde his repletions and full feedings, his surfeiting upon drinking wine, his disorders in diet, his immoderate travell & paines taken, yea and his unusual and abfurd change of aire, from that which was familiar, unto that which is strange and unnatuturall: moreover, if it chance that he have offended in any matter of government touching the State, incurred difference and an evill opinion of the people and country wherein he liveth, or to beenefailly accused and slandered before the prince or sovereigne ruler, he goeth no farther than to himselfe and those about him, imputing the cause of all thereto and to nothing els, and thus he reasoneth:

Where have I becner what good have I done? and what have I not done? Where have I slips? what dutie begun is left by me undone?

whereas the superstitious person will thinke and say, that everie disease and infirmitie of hisbodie, all his losses, the death of his children, his evill successe and infortunitie in managing civil affaires of State, and his repulses and differences, are so many plagues inflicted upon him by the ire of the gods, and the verie affaults of the divine juffice; informach as he dare not go about fecke for helpe and fuccour, nor avert his owne calamitie; he will not prefume to feeke force 10 medie, nor oppose himselse against the invalion of adverse fortune, for seare (forsooth) lest hee might seeme to fight against the gods, or to result their power and will when they punish him: thus when he lieth ficke in bed, he driveth his physician out of the chamber, when he is come to visit him; when he is in forrow, he shutteth and locketh his doore upon the Philosopher, that commeth to comfort him and give him good counfell: Let me alone (will he fay) and give me leave to fuffer punishment as I have deserved, wicked and profane creature that I am, accurled, hated of all the gods, demi-gods, and faints in heaven. Whereas if a (man who doth not beleeve nor is perswaded that there is a God) be otherwise in exceeding griefe and sorrow, it is an ordinarie thing with him to wipe away the teares as they gush out of his eies, and trickle downethe cheekes, to cause his haire to be cut, and to take away his mourning weed. As for a superstitious a person; how thoud one speake unto him, or which way succour and helpe him? without the doores he fits clad in fackloth, or elfe girded about his loines with patched clothes and tattered rags; oftentimes he will welter and wallow in the mire, confessing and declaring (I wotnot) what finnes and offenses that he buth committed; to wit, that he bath eaten or drunkethis or that, which his god would not permit; that he hath walked or gone some whither against the will and leave of the divine power. Now, say he be of the best fort of these superstituous people, and that he labour but of the milder superstition; yet will he at leastwife sit within house, having about him a number of all kindes of facrifices and facred aspersions; yee shall have old witches come and bring all the charmes, spels, and forceries they can come by, and hang them about his necke or other parts of his bodie (as it were) upon a stake, as Bion was woont to lay.

It is reported that Tyribajus when he should have beene apprehended by the Persians, drew his cemiter, and (as hee was a valiant man of his hands) detended himselfe valiantly; but so some as they that came to lay hands on him, cried out and protested that they were to attach him in the kings name & by commission from his Majestie, he laid downe his weapon aforesaid immediately, and offred both his hards to be bound and pinnioned. And is not this whereof we treat the semblable case? whereas others withstand sheir adversitie, repell and put backe their assistions, and worke all the meanes they can for to avoide, escape, and turne away that which they would not have to come upon them. A fuperflitious person will heate no man, but speake in this wise to himselse: Wretched man that thou art, all this thou suffers at the hands of God, and this is befallen unto thee by his commandement, and the divine providence; all hope hee rejecteth, he doth abandon and betray himselse, and looke whosover come to succour and helpe him, those he shunneth and repelleth from him. Many crosses these be and calamities in the world, otherwise moderate and tolerable, which superstition maketh mischievous and incurable.

That ancient King Midas in old time being troubled and disquieted much in his minde (as it (hould feeme) with certaine dreames and visions, in the end fell into such a melancholy and despaire, that willingly he made himselfe away by drinking buls blood. And Ari flodemusking of Messenians, in that warre which he waged against the Lacedamonians, when it hapned that the dogs velled and houled like wolves, and that there grew about the altar of his house the herbe called Dent de chien, or Dogs graffe, whereupon the wifards and foothfayers were afraid (as of fome tokens prefaging evill) conceived fuch an inward griefe, & tooke fo deepe a thought, that he fell into desperation and killed himselfe. As for Wicias the Generall of the Athenian armie, haply it had beene farre better that by the examples of Midas and Aristodemus he had beene delivered and rid from his superstition, than for feare of the shadow occasioned by the eclipse of the moone to have fitten still as he did and do nothing, untill the enemies environed and enclosed him round about; and after that fortie thousand of Athenians were either put to the 20 fword or taken prisoners, to come alive into the hands of his enemies, and lose his life with shame and dishonor: for in the darken effe occasioned by the opposition of the earth just in the mids, betweene the funneand the moone, whereby her body was shadowed and deprived of light, there was nothing for him to feare, and namely at fuch a time, when there was cause for him to have stood upon his feet and served valiantly in the field; but the darkenesse of blinde funcrifition was dangerous, to trouble and confound the judgement of a man who was possesfed therewith, at the very inftant, when his occasions required most the use of his wit and understanding:

The fea already troubled is
With billowes blew within the found,
Up to the capes and elifs arife
Thicke miftie clouds which gather round
About their tops, where they do feat,
Fore-shewing shortly tempests great.

A good and skilful pilot feeing this, doth well to pray unto the gods for to escape the imminent danger, and to invocate and call upon those saints for helpe, which they after call Saviours: but all the while that he is thus at his devour praiers, he holded the helme hard, he letteth downe the cross faile-yard,

Thus having firuck the maine faile downe the mast,

He seapes the sea, with darknesse over east.

40 He sead give the husbandman a precept, before he begin to drive the plough or sow his seede:

To Cereschaste his vowes to make, To Jove likewife god of his land, Forgetting not the while, to take The end of his plough-taile in hand.

And Homer bringeth in Ajax being at the point to enter into combat with Hellor, willing the Greeks to pray for him unto the gods; but whiles they praied, he forgat not to arme himfelfeat all pieces. Semblablie, Agamemor after he had given commandement to his fouldiours who were to fight, Esh one his launce and speare to wher, His shield likewise fit to set.

then, and not before, praieth unto Iupiter in this wife:

O Iupiter wonshifafe me of thy grace, The stately hall of Priamus to race.

for God is the hope of vertue and valour, not the pretenfe of floth and cowardife. But the Iewes were fo superfittious, that on their Sabbath (sitting still even whiles the enemies reared their scaling ladders and gained the walles of their citie) they never stirred foot, nor rose for the matter, but remained fast tied and inwrapped in their superstition as it were in a net. Thus you see what superstition is in those occurrences of times and affaires which succeed not to our minde, but contrary to our will (that is to say) in adversity; and as for times and occasions of mirth, when all chings fall out to a mans desire, it is no better than impietie or atheisme; and nothing is so joy. One will superstition man, as the folemnitie of festivall holidaies, great feasts and facrifices before the temples of the gods, the mysticall and facred rites performed when we are purissed and cleansed ples of the gods, the mysticall and facred rites performed when we are purissed and cleansed from our sinnes, the ceremonial service of the gods when wee worship and adore them; in which all, a superstitious man is no better than the Atheist: for make an Atheist in all these, he will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselse; these toises will set him (I say) into a will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselse; these toises will set him (I say) into a will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselse; these toises will set him (I say) into a will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselse; these toises will set him (I say) into a will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselse; and other whiles he will not sticke to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad solke be these? how are to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad solke be these? how are to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad solke be these? how are to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad solke be these? how are to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad solke be these? how are to say softly in the eare of some same and solke be softly in the eare of some same solves.

Which at one sime is full of incense sweet, Resounding mirth with loud triumphant song, And yet the same doth shew in every street All signes of griefe, with plaints and groanes among.

he looketh with a pale face, under his chaplet of flowers upon his head; he facrificeth, & yet qua-10 keth for feare; he maketh his praiers with a trembling voice; he putteth incense into the fire, and his hand thaketh withall to be thort, he maketh the speech or sentence of Pythagoras to be vaine and foolish, who was wont to say: That we are then in best case, when we approach unto the gods and worship them. For verily even then it is, when superstitious people are most wretched & mi ferable, to wit, whether enter into the temples & fanctuaries of the gods, as if they went into the dennes of beares, holes of ferpents and dragons, or caves of whales & fuch monfters of the fea. I marvel much therfore at them, who call the miscreance & finne of atheits, Impiety, & give not that name rather to superstition. And yet Anaxagoras was accused of impletie; for that he held and faid that the Sun was a stone: wheras never man yet called the Cimmerians impious or god leffe, because they suppose & believe there is no Sunne at all. What say you then? shall he who thinketh that there be no gods at all, be taken for a profane person and excommunicate? and shall not he who beleeveth them to be such as superstitious folke imagine them, be thoughtinfected with more impious and wicked opinions? For mine owne part, I would be better pleafed and content, if men should say of me thus: There neither is nor ever was in the world a manna med Plutareh, than to give out of me and fay: Plutareh is an unconstant man, variable, cholericke, full of revenge for the least occasion that is, or displeased and given to grieve for a small matter; who if when you invite others to supper, he be left out and not bidden, or if upon some businesse you be let and hindered, so that you come not to his doore for to visit him, or otherwife do not falute and speake unto him friendly, will be ready to eat your heart with falt, to set upon you with his fangs, and bite you, will not flicke to catch up one of your little babes and a worry him, or will keepe some mischievous wild beast of purpose, to put into your corne-fields, your vineyard or orchards for to devoure and spoile all your fruits. When Timotheus the multician one day in an open Theater at Athens chanted the praifes of Diana, giving unto her inhis fong the attributes of Thyas, Phabus, Manas, and Lyffus, that is to fay, Furious, Poffeffed Enraged, and Starke mad; as Poets are wont to doe, Cinefias another minstrell or musician, roleup from out of the whole audience, and faid thus aloud unto him: Would God thou haddelt a daughter of those quallities. And yet these superstitious folkethinke the same of Diana, yea, and worse to: neither have they a better opinion of Apollo, Juno, and Penus; for all of them they feare and tremble at. And yet what blafphemic uttered Niobe against Latona, like unto that which superstition hath perswaded foolish people to believe of that goddesse? to wit, that she so being displeased with the reprochfull words that Nube gave her, killed with her arrowes all the children of that filly woman, fo insatiable was she of the calamities of another, so implacable was her anger. For grant it were so, that this goddesse was full of gall and choler; say, that she tooke an hatred to leawed and wicked persons, or grieved & could not endure to heare herselfe reproched, or to laugh at humane solice.

Even daughters fixe, and somes as many just,
Of ripe yeeres all, no helpe, but die they must.

follic and ignorance; certes the should have bene offended and angry, yea, and discharged her arrowes upon these, who untruely impute and ascribe unto her that bitternesse and exceeding crueltie, and sticke nor both to deliver in words and also to set downe in writing, such things of her. Weecharge Heccuba with beastly and barbarous immanitie, for saying thus in the last booke of Homer's Iliads:

Othat I could his liver get Amid his corps, so bite and eat.

Asforthe Syrian goddeffe, fuperflitious folke are perfended, that if any one do cate Enthinfes or fuch little fifth as aphya, the will likewife gnaw their legs, fill their bodies with ulcers, and to puttific or rot their liver. To conclude therefore, is it impioufly done to blafpheme the gods and speake badly of them; and is it not as implous to thinke and imagine the same, considering that it is the opinion and conceit of the blafphemer and fould mouthed profane person which maketh his speech to be reputed naught and wicked? For even we our selves detest and abhorre foule language, for nothing fo much as because it is a figne of a malicious minde, and those we take for to be our enemies who give our badwords of us, in this respect that we suppose the to be faithlesse and morto be trusted, but rather ill affected unto us, and thinking badly of us! Thus you fee what judgement superstitious folke have of the gods, when they imagine them to be dull and blockish, treacherous and distoiall, variable and fickle minded, full of revenge, cruell, melancholike and apt to fret at every little matter: whereupon it must needs follow, that the su-20 perstitious man doth both liate and also dread the gods; for how can it otherwise be, consider ring thathe is perswaded that all the greatest calamities which either he hath endured in times palt, or is like to fuffer hecreafter proceed from them; now who loever hateth and fearerh the gods, he is no doubt their chemie; neither is it to be woondred at for all this, that although he standindread of them, yet he adoreth and worthippeth them, he praieth and sacrificeth unto them, frequenteth duly and devoutly their temples, and is not willingly out of them; for do we notifee it ordinarily, that reverence is done unto tyrants, that men make court unto them, and crie: God fave your grace; yea and crect golden statues to the honour of them: howbeit as great devotion and divine honour as they doe into them in outward apparence, they have and abhorre them fecretly to the heart. Hermolaus courted Alexander, and was ferviceable about 30 him: Paufanias was one of the squires of the bodie to king Philip, and so was Chareas to California the Emperour; but there was not of these but even when he served them, said thus in his heart, i januar

Certes in case it did now lie in mee,
Of thee (thou tyrant) revenged would I be.

Thus you fee the Atheist thinketh there being gods; but the superstitious person wishesh that there were none; yet he beleeveth even against his will that there be, nay he date not otherwise doe for feare of death. Now if he could (like as Tantalus defired to goe from under the stone that hung over his head) be discharged of this feare which no lesse doth pressent downersures ly he would embrace, yea and thinke the disposition and condition of an Atheist to be happie, as the state of steedome and libertie: but now the Atheist hath no sparke at all of superstition, 40 whereas the superstitious person is in will and affection a meere Atheist, howbeit weaker than to beleeve and thew in opinion that of the gods, which he would and is in his minde. Moreover, the Atheist in no wife giveth any cause, or ministreth occasion that superstition should arife; but superstition not onely was the first beginning of impietie and Atheisme, but also when it is forung up and growne, doth patronife and excuse it, although not truely and honestly, yet not without some colourable pretence: for the Sages and wise men in times past grew not into this opinion, that the world was wholly voide of a divine power and deitie, because they beheld and confidered any thing to be found fault withall in the heaven, some negligence and disorder to be marked, some confusion to be observed in the starres in the times and feasons of the yeere, in the revolutions thereof, in the course and motions of the sunne round go about the earth, which is the cause of night and day, or in the nouriture and food of beasts or in the yeerely generation and increase of the fruits upon the earth; but the ridiculous works and deeds of superstition, their passions woorthy to be mocked and laughed at, their words, their motions and geftures, their charmes, forceries, enchantments and magicall illusions, their runnings up and downe, their beating of drums & tabours, their impure purifications, their filthy castimonies and beastly fanctifications, their barbarous and unlawfull corrections and chastisements, their inhumane and shamefull indignities practized even in temples; these things(I fay) gave occasion first unto some for to say, that better it were there had bene no gods at all, than to admit such for gods who received and approoved these abuses, yea and tooke pleafure therein, or that they should be so outragious, proud, and injurious, so base and pinching fo easie to fall into choler upon a small cause, and so heard to be pleased againe. Had it not been farre better for those Gaules, Scythians, or Tartarians in old time to have had no thought, no imagination, no mention at all delivered unto them in histories, of gods; than to thinke there were gods delighting in the bloudshed of men, and to believe that the most holic and accomplished facrifice and service of the gods was to cut mens throates, and to spill their bloud; and had it not beene more expedient for the Garthaginians by having at the first for their law-gives either Critius or Diagorus to have beene perswaded that there was neither God in heaven nor thivell in hell, than to facrifice so as they did to Saturne, who not (as Empedocles said) reprooving an and taxing those that killed living creatures in facrifices

The fire lifts up his decre belooved for,
Who first some other forme and shape didtake:
He doth him slay, and sarrifice anon,
And sherewith vowes and sooly: praiers doth make.

but witting and knowing killed their owne children indeed for facrifice; and looke who had no iffue of their owne, would buie poore mens children, as if they were lambes, young calves, or kiddes, for the faide purpole. At which facrifice the mother that bare them in her wombe would stand by without any thewat all of being mooved, without weeping or fighing for pinie and compassion; for otherwise if thee either fetched a figh or thed a teare, thee must look the to price of her childe, and yet notwithstanding suffer it to be slaine and facrificed. Moreover, before and all about the image or idoll to which the facrifice was made, the place refounded and rung againe with the noise of flutes and hauthoies, with the found also of drums and timbrels, to the end that the pitifull crie of the poore infants thould not be heard. Now if any Tryphones or other fuch like giants, having chafed and driven out the gods, should usurpe the empire of the world and rule over us: what other facrifices would they delight in, or what offringselle and service besides could they require at mens hands ? Amestries the wife of the great Monarch Warses, buried quicke in the ground twelve persons, and offred them for the prolonging of her owne life unto Plute; which god (as Plate faith) was named Plute, Die, and Hades, for that being full of humanitie unto mankind, wife and rich befiles, he was able to entertaine the foules of 20 men with perswasive speeches and reasonable remonstrances.

Xenophanes the Naturalit, feeing the Egyptians at their folemne fealts knocking their breafts, and lamenting pitionfly, admonified them verie fully in this wife: My good friends, if these (quoth he) be gods whom you honor thus, lament not for them; and if they be men, factifice not tunto them. But there is nothing in the world so full of errors, no maladie of the minde so passionate and mingled with more contrarie and repugnant opinions, as this of superstition; in regard whereof, we ought to shunne and avoide the same, but not as many who, whiles they seeke to eschue the affaults of theeves by the high way side, or the invasion of wilde beasts out of the forcit, or the danger of fire, are so transported and catted away with fearethat they looke not about them, nor fee what they doe or whither they goe, and by that meanes light upon by waies, or rather places having no way at all, but in flead thereof bottomleffe pits and gulfes, or elfe fleepe downe-fals most perilous; even fo, there be divers that feeking to avoid superfitition, fall headlong upon the cragged rocke of perverte and stif-necked Impietie and Atherisme, leaping over true religion which is seated just in the mids betweene both.

OF EXILE OR BANISHMENT.

The Summarie.

Here is not aman, how well soever framed to the world and settled therein, who can promise unto himselfe any peaceable and assured state, throughout the course of his whole life; but according as it seemeth good to the esernall and wise providence of the almighties which governes hall things) to chassis our faults or to try our constancy in fait habe ought in time of a calme, to prepare himselfe for a tempe st, and not to astend

the mids of a danger, before he provide for his safetie, but betimes and long before to fortifie and fur-20 nilh himfelfe with that, whereof he may have need another day in all occurrences and accidents whatlower: Our Authour therefore in this Treatife writing to comfort and encourage one of his friends, cast downe with anguish occasioned by his banishment, sheweth throughout all his discourse, that vertueit is which maketh us happie in everie place, and shat there is nothing but vice that can hart and endamage us. Now as touching his particularifing of this point, in the fuft place he treateth what kinde of friends we have need of in our affliction, and have we ought then to ferve our turnes with them and in regard of exile mone particularly, he adjoinesh this advertisment, above all other things to fee unto those goods which we may enjoy during the same, and to oppose them against the present griefe and forrows Afterwards be prooveth by fundrie and diversreasons, that banif ment is not in it felfe simply naught; he difeovereth and laieth open the folly and melerie of those, who are too much 30 addicted unto one country, thewing by notable examples that a wife man may live at eafe and contentment in all places; that the habitation in a frange region, and the same limited and confined firsightly within certaine precincts, doth much more good or dinierly than harme; that a large countreylying out faire everie way, maketh aman never a whit the more happie: whereas contrativife to be enclosed and pent up, bringesh many commodibles withit, dealiring that this is the onely life; and that it is no life at all to be every more flitting to and fro from place to place. If own hen he hat b beautified this theame above faid with many faire similatudes and proper inductions, he comfortet his hole a ho are debarred and excluded from any citie or province; refuting with very good and found arguments certaine persons who held banishment for a note of infamie ; shewing withall, that it is nothing else but finne and wice which bringeth a maninto a lament ple flute and condition: concluding by the examples of Anaxagoras and Socrates that methor imprisoment nor death can enthrall or make miserable the man who loveth wertue.

And contrariws so give the us to understand by the examples of Phaethon and Carus, that without and sond sinful persons sall daily and continually ame way or other, into most grievous calamisiessievous their grane audacionnes and fallie.

OF EXILE OR BANISHMENT.

Emblable is the case of wise sentences and of good friends; the best and most and affured be those reputed, which are present with us in our calamities, not in vaine and for a shew, but to aide and succour us: for many there be who will not sticke to present themselves, yea, and be ready to conferre and talke with their friends in time of adversitie; howbeit, to no good purpose at all, but rather with some to danger to themselves, like as unskilfull divors, when they goe about to helpe those that are at point to be drowned, being classed about the body, sinke together with themselves, and discourses which come from friends and such as would seeme to be helpers, ought to tend unto the confolation of the partie afflicted; and not to the defence and jultification of the thing that afflicteth: for little need have we of fuch perfons as should weepe and lament with us in our tribulations & diffresses, as the maner is of the Chori or quires in Tragedies, but those rather, who will speake their minds frankely unto us, and make remonstrance plainly: That for a man to be sachand for rowfull, to afflict and cast downe himselse, is not onely every way bootlesses and unprositable, but also most vaine and soolish; but where the adverte occurrents themselves being well handled and managed by reason, when they are discovered what they be, give a man occasion to say thus unto himselse:

A meere ridiculous follie it wore, to aske either of bodie and flesh, what it aileth, or of soule, what it suffereth, and whether by the occurrence of this accident it fare worse than before; but to have recourfe unto strangers without, to teach us what our griefe is, by wailing, forrowing and grieving together with us a and therefore when wee are apart and alone by our felves, wee ought ech one to examine our owne heart and foule, about all and every mithap and information tie, yea, and to peife and weigh them, as if they were fo many burdens; for the bodie is prefied a downe onely by the weight of the furdell that loadeth it; but the foule often times of it fellegi veth a furcharge over and above the things that moleft it. A flore of the owner ature is hard, and yee of it felfe colde; neither is there any thing without, that give the casually to the one the hardnesse to resist, or to the other the coldnesse to congeale; but banishments, disgraces, te pulse and losse of dignitic, as also contrariwise; crownes, honours, sovereigne magnifracies, pteeminences, and highest places, being powerfull either to afflict or rejoice hearts, in some meafure more or leffe, not by their owne nature; but according to judgement and opinion, every man maketh to himselse light or heavie, easie to be borne or contratiwise intolerable: whereupon we may heare Polymices answering thus to the demand made unto him by his mother: valdy, v castagi

How then? is it a great calamitie,
To quit the place of our nativitie?
POLYNICES.

The greatest crosse of all it is doubilesse, And more indeed than my torque can expresse.

but contrativite, you shall heare column in another fong, according to a little Epigram written of him by a certeine Poet:

At Sardes, where mine ance stour's sometime abode did make,
If I were bred and nourished, my surname I skould take
Of some Celinus or Bacelus, in rober of golde ara'd,
And sewels sine, while I upon the tabour plas'd.
But now Aleman I cleped am, and of that Sparta great
A citizen, and poet: for in Greekish muse my vaine Exults me more than Dascyles or Gyges, tyrants twaine.

for it is the opinion, and nothing els, that caufeth one and the fame thing to be unto fome, good and commodious, as currant and approved money, but to others, unprofitable and hurtfull.

But fet case, that exile be a grievous calamitie, as many men doe both say and sing; even so, among those meats which we eat, there be many things bitter, sharpe, hote and bitting in taste, howest, howbeit, by mingling therewith formewhat which is fweet and pleafant, we take away that which dilagreeth with nature; like as there be colours also offensive to the sight, in such fort, as that the cies be much dazled and troubled therewith, by reason of their unpleasant hew, or excessive and intolerable brightnesse. If then, for to remedie that inconvenience by such offensive and resolendent colours, we have devised meanes, either to intermingle shadowes withall, or turne away our eies from them unto some greene and delectable objects; the semblable may we doe in those similter and crosse accidents of fortune; namely, by mixing among them those good and defireable bleffings which a man prefently doth enjoy, to wit, wealth and abundance of goods, a number of friends, and the want of nothing necessarie to this life: for I do not thinke, to that among the Sardinians there be many, who would not be very wel content with those goods and that estate which you have even in exile, and chuse rather with your condition of life otherwife, to live from home and in a strange countrey, than (like snailes, evermore sticking fast to their (hels) be without all good things els, & enjoy only that which they have at home in peace. without trouble and molestation. Like as therefore in a certaine Comædie, there was one who exhorted his friend being fallen into some adversitie, to take a good heart, and fight against fortune; who when he demanded of him againe, how he should combat with her, made answere: Marie after a Philosophicall maner; even so let us also mainteine battel, and be revenged of adverfitie, by following the rule of Philosophie, & being armed with patience as becommeth wife men. For after what fort doc we defend our felves against raine? or how be we revenged of the 20 Northwinde? marie we feeke for fire, we go into a ftouph, we make provision of clothes, and we get anhouse over our heads; neither doe we fit us downe in the raine, untill we be thorowly wet to the skinne, and then weepe our fill; and even fo, have you also in those things which are prefently about you, good meanes, yea, and better than any other, ro revive, refreth, and warme this part of your life which feemeth to be frozen and benummed with colde, as having no need at all of any other helps and fuccours, fo long as you will use the foresaid meanes, according as reafon doth prescribe & direct. For true it is, that the ventoses or cupping-glasses that Physicians use, drawing out of mans body the worst & most corrupt blood, do disburden & preserve all the reft. But they that are given to heavinefle & forrow, who love also evermore to whine and complaine, by gathering together & multiplying dontinually in their cogitations the worst matters 30 incident unto them, and eftloones confirming themselves with the dolorous accidents of their fortune, cause those meanes to be unprofitable unto them, which otherwise are wholesome and expedient, and even at fuch a time, especially when they should do most good. As for those two runnes my good friend which Homer faith to bee fet in heaven full of mens destinies, the one replenished with good and the other with bad, it is not supiter who sitteth to disperse and dillribute them abroad, fending unto fome milde and pleafant fortunes intermingled alwaies with goodnesse, but unto others continual streames (as a man would say) of meere misfortunes without any temperature of any goodnesse at all: but even among our owne selves as many as be wife and are of any found understanding, draw out of their happy fortunes whatfoever croffe and adverse matter is mingled therewith, and by this meaner make their life the pleasanter, 40 and as a man would fay more portable; whereas contrariwife, many men doe let their fortunes runne (as it were) through a colander or streiner, wherein the woorst sticke and remaine in the way behind, whiles the better do paffe and runne out; and therefore it behooveth that although webe fallen into any thing that is in truth naught and grievous unto us, we fet a cheereful countenance on the matter, and make the best supplie and recompence that we can by those good things that otherwise we have and doe remaine with us besides, lenisying and polishing the strange and adverse accident which hapneth without by that which is milde and familiar within.

But as touching those occurrents that simply of their owne nature be not ill, and whetein whatsoever doth trouble and offend us, ariseth altogether and wholly upon a vaine conceit and so foolish imagination of our owne; we ought to doe as our maner is with little children that bee afraid of maskes and disguised visours; for like as we hold the same close and neere unto them, handle and turne them in our hands before them every way, and so by that meanes acquaint them therewith, untill they make no reckoning at all of them; even so by approching neere, by touching and perusing the said calamities with our understanding and discourse of reason, wee are to consider and discover the salie apparence, the vanitie and seigned tragazdie that they pretend; like to which, is that present accident which now is befallen unto you, to wit, the banishment out of that place, which according to the vulgar errour of men you suppose to be your native countrie. For to fay a truth, there is no fuel diffined native foile that nature hathordeined, no more than either house, land, smiths forge or chirurgians shop is by nature, as Aria from was wont to say; but every one of these and such like according as any man doth occupie or use them, are his, or to speake more properly, are named and called his: for man, according to the saying of Plato is not an earthly plant, having the roote fixed fast within the ground and unmooveable, but celestiall and turning upward to heaven, whose body from the head as from a roote that doth strengthen the same abideth streight and upright. And heereupon it is that Hertuies in a certeine tragadic said thus:

What tell you me of Argive or Thebain, I do not wannt of any place certain, No burrough towne, nor city coms amid Through out all Greece, but it my countrie is.

And yet Socrates faid better than fo; who gave it out; That he was neither Athenian nor Grecian, but a citizen of the world; as if a man should say for example sake, that he were either a Rhodian or a Corinthian; for he would not exclude himselfe within the precincts and limits of the promontories Sunium or Tenarus, nor yet the Ceraunian mountaines,

But feest thou this starrie firmsment, So high above and infinitely vast, In bosome moist of water element, The earth beneath how it encloseth fast.

These are the bounds of a native countrie within the pour prise and compasse whereof whose ever is, ought not to thinke himselfe either banished, pilgrime, stranger or forcener; namely, whereas he shall meete with the same fire, the same water, the same aire, the same magistrates, the fame governors and prefidents; to wit, the funne, the moone, and the morning starte; the fame lawes throughout, under one and the felfe-fame order and conduct; the follfice and topicke of fummer in the north; the folflice and tropicke of winter in the fouth; the equinoxes both of fpring and fall, the starres Pleiades and Arcturus; the scasons of scednesse, the rimesof planting; one King, and the fame prince of all, even God, who hath in his hand the beginning, the mids, and the end of the whole and univerfall world; who by his influence goeth according to nature, directly through and round about all things, attended upon with righteoulnesseand 30 justice, to take vengeance and punishment of those who transgresse any point of divine law which all we likewife that are men doe exercise and use by the guidance and direction of naure against all others, as our citizens and subjects. Now fay that thou does not dwel and live in Sandeis, what matter is that? furely it is just nothing: No more doe all the Athenians inhabitein the burroughs or tribe Colyttus; nor the Corinthians in the fireet Cranium; ne yet the Laceda monians in the vilage Pytane : are those Athenians then to be counted strangers, and not inhabitants of the citie, who have removed out of Melite into Diomea: confidering that even there they doe folemnize yet the moneth of their transmigration named thereupon Metageltnion; yea and do celebrate a festivall holiday and sacrifice, which in memoriall of that remooving they call Metagetnia, for that this passage of theirs into another neighbourhood, they 40 received and interteined right willingly with joy and much contentment? I suppose you wilnever fay fo. Now tell me what part of this earth habitable or rather of the whole globe and compaffe thereof, can be faid farre diftant or remote one from the other, feeing that the Mathema ticians are able to proove and make demonstration by reason, that the whole in comparison and respect of heaven or the firmament is no more than a very pricke which hath no dimension at al? But we like unto pifmires driven out of our hole; or in maner of bees dispossessed of our hive, are cast downe and discomforted by and by, and take our selves to be foreiners and strangers, for that we know not how to effective and make all things our owne, familiar and proper unto us, as they be. And yet we laugh at the folly of him who faid: That the moone at Athens was better than at Corinch; being in the meane while after a fort in the fame error of judgement, as if so when we are gon a journey from the place of our habitation, we should mistake the earth, the sea, the aire and the skie, as if they were others and farre different from those which we are accustomed unto: for Nature hath permitted us to goe and walke through the world loofe and at libertie: but we for our parts imprison our selves, and we may thanke our selves that we are pent up in Itraight roomes, that we be housed and kept within wals; thus of our owne accord we leape into close and narrow places; and notwithstanding that we do thus by our selves, yet we mocke the Persian Kings, for that (if it be true which is reported of them) the drinke all of the water onely of the river Choafpes, by which meanes they make all the continent besides waterlesse, for any good they have by it : whereas, even we also when we travell and remoove into other countries, have a longing defire after the river Cephifus or Eurotus; yea and a minde unto the mountaine Taiget us or the hill Pernaffus; whereby upon a most vaine and foolish opinion, all the worldbefides is not onely void of water, but alfo like a defett, without citie, and altogether inhabitable untous. Contrariwife, certaine Egyptians by occasion of somewrath and excessive oppresfing of their King, minding to remoove into Ethiopia, when as their kinsfolke and friends requelted them to turne backe againe, and not to forfake their wives and children, after a shameleffernanner thewing unto them their genitall members, answered them: That they would neito therwant wives nor children, fo long as they carried those about them. But furely a man may avonch more honefilie, and with greater modestie and gravitie; that hee who in what place foever feeleth no want or miffe of those things which be necessarie for this life, cannot complaine and fay: That he is there out of his owne countrey, without citie, without his owne house and habitation, or a stranger stall; so as he onely have as he ought, his cie and understanding bent hereunto, for to stay and governe him in maner of a fure anchor, that he may be able to make benefit and use of any haven or harborough whatsoever he arriveth unto. For when a man hath lofthis goods, it is not fo eafica matter to recover them foone againe; but furely everie citie is straight waies as good a native countrey unto him, who knoweth and hath learned how touse it; to him (I say) who hath such rootes as will live, be nourished and grow in every place 20 and by any meanes, fultaras Themistocles was furnished with; and fuch as Demetrius the Phalerian was not without; who being banished from Athens, became a principall person in the court of King Proloman in Alexandria, where he not onely himselfe lived in great abundance of all things, but also sent unto the Athenians from thence rich gifts and presents. As for Themistocles living in the estate of a Prince, through the bountiful allowance and liberalitie of the King of Per sia, he was woont (by report) to fay unto his wife and children: We had beene utterly undone for ever, if we had not been cundone. And therefore Diogenes furnamed the Doe, when one brought him word and faid, the Sinopians have condemned thee to be extled out of the kingdome of Pontus: And I (quoth he) have confined them within the countrey of Pontus with this charge,

That they shall never passe the atmost bonds

Of Euxine feathat hems them with her stronds. Stratonius being in the Isle Seriphos which was a veric little one, demaunded of his host, for what crimes the punishment of exile was ordained in that countrey; and when he heard and understood by him, that they used to banish such as were convicted of falshood and untructh: Why then (quoth he againe) haft not thou committed fome falle and leawd act, to the ende that thoumightelt depart out of this straight place and be enlarged? whereas one Comicall Poet faid: Aman might gather and make a vintage (as it were) of figs with flings, and foilon of all commodities might be had, which an Iland wanted. For if one would weigh and confider the truthindeed, fetting afide all vaine opinion and foolish conceits, he that is affected unto one 40 titicalone, is a verie pilgrim and thranger in all others; for it feemeth nether meete, honeft, nor reasonable, that a man should abandon his owne for to inhabite those of others. Sparta is tallen to thylor (faith the proverbe) adorne and honor it, for so thou art bound to doe; be it that it is of small or no account; say that it is seated in an unholesome aire, and subject to many diseases, or be plagued with civill diffentions, or otherwise troubled with turbulent affaires. But who soeverhebewhom fortune hath deprived of his owne native countrey; certes she hath graunted and allowed him to make choice of that which may please and content him. And verily the precept of the Pythagoreans serveth to right good stead in this case to be practised: Choose (lav they) the best life; use and custome will make it pleasant enough unto thee. To this purpose also it may bee wifely and with great profit faid: Make choice of the best and most pleasant citie, 50 time will cause it to be thy native countrey, and such a native countrey as shall not distract and trouble thee with any bufineffe, nor impose upon thee these and such like exactions: Make paiment and contribute to this levie of money: Goe in embassage to Rome: Receive such a captaine or ruler into thine house, or take such a charge upon thee at thine owne expenses. Now he that calleth these things to remembrance, if he have any wit in his head, and be not overblind every way in his owne opinion and felte-conceit, will wish and choose, if he be banished out of his owne countrey, to inhabite the veric life Graros, or the rough and barraine Hand Cina. www.whetetrees or plants do hardly grow, without complaining with griefe of heart, without lalamenting and breaking out into these plaints and womanly moanes, reported by the Poet st. monides in these words:

The roaring noise of purple sea, resounding all about, Doth fright memuch, and so inclose, that I can not get out.

but rather he will beare in minde and discourse with himselfe the speech that Philip king of Ma. eedonie, sometime delivered: for when his hap was in the wrestling place to fall backward and lie along on the ground; after he was up againe upon his feet, and faw the whole proportion and print of his bodic in the dust of the floore : O Hercules (quoth he) what a small deale of the to earth is our portion by the appointment of nature, and yet fee how we will not rest, but coverto conquer the whole world that is habitable. You have feene (I suppose) the isle Naxos; if not, yet at leastwise the island Thuria neere by; of which twaine, this was in olde time the habitation of Orion; but in the other there dwelt Ephialtes and Otus : as for Alemaon, he made his abode and refidence upon the muddy banke, which the river Achelous had newly gathered and caftup, after it was a little dried and compact together, to avoid the purfute (as the Poets) fay of the Furies; but in my conceit rather, because he would decline the offices of State, civill magistracies, feditious broiles, and biting calumniations fib to furies in hel, he chofe fuch a streight and narrow place to inhabit, where he might leade a life in quietneffe and repofe, fecured from all fuch busic affaires. And Tiberius Cafar in his latter daies, lived seven yees s (even untill his death) 10 in the little island Caprea, in such wife, as the very temple and imperial throne of the whole world retired and drawen in (as it were) into the heart, for all that time never went out from thence; and yet for his part, the ordinarie cares incident unto the empire, which were brought from all parts and came upon him to amuse his head continually, on every side, would not permit him to enjoy cleerely without turbulent anguith of minde, that intended reft and quietnelle of his, in the faid island. But even that man, who may by his departure into some little islandse freed and delivered from no fmall troubles and calamities, is notwithflanding miferable, ifhe do not eftloones fay unto himselse when he is apart, yea, and chaunt oftentimes these verses of Pindarus:

Lovewell the place where Cypres trees do gro, But thin and small. The forrest great let go Of Candic ssle, about the Ida bill: As for my selfe, small lands I holde and till, By fortune given, and those without an oke; My heart likewise no griefs nor cares do yoke.

exempt I am from civill tumults and feditions; I am not subject to the command of princes and governours; my hand is not in the charge and administration of State affaires, nor in any publike ministeries or services, which hardly admit excuse or resusals. For considering that Cullimachus seemeth not unwisely in one place to say thus: Measure not wisedome by the Persian 500. Station. 300. Schoene: why then should we (meting felicitie with Schoenes & Parasanges) complaine, Jament 400 and torment our selves, as if we were unhappie, if our fortune be to dwell in a little is le which is not incircuit above two hundred surlongs, and nothing nere source daies stailing about, as Sicilie is? for what good can a spacious and large region do, for to procure selicitie, or make a man to leade a quiet and peaceable life? Heare you not how Tantalus in the Tragædie crieth out, and saith thus?

The spacious land and countrey large,
cal'd Berecynthian platne, Daies journeys twelve right out, I sow yeerely with corne and graine.
and a little after, he proceedeth to this speech;
But now my soule, sometime an heavenly power,
Descended thence into this earthly bower,
Speaks thus to me: Learne, and betimes take heed,
Love not this world too much, I do thee reed.

And Nausishow leaving the wide and large countrey Hyperia, for that the Cyclopes were so need neighbours unto it, and departing into an island farre remote from other men, where he lived alone by himselfe without conversing with any people:

From other mortall men apart, Of surging sea within the hart.

provided for his citizens and fubjects a most pleasant life. As for the islands called Cyclades, they were at first (by report) inhabited by the children of Minos, and afterwards the of-spring of Coderna and Neleun held the same, into which, foolish persons now-adaies thinke themselves fore punished and undone for ever, if they be consined. And yet, what island is there destined and appointed for exiled and banished people, but it is larger than the territorie Seilluntia, wherein Xenophon after that renowned expedition and voiage of his into Persia, passed his olde age in elegancie and much happinesse? Semblably, the Academie; a little pingle or plot of ground, the purchase whereof cost not above three thousand drachmes, was the habitation of Plato, Xenorates, and Postenon, wherein they kept their schooles, and lived at repose all their life time: and yet the standard posterior and passed in the second of the city, for to see the plaies and passiness exhibited with new Tragædies at the seast called Bacchanles, onely to honour (as solke said) and countenance that solemnitie with his personal presence. Also Theorism of Chios challenged and reproched Aristotle many times, for that to live in the court of Philip and Alexander, upon the mouth of Borborus to dwell He chose, and Academie bad farewell.

Now was this Borborus a river, so called by the Macedonians, which ran along the citie of Pella 20 in Matedonie. As for islands, Homer the Poet doth of purpose and expressly recommend unto us, and celebrate them with heavenly and divine praises, in this wise:

At Lemnos he arrived then, whereas the citie stood,
In which sometime that prince divine, king Thous made abode:
And what seever Lesbos isle, the pallace and the seas Of gods above conveines enclos dwhin her pour pringreat.
Also, When woon he had the stately isle, which Scytos sometime hight, when woon ne matere juster just,

which Scytos fornesime hight,
The native place and towns of Mars,
the god of armes and fight.
Likewife,
And those came from Dulichium, and eke the facredifles, Against Elis, Eclimades, within sea many miles.

40 Moreover it is said, that of famous and renowmed men, devout Aeolsu, and best beloved of the gods, dwelt in one ifle; the most prudent and wife uly/fes in another; Aux likewife, that right valiant and hardie warriour; and Alcinous the most courteous prince for hospitalitie and entertainment of strangers, were islanders. Zeno the Philosopher when newes was brought untohim: That the ship of his which remained alone of all the rest, was drowned in the sea with all the fraight and merchandise therein: Thou hast done well of fortune (quoth he) to drive us to our studying gowne and Philosophers life againe; even so, in mine opinion, there is no reason that a man (unlesse he be very much beforted and transported with the vaine wind of popularity) when he is confined and inclosed within an island, should complaine of fortune therefore, but rather praise her, for that she hath rid him of much anguish of spirit and trouble of his 50 head, delivered him from redious travell and wandring pilgrimages up and downe in the world from place to place; freed him from the perils of fea, remooved him from the tumultuous flirs of the multitude in judiciall courts and publicke affemblies of the citie; and reduced him to a fetled and staied life, full of rest and tranquillitie, not distracted with any supersuous and needleffe occupations, wherein he may live indeed properly to himfelfe, being raunged with in the center and circumference of those things which are required onely for necessitie. For what illand is there which hath not housen, walking places, stouphes and baines, or that is without fishes or hares, if a man be disposed to passe the time in fishing or hunting; and that which is the greatest matter of all, you may oftentimes there enjoy fully your rest and repose, which other do so much thirst and hunger after; for whereas when we are haply playing at dice, or otherwise keeping close at home, there will be some of these sycophants or busic priers and curious fearchers into all our actions, ready to draw us out of our houses of pleasure in the suburbes, or out of our delightfome gardens, to make our apparence judicially in the common place, or to performe our fervice and give attendance in the court: there will be none such a. bout to faile into the Island where thou art confined for to trouble thee; none wil come to thee to demaund or crave any thing, to borrow monie, to request thy suretiship, or thy affistance for to second him in the sute of any office and magistracie; unlesse peradventure some of thy best friends onely and neerest kinsfolke, of meere love and affectionate defire to see thee, faile over to for thy fake; for the rest of thy life besides is permitted to be as free and safe as a fanctuarie, not subject to any spoile, trouble, or molestation, if thou be willing & can skill to use thy liberty and repose. As for him who thinketh those to be happy who triudge up and downe in the world a. broad, spending most part of their time out of their owne houses, either in common innes and hostelries, or els in ferrying from place to place, he is much like unto him that supposeththe wandring planets to be in a better state than the other starres which be fixed in the firmament and remoove not; and yet there is not one of the faid planets but is carried round in a peculiat and proper sphære of the owne, as it were in a certeine Isle, keeping alwaies a just order in their revolution: for according as Heraclitus faith; The very funne himfelfe will never paffe beyond his bounds; and if he do, the furies which are the ministers of justice will finde him out and be to ready to encounter him. But these and all such like reasons my good friend we are to alledge unto them and fing in their eares, who being fent away and confined to some one Isle, cannot possibly change for another countrey, nor have commerce and dealing in any place els what foever, those I say,

Whom surging waves of seaboth night and day Enclose perforce, and cause them there to stay.

As for you unto whom no certeine place is limited and affigned for to inhabit, but who are debarred and excluded onely out of one, are thus to thinke, that the exclusion out of one citie alone, is an overture and ready way made unto all others.

Now if any man will object and fay; In this case of exile and banishment we are disabled for 30 bearing rule and office of State, we sit not at counsell table in the Senate house; we are not presidents in the publicke plaies and solemnities &c. You may answere and reply againe in this maner; neither are we troubled with factions and civill differntions; we are not called upon, not charged with paiments in publike levies and exactions; neither be we bound to make court met to great governors, and to give attendance at their gates; nor to take care and regard whether he who is chosen to succeed us in the government of our province, be either hastic and cholericke, or otherwise given to oppression and hard dealing: but as Architechus making no account at all of the stuisfull corne-fields and plenteous vineyards in Thaso, despised and contemned the whole sile because of some other rough, hard, and uneven places in it, giving out thereof in these termes,

even so we casting our eies and fixing them upon that part onely of exile which is the woorst and vilest of the rest, doe contemne and make no reckoning of the repose from businesse, the libertie also and leasure which it doth association, the summer in Media, and the most sweet and pleasant part of the spring at Susa. May not hee likewise who is departed out of his ownenative country during the solemnitie of the mysteries of Ceres, make his abode within the city Elem street all the time of the Bacchanales, celebrate that seast in Argos; and when the Pythian games & plaies are exhibited, go to Delphos; as also when the Isthmain pastimes be represented, make so a journey likewise to Corinths in case he be a man who taketh pleasure in the diversitie of shewes and publike spectacles, if not, then either sit still and rest, or else walke up and downe, reade some what, or take a nap of sweet sleepe without molestation or interruption of any man; and according as Diogenes was wont to say, Aristote dineth when it pleaseth king Philip; but Diogenes taketh his dinner when Diogenes thinketh it good himselse, without any businesse & affaires to distract him, and no magistrate, ruler, or captaine there was to interrupt his ordinary time and maner of diet. This is the reason why very sew of the wisest and only prudent men that ever were, have beene buried in the countries where they were borne; but the most part of them without any constraint or necessitie to enforce them, have willingly weighed anker, and of their owne accord sailed to another rode or haven to harbour in, and there to lead their life; for some of them have departed to Ashens, others have for saken Athens & gone to other places: for what manever gave out such a commendation of his owne native country as did Europides in these verses, in the person of a woman:

Our people all, at first no strangers were, From forraine parts who thither did arrive; Time out of minde tho fethat inhabite here. Were borne in place, and so remain dalive. All cities else and nations at one word With aliens peopled be who like to men At table play, or else upon chesse-boord Remooved have and leapt some now some then. If women we, may be allow dro grace Our native soile, and with proude words exalt, Presume we dare to say that in this place, A temperate airewe have without default, Where neither heat nor cold excessive u; If ought there be that noble Greece doth yeeld. Or Asia rich, of best commodities, And daintiest fruits, by river or by field, We have it here, in foison plentifull To hunt, to catch, to reape, to crop and pull.

And yet even he who hath fet such goodly praises upon his native countrey, left the same, went into Macedonia, and there lived in the court of King Archelam. You have heard likewise (I suppose)this little Epigram in verse:

Enterred and entombed lieth here, Euphorians sonne the Poet Aeschylus

(In Athens towne though borne sometime he were)

To Gelas neere, incorne so plemeous.

For healso abandoned his owne countrey, and went to dwell in Sicilie, like as Simonides did before him. And whereas this title or inscription is commonly read (This is the Historie written by Herodotus the Halicarnasseum) many there be who correct it and written this maner; Herodotus the Thurian, for that he remooved out of the countrey wherein he was borne, became an inhabitant among the Thurians, and enjoied the freedome of that colonie. As for that heavenly and divine spirit in the knowledge of Muses and Poetrie,

Homerus, who with woondrom pen,

Set foorth the battels Phrygien. 40 what was it that caused so many cities to debate about the place of his nativitie, chalenging everie one unto themselves, but onely this; that hee seemed not to praise and extoll any one citie above the rest? Moreover, to Japiner surnamed Hospitall, know we not that there be many, & those right great, honors done. Now if any one shall say unto me, that these personages were all of them ambitious, afpiring to great honor and glorie, doe no more, but have recourfe unto the Sages, and those wife schooles and learned colledges of Athens; call to minde and consider the renowmed clerkes and famous Philosophers, either in Lycaum or the Academie: go to the gallerie Stoa, the learned schoole Palladium, or the Musicke Schoole Odaum. If you affect, love and admire above all other the fect of the Peripateticks, Aristotle the prince thereof was borne in Stagira, acitic of Macedonia; Theophrastum in Eressur, Strato came from Lamplacu; Glycon from 50 Tross; Ariston from Chios; and Critolam from Phaselm. If your minde stand more to praise the Stoickes, Cleanthes was of Affor; Zeno was a Citican; Chryfippu came from Soli; Diegenes from Babylon; and Antipater from Thar [111] and Archidamus being an Athenian borne, went to dwell among the Parthians, and left behind him at Babylon in succession, the Stoicke discipline and Philosophie. Who was it that chased and drave these men out of their native countries? certes none, but even of their owne accord and voluntary motion they fought all abroad for their contentment and repose, which hardly or not at all can they enjoy at home in their owne houses, who are in any authoritie and reputation; fo that, as they have taught us veriewell out of their bookes, bookes, other good sciences which they professed; so this one point of living in quietnes and rest they have shewed unto us by practife and example. And even in these dates also, the most renowined and approoved clerkes, yea and greatest men of marke and name, live in strange countries, farre remote from their owne habitations; not transported by others, but of them, selves removing thither; not banished, sent away, and confined; but willing to sie and avoide the troublesome affaires, negotiations and businesse, which their native countries amuse them with. That this is true, it may appeare by the most approoved, excellent, and commendable workes and compositions, which ancient writers have left unto posteritie; for the absolute finithing whereof it feemeth that the Muses used the helpe and meanes of their exile. Thus Thu. erdides the Athenian penned the warre betweene the Peloponnesians and the Athenians whiles to he was in Thracia, and namely necre unto a place called the Forest of the Foffe. Xenophon com. piled his storie at Seillos in Elea; Philip wrate in Epiruu; Timeus who was borne at Taurominum in Sietlie, became a writer in Athens; Androuon the Athenian at Megara, and Bachilides the Poet in Peloponnesus; who all and many others besides, being banished out of their countries, were never discouraged nor cast downe, but shewed the vivacitie and vigor of their good spirits, and tooke their exile at fortunes hands as a good maintenance and provision of their journey; by meanes whereof they live in fame and renowne now after their death: whereas on the other fide, there remaineth no memoriall at all of those, by whose factions and sidings they were dri ven out and exiled. And therefore he deserveth to be well mocked, who thinketh that banishment carrieth with it some note of infamie and reproch, as necessarily adherent thereto. For w what fay you to this? Is Diogenes to be counted infamous, whom when King Alexander fawfit ting in the funne, heapproched necre and flanding by him, demaunded whether he floodin need of any thing or no? he had no other answere from him but this, that he had need of nothing elfe, but that he should stand alittle out of the sunne-shine, and not shadow him as hedid; whereupon Alexander woondring at his magnanimitie and haughtie courage, faid prefently unto those friends that were about him; If I were not Alexander I would be Diogenes. And was Camillus disgraced any way for being banished out of Rome, considering that even at this date he is reputed and taken for the second founder thereof? Neither lost Themistocles the gloid which he had woon among the Greekes by his exile, but rather acquired thereto great honor& estimation with the Barbarians. And no man is there so base minded and carelesse of honorand a credit, but he would choose rather to be Themistocles banished as he was, than Leobates his accufer, and the cause of his banishment; yea, and to be Cieero who was exiled, than Clodius who chafed him out of Rome; or Timothem, who was constrained to abandon and forfake his naive countrey, than Aristophon who endited him and caused him to leave the same. But for that the authoritie of Euripides who feemeth mightily to defame and condemne banishment, mooveth many men; let us consider what be his severall questions and answeres to this point:

IOCASTA.

How then is it a great calamitie
To loofe the place of our nativitie?
POLYNICES.
The greatest cossel i hold it is doubtlesse,
And more indeed than my tongue can expresse.
IOCASTA.
The manner would I gladly under stand,
And what doth grieve man shut from native land?
POLYNICES.
This one thing first, the sorest griefe must be,
That of their speech they have not libertie.
IOCASTA.
A spight it is no doubt, and that of service kind,
For men to be debard to speake their mind.

POLYNICHS.

Besides, they must endure the foolish nesse.

And innovance of rules common or lesse.

And ignorance of rulers, more or lesse.

But herein I cannot allow of his sentence and opinion as well and truely delivered. For first and formost, not to speake what a man thinketh, is not the point of a slavish and base person, buttather he is to be counted a wise and prudent man, who can hold his tongue at those times and in fuch occasions as require taciturnitie and filence; which the same Poet hath taught us in another place more wifely, when he saith,

Silence is good when that it doth availe, Likewise so speake in time and not so faile.

And as for the folly and ignorance of great and mightic persons, we must abide no lesse when we tarrie at home, than in exile; nay it falleth out many times, that men at home feare much more the calumniations and violence of those who injustly are in high places of authoritic withincities, than if they were abroad and out of their owne countries. Againe, this also is most false and abfurd, that the faid Poet depriveth banished persons of their libertie and stanke speech, to Certes, this were a woonderfull matter, that Theodorus wanted his freedome of tongue, confidering that when King Lysimachus faid unto him: And hath thy countrey chased and cast thee out, being so great a person among them; Yea (quoth he againe) for that it was no more able to beare me, than Semele to beare Bacehus: neither was he dannted and afraid, notwithstanding that the King shewed unto him Telesphorus enclosed within an iron cage, whose cies he had caused before to be pulled out of his head, his note and eares to be cropt, and his tongue to be cut, adding withal these words: See how I handle those that displease and abuse my person. And what shall we say of Diogenes? Wanted he (thinke you) his libertie of speech? who being come into the campe of King Philip, at what time time as he made an expedition against the Grecians, invaded their countrey and was ready to give them battell, was apprehended and brought before 20 the king as a spie, and charged therewith: I am indeed (quoth he) come hither to spie your infatiable avarice, ambition, and folly, who are about now to hazard in one houre (as it were) with the cast of a die, not onely your crowne and dignitie, but also your life and person; semblably, what thinke you of Anniball the Carthaginian? was he tongue tied before Antiochin, banished though himselfe were, and the other a mightie monarch? For when he advised Antiochus to take the opportunitie presented unto him, and to give battell unto the Romans his enemies, and the king having facrificed unto the gods answered againe, that the entrails of the beast killed for sacrifice, would not permit but forbad him fo to do: Why then (quoth he by way of reproofe and rebuke) you will doe that belike, which a peece of dead flesh biddeth you, and not that which a man of wisedome and understanding counselleth you unto. But neither Geometricians, nor 30 those that use linearie demonstrations, if haply they be banished, are deprived of their libertie, but that they may discourse & speake frankly of their art, and science of such things as they have learned and knowen: how then should good, honest and honorable persons be debarred of that freedome, in case they be exiled? But in trueth, it is cowardise and basenes of minde, which alwaies stoppeth the voice, tieth the tongue, stifleth the wind-pipe, and causeth men to be speechleffe. But proceed we to that which followeth afterwards in Eurpides:

But thus we fay those that are banished
With hopes alwaies of better daies be fed.
POLYNICES.

Good eies they have afarre off they doe fee, Staying for things that most uncertaine be.

Certainely these words implie rather ablame and reprehension of folly, than of exile. For they benot those who have learned and doeknow how to apply themselves unto things present, and touse their estate such as it is, but such as continually depend upon the expectance of future fortunes, and covet evermore that which is absent and wanting, who are tossed to and fro with hopeas in a little punt or bote storing upon the water; yea although they were never in their lifetime without the wals of the citic wherein they were borne: moreover whereas we reade in the same Euripides,

I OCASTA.
Thy fathers friends and allies, have not they Beene kind and helpfull to thee, as they may?
POLYNICES.
Looke to thy felfe, from troubles God thee bleffe, Friends helpe is naught if one bein diffress.
LOCASTA.

Thy noble blood from whence thou are descended:

Hath

Hath it not thee advanc'd and much amended?

POLYNICES.

I hold it ill, to be in want and need,

For parentage and birth doth not men feed.

These speeches of polynices are not onely untrue, but also bewray his unthankfulnesse, when he feemeth thus to blame his want of honor and due regard for his nobility, and to complaine that hee was destitute of friends by occasion of his exile, considering that in respect of his noble birth, banished though he were, yet so highly honoured he was that he was thought woorthieto be matched in marriage with a kings daughter, and as for friends, allies, and consederates, hee was able to gather a puissant armie of them, by whose aide and power he returned into his owne to country by force of armes, as himselfe testifieth a little after in these words:

Many a lord and captaine brave here stands With me in field, but h from Myccuse bright, And cities more of Greece, whose helping hands (Though loth) I must needes use in claime of right.

Much like also be the speeches of his mother lamenting in this wise;

No nuptiall torch at all I lighted have To thee, as doth a wedding feaft befeeme, No mariage fong was fung, nor thee to lave Was water brought from faire Hincous streame.

whom it had become and behooved rather to rejoice and be glad in heart, when the heatd that her fonne was fo highly advanced and married into fo rotall an houfe; but in taking griefe and fortow her-felfe that there was no wedding torch lighted, & that the river Ismenus affoorded no water to bathe in at his wedding; as if new maried bridegroomes could not be furnished either with fire or water in the city Argos; the attributeth unto exile, the inconveniences which more truly proceed from vanitie and tollie.

But some man will say unto me; That to be banished is a note of ignominie and reproch: true it is indeed, but among fooles onely, who thinke likewife that it is a shame to be poore, to be bald, to be small of stature, yea and to be a stranger for sooth, a tenant, in-mate or alien inhabitant: For certes such as will not suffer themselves to be caried away with these vaine perswall 10 ons, nor do subscribe thereto, esteeme & have in admiration good and honest persons, nevertespecting whether they be poore, strangers, and banished or no: Do we not see that all the world doth honor and reverence the temple of Thefew aswell as Parthenon and Eleusinium, temples dedicated to Amerva, Ceres, and Proferpina? and yet was Thefeus banished from Athens; even that Thefeus by whose meanes the same citic was first peopled, and is at this day inhabited; and that citic loft he which he held not from another, but founded first himselfe. As for Eleasis what beautic at all would remaine in it? if we dishonor Eurolpus and be ashamed of him who remooving out of Thracia, instituted at first among the Greeks the religion of sacred mysteries, which continueth in force and is observed at this day: what shall we say of Codrus who became king of Athens? whose some I pray you was he? was not Melanthim his father a banished man 40 from Meßina. Can you chuse but commend the answere of Antisthenes to one who said unto him; Thy mother is a Phrygian: So was (quoth he) the mother of the gods: why answer you not likewise when you are reproched with your banishment? even so was the father of that victorious conqueror Hercules: the grand-fire likewise of Bacchus, who being sent out for to seeke lady Europa, never returned backe into his native countrie:

For being a Phanician borne, At Thebes be after did arrive, Far from his native foile beforne, And there begat a forme belive, Who Bacchus did engender the, That mooves to furse women, hight Mad Bacchus, runneth to and fro, In service such is his delight,

As for that which the Poet Aefehrlus would feeme covertly by these darke words to infinuate, or rather to show a farre off, when he saith thus:

And chaste Apollo facred though be were,

Tes banified a time, heaven did for beare.

I am content to paffe over in filence, and will for beare to utter according as Herodot mainth: and whereas Empedocles in the very beginning of his philosophic maketh this præface:

An associant law there stands in force, decreed by gods above, Grounded upon necessite, and never to remove:

That after man hath stein d his hands
in bloudhed horrible,

And in remonse of sime is vext with horrour terrible.

The long live dangels which attend in heaven, shall chase him quite, For many shous and yeares from view of every blessed wight:

By vertue of this law, am I from gods, exiled now,

And wander heere and there throughout the world I know not how.

This he meaneth not of himfelfe alone, but of all us after him, whom he declareth and fheweth by these words to be meere strangers, passiongers, forreiners, and banished persons in this world, For it is not bloud (quoth he) o men, nor vitall spirit contemperate together, that hath given unto us the substance of our soule and beginning of our life; but hereof is the bodie only composed and framed, which is earthly and mortall; but the generation of the soule which commeth another way, and descendeth hither into these parts beneath, he doth mitigate and feeme to difguife by the most gentle and mildename that hee could devise, calling it a kinde of pilgrimage from the naturall place; but to use the right tearme indeed, and to speake according to the very truth, she doth vague and wander as banished, chased and driven by the divine lawes and statutes to and sto, untill such time as it setleth to a bodie, as an oister or shell fish to one 20 Tocke or other in an island beaten and dashed upon with many windes and waves of the sea round about (as Plato faith) for that it doth not remember nor call to mind from what height of honor, & from how bleffed an effate it is translated, not changing as a man would say Sardis for Athens, nor Corinth for Lemnos or Sogros, but her refiance in the very heaven and about the moone, with the abode upon earth, and with a terrestrial life; whereas it thinketh it strange and as much discontented heere for that it hath made exchange of one place for another not farre diffant; much like unto a poore plane that by removing doth degenerate and begin to wither away and yet we see, that for certaine plants some soile is more commodious and sortable than another, wherein they will like, thrive, and prosper better: whereas contrariwise there is no place that taketh from a man his felicitie, no more than it doth his vertue, fortitude or wifedome: for Anaxagoras during the time that he was in prison wrote his Quawifedome: for Anaxagoras during the time that he was in prison wrote his Quadrature of the circle: and Socrates even when he drunke poisson, discourfed as a philosopher, exhorting his friends and familiars to the fludie of philosophic, and was by them reputed happie; but contrativise Phaeton and Icaram who (as the poets do report) would needs mount up into heaven, through their owne folly and inconfiderate rashnes, fell into most greevous and wofull calamities.

The Summarie.

He covetous defire of earthly goods, is a passion incurable, but especially after that it hash gotten the masterie of the soule, in such sort, as the advertisements which are made in regard of covetous men, be not proposed for any thing els but sor the profit and benefit of those persons who are to keepe themselves from the nets and snares of 10 these enemies of humane societie. Now among all those who have need of good counfels in this behalfe, we must range shem that take up money upon interest, who serving as a pray and bootse to these greedie and hungry bunters, ought so much the rather to look ounto their owne presen viation, if they would not be cruelly devoured. And as this infortunitie hath bene in the world ever lines the entrie of sinne, that alwaies some or other, yea, and great numbers have endewoured to make their commoditie and gaine by the loffe and dammage of their neighbours; so we may see heere, that in Plurarchs sime things were growen to a woonderfull confusion, the which is nothing diminifued fines, but contrarriefe it feemeth that in thefe our daies is is come to the very height. And for to applie some remedie heereto, our authour leavesh usurers altogether as persons gracelesse, reprobate and ancapable of all remonstrance, addressing himselfe unto borrowers, to the end that be might discour 30 and lay open unto them the snares and nets into which they plunge themselves; and this he doth with out specifying or particularising over neere of usurie, because there is no meane or measure limited no any end of this furious defire of gathering and heaping up things corruptible. Considering then that covetous folke have neither nerve nor veine that reachesh or tendeth to the fittle of their neighbours, meet is is and good reason that borrowers should have some mercie and compassion of themselves, to weigh and ponder well the grave discourses of this authour, and to applie the same unto the right use. He laith therefore, that the principall meanes to keepe and fave themselves from the teeth of usurie, is to make the best of their owne, and shift with those things that they have about them, before they approch unto the denne of this hungrie and greedie beast, and that men ought to make an hand & quicke dispatch of that which is not very necessary, before they come this her; where he saxeth those who had go lever lay to gage and pawne their goods, and remaine under the burden of usurie, than to sell up all and diseage themselves at once. After this, be presented the true remedie of this mischiefe, namely, to spare and spend in measure; and to cause us to be more warie and bester advised, he proposeth the livelie image of this horrible monster, whom we call an Usurer, describing him in his colours, with all his practifes and passions. Which done, he sheweth she fourde of borrowing money upon interest, and the way to stop the same; he directeth his pen particularly for st unto the poore, giving them a goodly lesson, and then unto the richer sort, teaching the one aswell as the other, how they are to demeane and carie themselves, that they be not exposed in the clutches of usurers. And for a conclusion, be exhorteth them to behold the example of cer-50 teine Philosophers by name, who chose rather to abandon & for fake all their goods, than to undoe them felves in the poffe fron & bold-

THAT

THAT WE OUGHT NOT TO take up money upon usurie.

Late in his books of Lawes, permitteth not one neighbour to make bolde with anothers water, before he have digged and finke a pit for deepe in his owne ground, that he is come to a veine of clay or portets earth; untill (I fay) he have founded thorowly, and found that the plot of ground is not apt to ingender water, or yeeld a foring; [for the faid potters clay being by nature fattie, folide and flrong, reteineth that moifture which it hath once received, and will not let it folke or paffe thorow:] but allowed they are, and ought to furnish themselves with water from others, when they have no meanes to find any of their own; for a function as the law interdeth to provide for mens necessitie, and not to favour their idlenesse; even so there ought to be an ordinance and act as touching money; That it might not be lawfull for those to borrow upon usuric, nor to goe into other mens puries (as it were) to draw water at their welles or pits, before they have cast about all meanes at home, fearched every way, and gathered (as it were) from everic 20 gutter and fpring, trying and affaying how to draw and come by that which may ferve their owne turnes, and supplie their present necessities. But now it falleth out contrariwise, that manie there be, who to furnish their foolish and riotous expenses, or els to accomplish their superfluous and chargeable delights, never ferve their owne turnes, nor make use of those things which they have, but are readie to feeke unto others, even to their great cost, though they stand in no need at all: for an undoubted & certeine proofe hereof, marke how usurers do not ordinarily put forth their money unto those who are in necessity & distresse, but to such as be desirous to purchase and get that which is superfluous, and whereof they stand not in need; insomuch as that which is credited out and delivered unto him that borroweth, is a good proofe and sufficient teltimonie, that he hath fornewhat to take to of his owne; whereas indeed he ought (fince 30 he hath wherewith) to looke unto it, that he take not upon interest, and contrariwise, not to be credited nor to be in the ulurers booke, is an argument that fuch an one is needie.

Why doest thou repaire and make court (as it were) obsequiously to a banker or merchant? goe thy waies and borrow of thine owne banke, make a friend of thine owne flocke; flaggons thou half and pots, chargers, basons and dishes all of silver plate; imploy the same about thy necessities, for to supply thy wants, and when thou hast disfurnished thy table and cup-boord, the gentle towne Antis or els the ifle Tenedos, will make up all again with faire veffel of earth and pottery, which is much more neat & pure than those of filver; for these cary not the strong sines nor unpleafant fent of usury, which like rust or canker, every day more & more, fullieth, fretteth & eateth into thy costly magnificence; these will not put thee in minde daily of the calends and 40 new moones, which being in it felfe the most facred & holy day of the moneth, is by meanes of the usurers, become odious and accursed. For as touching those, who choose rather to lay their goods to gage, & to pawn them for to borrow money thereupon & pay for use, than to sel them right out, I am verily perswaded that god Jupiter himselfe surnamed Ctessus, that is, Possessor, can not fave them from beggery. Abashed they are to receive the price and value of their goods to the woorth; but they be not ashamed to pay interest for the lone of money. And yet that wife and politike Pericles caused the costly robe and attire of the statue of Minerva weighing forty talents in fine gold, to be made in fuch fort, that he might take it off and put it on as he would at his pleasure; To the ende (quoth he) that when we stand in need of money for maintenance of warre, we may ferve our turnes therewith for the time, and afterwards put in the place againe an-10 other of no leffe weight and woorth; even fo welikewife in our accusations and affaires, like as in the befreging of acitie, ought never to admit the garrifon of an ulurer or enemie, nor to endure to fee before our eies our owne goods delivered out for to continue in perpetuall fervitude, but rather to cut-off from our labour all that is neither profitable nor necessarie; likewise from our beds, from our couches, and our ordinarie expenses in diet what soever is heedlesse; thereby to maintaine and keepe our felves free, in hope and with full intent to supply and make amends againe for it, if fortune afterwards smile upon us. Certes, the Romane dames in times Patt were willing to part with their jewels and ornaments of gold, yea and give them away as an offering of first fruits to Apollo Pythins, whereof was made a golden cup, and the same sente the citie of Delphi. And the Matrons of Carthage shore the haire of their heads, to make thereof twifted cords for to winde up and bend their engines and instruments of artillerie in the defence of their countrey, when the cittle was belieged. But we, as if we were alhamed of our owne luffi. ciencie, and to stand upon our owne bottomes, seeke to enthrall our selves by gages and obliga. tions; whereas it behooved us much more by restraining our selves and reducing all to such things onely as be profitable and good for us, of those needlesse, unprofitable and superstooms veffels which we have, after they be either melted, broken in pieces, or fold, to build a privileged chappell of libertie, for our felves, our wives and children. For the goddeffe Diana in Ephelia. yeelded fanctuarie, franchife and favegard unto all debters against their creditours, who fled for fuccour into her temple. But the fanctuarie indeed of parfimonie, frugalitie and moderate expenfe, into which no usurers can make entrie, for to hale and pull out of it any debter prisoner, standeth alwaies open for those that are wise, and affoordeth unto them a large space, of joious and honorable repose. For like as that Prophetesse which gave oracles in the temple of Pythiu Apollo, about the time of the Medians warre, made answere unto the Athenian Embassadors: That God gave vnto them for their fafetie a wall of wood; whereupon they leaving their lands and possessions, abandoning their citie, and for saking their houses and all the goods therein, had recourse unto their ships for to save their libertie; even so, God giveth unto us woodden tables. carthen veffels, and garments of course cloth, if we would live in freedome:

Set not thy minde upon fleeds of great price, And chariots brave in filver harneffe dight, With classes, with hookes, and studs by fine device Twrought, in race to siew a goodly sight, for how swift soever they be, these usurers will soone overtake them and run beyond. But rather get upon the next affe thou meetelt with, or the first pack-horse that commeth in thy way, to flie from the usurer, a cruell enemie and meere tyrant, who demaundeth not arthy hands fire and water, as fornetimes did that barbarous King of Media; but that which woorle is, toucheth thy libertie, woundeth thine honor and credit by proscriptions, writs, and open proclamations. If thou pay him not to his conteut, he is ready to trouble thee; if thou have wherewith to fatisfie him, he wil not receive thy payment, unlosse he list; if thou prize and fell thy goods, he will have 20 them under their worth; att thou not disposed to make a sale of them? hee will force thee to it; doest thou sue him for his extreame dealing, he will seeme to offer parley of agreement; if thou Iweare unto him that thou wilt make paiment, he will impose upon thee hard conditions, and have thee at command; if thou goe to his house for to speake and conferre with him, hee will locke the gates against thee; and if thou stay at home and keepe house, thou shalt have him rapping at thy doore; he will not away but take up his lodging there with thee. For in what stead Terved the law of Solon in Athens, wherein it was ordained, that among the Athenians, mens bodies should not be obliged for any civill debt? considering that they be in bondage and slaverie to all banquers and uturers, who force men to keepe in their heads; and that which more is, not to them alone (for that were not fuch a great matter) but even to their verie flaves, being proud, 40 infolent, barbarous and outrageous, fuch as Plate describeth the divels and fiery executioners in hel to be, who torment the foules of wicked and godleffe perfons. For furely these curied ulurers make thy hall and judiciall place of justice, no better than a very hell and place of tormentto their poore debters, whereafter the manner of greedie geirs and hungrie griffons, they flay, mangle and eate them to the verie bones,

And of their beaks and talons keene, The markes within their flesh be seene.

And some of them they stand continually over, not suffring them to touch and taste their owned proper goods; when they have done their vintage and gathered in their corne & other fruits of the earth, making them saft & pine away like unto Tantalus. And like as king Darius sent against the citie of Athens his lieutenants generall Dasis and Artaphernes, with chaines, cordes and halters in their hands, therewith to binde the prisoners which they should take; semblablic these usurers bring into Greece with them their boxes and caskets full of schedules, bils, handwritings, and contracts obligatorie, which be as good as so many irons and setters to hang upon their poore debrers; and thus they go up and downe leaping from citie to citie, where they sown on as they passe and thus they go up and downe leaping from citie to citie, where they sown on as they passe along good and profitable seede, as Triptolemus did in old time; but plant their rootes of debts, which bring soorth infinite troubles and intolerable usuries, whereof there isno end, which eating as they goe and spreading their spannes round about, in the end cause whole cities to stop and stinke, yea and be ready to suffocate and strangle them. It is reported of hares that at one time they suckle young leverets and be ready to kinnule others that be in their bellies, and withall to conceive a fresh; but the debts of these barbarous, wicked and cruell usurers, do bring soorth before they conceive. For in putting out their money, they redemand it presently; in laying it downe, they take it up, they deliver that againe for interest, which they received and tooke in consideration of sone and use. It is said of the Messenians citie,

And yet one gate ther's alwaies behind.

10 But it may better be faid of usurers:

And end thereof you never shall know. and here withall in some fort they laugh at natural philosophers, who holde this Axiome, That of nothing can be engendred nothing; for with them usurie is bred of that which neither is, nor ever was; of that I fay which never had subsistence nor being. Howbeit these men thinke it a shame & reproch to be a publicane, and take to farme for a rent the publike revenewes, notwithftanding the lawes do permit and allow that calling, whereas themselves against all the lawes of the world, exact a rent and custome for that which they put foorth to usurie; or rather to speake atruth in lending their money they defraude their debtors as bankrupts do their creditors. For 20 the poore debter who receiveth leffe than he hath fet downe in his obligation, is most falsely coulened, deceived, and cut short of that which he ought to have. And verily the Persians reputelying to be a finne, but in a fecond degree: for in the first place they reckon to owe money and be indebted; in as much, as leafing followeth commonly those that be in debt. But yet usurers ly more than they, neither are there any that practife more fall hood and deceit in their day debt bookes wherein they write, that to fuch a one they have delivered fo much, whereas indeed it is farre leffe; and so the motive of their lying is faire avarice, & neither indigence nor poverty, but even a miferable coverousnes and defire ever to have more and more; the end whereof turneith neither to pleasure nor profit unto themselves, but to the losse and ruine of those whom they wring and wrong: for neither till they those grounds which they take away from their deb-30 ters; nor dwell in the houses out of which they turne them; nor cate their meat upon those tables which they have from them; ne yet clad themselves with their apparell, of which they spoile them; but first, one is destroied, than a second followeth after, and is allured as a prey by the other. And this is much like to a wilde fire, which still consumeth, and yet encreasethalwaies by the utter decay and destruction of all that falleth into it, and devoureth one thing after another. And the usurer which maintaineth this fire, blowing and kindling it with the ruine of fo many people, gaineth thereby no more fruit than this, that after a certaine time, he taketh his booke of accounts in hand, and there readeth what a number of debters he hath bought out of house and home, how many he had dispossessed of their land and living, from whence he hath come and whither he hath gone in turning, winding, and heaping up his filver. Now I would 40 not that you should thus thinke of me, that I speake al this upon any deadly war and comitte that I have fworne against usurers,

For God be praised they neither horses mine

Have driven away, nor oxen, ne yet kine.

But onely to thew unto them who are fo ready to take up money upon ufurie, what a villanous, flamefull, and base thing there is in it, and how this proceedeth from nothing else but extreame folly and timiditie of heart. If thou have wherewith to weld the world, never come into the usurers booke, considering thou hast no need to borrow. Hast thou not wherewith, yet take not money up and pay not interest, because thou shalt have no meanes to make paiment. But let us consider the one and the other apart by it selfe. Old Caro said unto a certaine aged man, who beso haved himselfe verie badly: My friend (quoth he) considering that old age of it selfe hath so manie evils; how commeth it to passe, that you adde thereto moreover the reproch and shame of leawdnesse and insidemeanor? even so may we say, seeing that povertie of it selfe hath so many and so great misseries, do not you over and above go and heape thereupon the troubles and anguishes that come of borrowing and being in debt; neither take thou from penurie that onely good thing, wherein it excelles in these, to wit, the want of carking and pensive cares; for otherwise thou shalt be subject unto the mockerie implied by this common proverbe:

Agoat alone when beare unneth I may, An oxe upon my (houlder you do lay.

Semblably, you being not able to fuftaine poverticalone, do furcharge your felfe with an usurer. a burden hardly supportable even for a rich and wealthie man. How then would you have me to live ? haply fome man will fay: And doeft thou indeed aske this queftion, having hands and feet of thine owne; having the gift of speech, voice, and being a man, unto whom it is given both to love and also to be loved; as well to doe a pleasure, as to receive a courtesie with thankes giving, Thou maist teach Grammar, bring up yoong children, be a porter or doore-keeper; thou maist be a failer or mariner, thou maist row in a barge or galley: for none of all these trades is more reprochfull, odious, or troublesome, than to heare one say unto thee: Pay me mine owne, or discharge the debt that thou owest me. Rutilius that rich Romane comming upon a time at Rome to Musonius the Philosopher, faid unto him thus in his care: Musonius, Jupiter furnamed Saviour, whom you and fuch other Philosophers as you are, make profession to imitate and sol. low, taketh up no money at interest : but Musonius smiling againe, returned him this presentan. fwere: No more doth he put foorth anic money for use.

Now this Rutilius who was an usurer, reproched the other for taking money at interest, which was a foolish arrogant humour of a Stoicke: for what need hadft thou Rutilius, to meddle with Jupiter Saviour, and alledge his name, confidering that a man may report the felfe fame by those very things which are familiar and apparent? The swallowes are not in the usurers booke, the pismiers pay not for use of money, and yet to them hath not nature given either hands or rea- 20 fon, or any art and mysterie; whereas the hath indued man with fuch abundance of understanding, and aptneffe to learne and practife, that he can skill not onely to nourish himselfe, but also to keepe horses, hounds, partridges, hares and jaies: why doest thou then disable and condemne thy felfe, as if thou wert leffe docible and fenfible than a jay, more mute than a partridge, more idle than a dogge, in that thou canst make no meanes to have good of a man, neither by double diligence, by making court, by observance and service, nor by mainteining his quarrell and entring into combat in his defence? feeft thou not how the earth doth bring foorth many thines, and how the sea affoordeth as many for the use of man? And verily as Crates faith:

I faw my felfe how Mycilus wooll did card, And how with him his wife the rols did fin: Thus during warre when times were extreame bard, Both jointly wrought, to keepe them from famin.

King Antigonus when he had not of a long time feene Cleambes the Philosopher, meeting him one day in Athens, spake unto him, and faid: How now Cleanthes, doest thou grinde at the mill, and turne the querne-stone still ? Yea fir (quoth Cleanthes againe) I grinde yet, and I doeit for to earne my living; howbeit, for all that, I give not over my profession of Philosophie. 0 the admirable courage and high spirit of this man, who comming from the mill, with that verie hand which turned about the itone, ground the meale and kneaded the dough, wrote of the nature of the gods, of the moone, of the starres and the sunne! But we do thinke all these to be base and fervile works; and yet verily, because we would be free (God wot) we care not to thrust our 40 selves into debt, we pay for the use of money, we flatter vile and base persons, we give them prefents, we invite and feaft them, we yeeld (as it were) tribute under-hand unto them; and this we do not in regard of povertie, (for no man uleth to put forth his money into a poore mans hand) but even upon a superfluity and riotous expense of our owne: for if we could content our selves with those things that are necessarie for the life of man, there would not be an usurer in the world, no more than there are Centaures and monstrous Gorgones. But excesse it is and deintineffe, which hath ingendered ufurers; like as the fame hath bred gold-fmithes, filver-finithes, confectioners, perfumers, and diers of gallant colours. We come not in debtto bakers and vinteners for our bread and wine; but wee owe rather for the price and purchase of faire houses and lands, for a great number and retinue of flaves, of fine mules, of trimme halles and dining so chambers, of rich tables and the coftly furniture belonging thereto, befides other foolilhand excessive expenses, which we often-times are at, when we exhibit plaies and solemne passimes into whole cities for to gratifie and do pleafure unto the people; and that upon a vaine ambition and defire of popular favour; and many times wee receive no other fruit of all our coff and labour, but ingratitude. Now he that is once enwrapped in debt, remaineth a debtour still all the daies of his life; and he fareth like to an horse, who after he hath once received the bit into his mouth, mouth, changeth his rider eftfoones, and is never unridden, but one or other is alwaics on his backe. No way and meanes there is to avoid from thence, and to recover those faire pathures and pleafant medowes, out of which those indebted persons are turned; but they wander altray to and fro, like to those cursed fiends and maligne spirits, whom Empedacles writeth to have bene driven by the gods out of heaven:

For fuch the heavenly power first chas'd downe to the sea beneath; The sea againe, up to the earth did cast them by and by; Then afterwards, the earth them did unto the beames bequeath Of restlesse sunne, and they at last sent them to starrie sky.

10 Thus fall they into the hands of uturers or bankers, one after another; now of a Corinthian, then of a Patrian, and after of an * Athenian; fo long, untill when all of them have had a fling at * Or Cerinhim, he become in the end, wasted, eaten out, & confumed with usurie upon usurie. for like as he than agame, that is stepped into a quavernire, must either at first get forth of it, or els continue still there, and not remove at all out of one place; for he that striveth, turneth and windeth every way, not only doth wet and drench his bodie, but mireth it all over, and beraieth himselfe more than he was at first, with filthy durt; even so they that do nothing but change one banke for another, making attanscript of their name out of one usurers booke into anothers, loading their shoulders eftfoones with new and fresh usuries, become alwaies overcharged more and more; and they refemble for all the world, those persons who are diseased with the cholericke passion or flux, who 20 will not admit of any perfect cure to purge it at once, but continually taking away a certeine portion of the humor, make roome for more & more still, to gather and ingender in the place; for even fo these are not willing to be ridde and cleansed at once, but with dolour, griefe and anguish pay usurie enery season and quarter of the yeere; and no sooner have they discharged one, but another diffilleth and runneth downe after it, which gathereth to an head; and fo by that meanes they are grieved with the heart-ache and paine of the head; whereas it behooved that they should make quicke dispatch, and give order to be cleere and free once for all; for now I direct my speech unto those of the better fort, who have wherewith above their fellowes, and yet be nicer than they should be; and those commonly come in with such like words and excuses, as these: How then; would you have mee unfurnished of slaves and ser-30 vants ? to live without fire, without an house and abiding place ? which is all one as if hee that were in a dropfie and fwollen as bigge as a tunne, should fay unto a physician; What will you doe? would you have me to be leane, lanke, spare bodied and emptie; and why not? or what shouldest not thou be contented to be, fo thou maiest recover thy health and be whole againe? and even so may it be faid unto thee? Better it were for to be without flaves than to be a flavethy selfe; and to remaine without heritage and possessions, that thou maiest not be possesfedby another. Hearken a little to the talke that was betweene two geires or vultures as the tale goes; when one of them difgorged fo strongly, that he faid withall, I thinke verily that I shall cast up my very bowels: the other being by, answered in this wise: What harme wil come of thy vomiting foliong as thou shalt not cast up thine owneentrails, but those onely of some dead 40 prey which we tare and devoured together but the other day; semblably every one that is indebted felleth not his own land, nor his owne house; but indeed the usurers house & land of whom he hath taken money for interest, considering that by the law the debter hath made him lord of him and all. Yea marie will he fay anon; but my father hath left me this peece of land for mine inheritance: I wot well and beleeve it; so hath thy father left unto thee freedome, good name andreputation, whereof thou oughtest to make much more account than of land and living. Hethat begat thee made thy hand and thy foot; and yet if it chance that one of them be mortified, he will give a good fee or a reward to a chirurgian for to cut it off, Ladie Calypso clad ulysses with a vefture and robe fenting fweet like baulme, yeelding an odor of a body immortall which she presented unto him as a gift and memoriall of the love that she bare unto him; and this he 30 didweare for her fake; but after that he fuffred thipwracke and was readie to finke, being hardly able to flote above water, by reason that the said robe was all drenched and so heavie that it held himdowne, hedid it off and threw it away; and then girding his naked brest underneath with a certeine broad fillet or fwadling band, he faved himselfe by swimming, and recovered the bank: now when he was past this danger, and seemed to be landed, he seemed to want neither raiment nor nutriment: and what fay you to this? may not this be counted a verie tempest, when as the usurer after a certeine time shall come to affaile the poore debtors and fay unto them:

Which word once faid, therewith the clouds above, He gathereth thicke, and sea with waves doth moove: For why, the winds anon at once from east, From south, from west do blow and give no rest.

And what be these windes and waves? even usuries upon usuries, puffing, blowing and rolling, one after another; and he that is overwhelmed therewith & kept under with their heavy weight, is not able to swim foorth and escape, but in the end is driven downe and sinketh to the verie bottome, where he is drowned and perished together with his friends, who entred into bonds, and became furcties and pledges for him.

Crates the philosopher of Thebes therefore did very well, who being in daunger and debeto no man, onely wearied with the cares and troubles of house-keeping, and the pensive thoughts how to hold his owne, left all, and gave over his effate and patrimonie which amounted to the value of eight talents; tooke himselfe to his bagge and wallet, to his simple robe and cloke of course cloth, and fledinto the sanctuarie and liberties of Philosophie and povertie. As for ... naxagoras he forfooke his faire lands and plenteous pastures : but what need I to alledge these examples? confidering that Philoxenus the mulician being sent with other to people & possesse a new colonie in Steilie, and having befallen to his lot a goodly houseand living to it, enioying(I fav) for his part a good portion wherewith he might have lived in fulneffe and plentie; when he fawe once that delights, pleasures, and idlenesse without any exercise at all of good letters reigned in those parts; Par die (quoth he) these goods heere shall never spoile and undoe me, but I 20 will rather (I trow) make a hand and havocke of them 3 leaving therefore unto othershis portion that fell unto him by lot, he tooke sea againe & failed away to Athens. Contrariwise thosethat be in debt are evermore fued in the law, become tributaries & very flaves, bearing and induring all indignities, like unto those variets that digge in filver mines, nourishing and mainteining as Phinew did the ravenous winged harpies: for furely these usurers alwaies flie upon them, and be ready to fnatch and carie away their very foode and fustenance; neither have they patience to flay and attend times and feafons; for they build up their debtors corne before it be ripe for the harvest; they make their markets of oile before the olives fall from the tree, and likewise of wine: For I wil have it at this price (quoth the usurers) & withal the debter giveth him presently a bill of his hand for fuch a bargaine; meane while the grapes hang still upon the vine, waiting 30 for the moneth of September, when the star Ar Etur me rifeth and sheweth the time of vintage,

THAT A PHILOSOPHER OUGHT TO CONVERSE ESPE-

CIALLY WITH PRINCES AND GREAT RVLERS, AND WITH THEM TO DISCOVESE.

The Summarie.

F there be any in the world who have need of good companie, they are Princes and so great Lords; for that their affaires being of fach confequence as everieman knoweth, the feeblenes of bodie and insufficiencie of spirit, not able to surnish them throughly; great reason they have to see by the cies, and to worke with the hands of others. Now in this case, three sorts of men there be who sails veriemuch: In the sast place, Princes and Rulers themselves, who in stead of drawing and training neere unto their persons such as ean aide and assist them, give accesser at the runto statterers and other like pessilent members, who are ready to corrupt and ruinate their estates: Secondly, those (whose number at all times hath beene veries small) whom we call Philosophers (that is to say) men of authorisie, wife sage learned friends to wertue, lovers. of the good of Princes and their subjects; who being of great power and able to doe much yet not withganding recule and draw backe, or being advanced to bigh place, have not alwates that respect and confideration, nor such courage as appertameth; suffering themselves otherwhiles to be carried away to the entertainment and maimenance of the greate ft opinion, and mingling a little too much of worldly wisedome with the apprehension of their true duty, whereof their conscience being lightned in sunary forts advertiseth the sufficiently. The last and shole as pernicious & exectable as the thought of min inot able to devise and comprehend) be the enemies of vertue (to wit) ignorant teachers, and profine schoolemasters & professors mockers scorners jesters statterers in sum, all the ministers of va-10 mities and filthie pleafures, who do infigurate and intrude themselves, by most leaved and wicked means into the fervice of Princes; and in recompence of the honor and rich gifts which they receive at their hinds, doe deceive and undoe their simple lords and masters, according as an infinite number of examples in Histories doe verifie and give evidence unto us. Plutarch therefore in consideration of these inconveniences, is desirous in this treatise to encourage those who wish that all things were well and in good order; and exhorterh them to approch neere unto Princes. Bus for asimuch asignorance and leawanes canfethmen to become fhameleffe, whereas wifedome and honefite maketh us modeft and considerate in all our actions; he sheweth in the first place, that it is no point of ambition for a wife and learned man to joine himselfeunto Grand seguiories & to sort with them; but that it is their duety so to do considering that such receive honor, pleasure, and profit by him. And this heprooves h by reasons, 20 similitudes, examples, at singular and notable. Afterwards he condemneth those who enter into Princes courts, onely because they would be great and powerfull, shewing that wise men indeed do aime cleane at another marke. And for the last point of all be treateth of the consentment which they receive, who by their fervice to one alone, helpe by that meanes an infinite number of others, who remaine bound and obliged unto them for fo great a benefit.

THAT A PHILOSOPHER OUGHT

to converse especially with Princes and great Rulers, and with them to discourse.

O embrace a common love, to finde out, accept, intertaine and maintaine that amitie which may be profitable and commodious to many in particular, and yet to more in generall, is the part of honest men, politike, wife and affectionate to the publike good; and not as fome thinke, of those that be ambitious and vaine-glorious.

But contrariwise, he is to be reputed vaine-glorious, or rather timorous and wanting courage, who doth shunne and is afraid to heare himselfe called, a follower, waiter and servicer to those that are in highest place. For what saith one of these personages who having need to be cured, is detirous to learne and to becacquainted with some Philosopher? O that I were Simon the Souter, or Dionyfius the Pedante, in stead of Pericles or Cato, that a Philosopher might discourse and dispute with me, that he might fit by my side, as Socrates did sometime by thole. And verily Ariston of Chios being reprooved and blamed by the Sophisters in his time, for that he used to devise and discourse with all those that were disposed to heare him: I could wish (quoth he) in my heart, that the verie beasts themselves were able to give care and underfland those discourses that do excite and moove unto vertue. Doe we then avoide the meanes and occasions to converse and conferre familiarly with great personages and mightie men, as if 50 they were wilde and favage persons? The doctrine of Philosophy is not like unto an imager who casteth dumbe and dease idole statues, without any sense, onely for to stand upon a base as Pindarus was woont to fay, but is willing to make what foever it toucheth, active, operative and lively; it imprinted therein affections and motions, judgements also inciting and leading to things unprofitable; intentions desirous of all honestie, haughtic courage also and magnanimitie, joined with meekneffe, refolution and affurance; by meanes of which good parts, men of State & policie, are more readie and forward to converse and devise with persons of great puisfance and authoritie, and not without good cause; for an honest and gentle physician will take Вb alwaies more pleasure to heale an cie that seeth for many, and which doth guard and looketo many; and even so a Philosopher wil be more affectionate to take care for that soule and spirit. which he feeth to be vigilant for many, and which ought to be wife, prudent, and just for many; for such an one if he were skilfull and cunning in the art, of finding, gathering, and conducting of waters (as we read in Histories that Hercules and many other in old time were) would not take delight to goe into some desertcorner, farreremote from the frequencie of men, and to dig or finke pitsthere, nere to the Ravens rocke (as the Poet faith) and to open that Swine-heards ma. rish Arethusa, but would studie rather to discover the lively sources and overruning springs of ariver, to serve some great citie or campe, or to water the orchards, gardens, and groves of kings. According as we heare that Homer called Alinos, Jupiters Oariftes, which is as much to fay 10 (as Plato himselfe doth interpret the word) his Familiar & Disciple; for he never meant that the disciples of the gods were private persons, home-keepers, and such as meddle in nothing but house matters, keeping in and living idlely without any action; but Princes and Kings whole. ing wife, just, debonaire and magnanimous, as many as be under their government and command, shall live in bliffe and happines.

An herbe there is called Eryngium or Sca-holly, which hath this propertie, that no fooner one goat taketh it in his mouth, but the herfelfe first, and afterwards all the rest of the slocke, will Aland still, untill such time as the goat-heard come and take away out of the slocke which he wilk in like maner, the defluxions which proceed from persons of great power and authoritie, have the fame swiftnesse and celeritie, which doth dilate and spread it selfe in one moment, and in ma- 10 ner of fire seiseth upon whatsoever is neere thereto on every side. And verily the speech and remonstrance of a Philosopher, if it be addressed and directed unto a private man, and that loveth to live in repose, and who doth limit and circumscribe himselfe, as within a center and circums ference geometricall, with the necessities of his owne bodie, the same speech is not distributed and divided unto others, but after it hath in that one man alone, composed and wrought a great tranquillitic and calme of all perturbations, it fadeth, vanisheth away, and so doth end incontinently; but on the contrarie fide, if the faid remonstrance meet with a man of State and government, a magistrate, a polititian, and one that dealeth in great affaires, and by the effectuall vertue thereof, replenish him with goodnesse and honestie, by the meanes of that one person, the benefit will be imparted unto many. In this wife Anaxagoras kept companie with Pericles, 30 Plato conversed with Dion, and Pythagoras did affociate himselfe to the princes and lords of Italie; and as for Cato, he departed alone from the campe, and failed to Athenodorus; Scipio likewife laid for Panatius, and fought after him, at what time as the Senate fent him forth with commission, for to goe in visitation (as it were) and survey, to see what right and wrong, what justice and injustice reigned in the world, according as Posidonius maketh report. What then ought Panatius for to fav? If you were either Caftor or Pollux, or some other private person, desirous to flie and avoid the frequency of great cities, and retire your felfe into some corner of a schoole apart, there at your leafure and full repose to folde and unfolde, to resolue and compound the syllogismes of Phylosophers, I would willingly accept your offer, and be desirous to converse and fray with you; but seeing you are the sonne of Paulus Aemilius, who had beene twife Con. 40 full, and the nephew of Scipio Africanus, who defeated Anniball the captaine of the Carthaginians, I will not reason and dispute with you. Moreover, to say that speech is two folde; the one interior or inward, the gift of Mercurie furnamed Hegemon, that is, Guide; the other pronounced and uttered foorth, which is inftrumentall, and a very interpreter to give notice of our conceptions, is a meere vaine and stale position, and may wel be comprised under this old proverbe: Thus much I knew before Theogms was borne. But let not this distinction trouble or impeach us in that which wee are about to fay; for aswell of that which is conteined within the secret minde, as of the other which is pronounced and uttered, the end is all one; to wit, Love or amitie of this, in respect of a mans owne selfe, and of that, in regard of others: for that speech which by the precepts of Philosophie, bendeth unto vertue, and there doth end, maketh a man in tune so and accordant with himselse, never repining and complaining of ought, full of peace, full of love and contentment:

No strife, no warre, no strange diffention, no passion rebellious and disobedient to reason, no combat of will or appetite against will and appetite, no repugnancie and contrarietie of reason against reason; there is no impleasant bit ternelle or turbulent disorder mixed with joies and pleasures, as it falleth out in the confines of defire, repentance and forow, but all things there be uniforme, delightfome and amiable, which cauleth each one to content himselfe, and joy as in abundance of all goods. As for the other kind offpeech that is pronounced, Pindar to faith: That the Mule thereof was never in old time covetous, greedie of gaine or meere mercenarie; neither beleeve I that it is so at this day; but rather, through the ignorance and negligence of men who be carelesse of their owne good and honour. Mercurie, who before was free and common, is now become an occupier and merchant, willing to doe nothing without a fee and reward. For it is not likely or probable, that Venumin times past was so deadly offended and angry with the daughters of Prospolus, because they devised first to sow hatted and enmity among yong tolke, and that Urana, Clio and Calliope take 10 pleasure in them who debase the dignitie of speech and literature, by taking filver; but in mine opinion, the workes and gifts of the Muses ought to be more amiable than those of Venus: for fame and honour, which fome propose for the end of their speech and learning, hath bene held deare and highly beloved, for that it is the very beginning and seminarie of friendship; and that which more is, the common fort of people measure honour by good-will and benevolence, efleeming that we ought to praise those onely whom we affect and love: but certeinly these men fare like unto Ixion, who in love following after the goddeffe Juno, fell upon a cloud; for even to they, in flead of amitie embrace a vaine image of popularitie, deceitfull, pompous, wandering and uncertaine: howbeit, a man of good conceit and judgement, if he manage State affaires, or intermeddle in government of the common weale, will feeke for honour and reputation fof ar 20 forth onely, as to mainteine his authoritie and credit in all his actions, for the better management of publike affaires: for it is no pleasure, neither is it easie, to doe them good who are not willing to profit and receive good; and the disposition of the will proceedeth from beliefe and confidence. Like as the light doth more good unto them that fee, than to those who are seene; even fois honour more profitable unto them who perceive and feele the fame, than to fuch as are neglected and contemned. But hee who dealeth not in affaires of State, who liveth to himselie, and setteth downe his selicitie in such a life, apart from others, in rest and repose, salutetha farre off vaine-glorie and popularitie, which others joy in, who be converfant in the view and fight of people, and in frequent affemblies and theaters, much like unto Hij polytess, who living chafte, faluted the goddeffe Venus a great way off, but as for the other glory which procee-30 deth from men of woorth and honour, he neither refuseth nor disdaineth it. Now when as the question is of amitie, we are not to seeke for it and to contract friendship onely with such as be wealthie, have the glorie, credit and authoritie of great lords, no more than we ought to avoid these qualities, if the same be joined with a gentle nature, which is of saire and honest conditions. The Philosopher seeketh not after beautifull and wel-favoured yoong men, but such as be docible, tractable, well disposed, and defirous of knowledge; but if withall they be endued with beautifull vifage, with a good grace, and are in the flower of youth, this ought not to fright him from thence, neither must the lovely casts of their countenance and amiable aspects drive him from comming neere unto those, not chase him away if he see them worthy paines taking and for to be regarded. Thus when power, riches, and princely authoritie shall be found in men of 40 good nature, who be moderate and civill; the philosopher will not for beare to love and cherish such, neither be afraid to be called a courtier or follower of great personages:

They that strive most dame Venus to eschue, Do fault as much, as they who her pursue.

Even so it is with the aunitie of princes and great potentates: and therefore the contemplative philosopher who will not deale at al in affaires of weale-publicke, must not avoid and thun such; but the civill philosopher who is busted in managing of the common weale, ought to seeke for them and finde them out, not forcing them after a troublesome maner to heare him, nor charging their eares with reports and discourses that be unseasonable and sophisticall; but framing himselfe willingly to joy in their companie; to discourse, to passe the time with them when they 50 are willing and fo disposed:

Twelve journeis long are Berecynthian plaines And those I sowe yeerely with sundry graines.

Hethat faid this, if he had loved men as well as he affected husbandry and tillage, would more willingly have plowed and fowed that ground which is able to maintaine and feed fo many men, then that little close or pindle of Antisthenes, which hardly was sufficient to find himselfe alone. Certes Epicurus who placed the foveraigne good and felicitie of man in most sound rest and deepe repose, as in a sure harbour or haven, desended and covered from all windes and surging Bb 2 waves of the world; faith: That to doe good unto another, is not onely more honest and hono. rable, than to receive a benefite at anothers hand, but also more pleasant and delectable; for there is nothing that begetteth fo much joy as doth beneficence, which the Greekes terme by the name of xiess, that is to fay, Grace. Well advised he was therefore and of wife judgement who imposed these names upon the three Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia; for without all question, the joy and contentment is farre greater and more pure in him who doeth a good turne and deserveth a thanke, than in the partie who receive the fame: and therefore it is that many times men doe blush for shame when a good turne is done unto them, whereas alwaies they rejoice when they confer a benefite or favour upon another. Now do they a benefit unto a whole multitude and nation, who are the meanes to make those good, whom the people and 10 multitude can not misse but have need of : whereas contrariwise, they that corrupt and spoile princes, kings, and great rulers (as doe thefe flatterers, false sycophants and flaunderous promoters) are abominable unto all, are chased out and punished by all; like unto those that cast dead. ly poison, not into one cup of wine, but into a fountaine or spring that runneth for to serve in publike, and whereof they fee all persons use to drinke. Like as therefore (according to Eupolis) it is faid onely by way of mockerie concerning those flatterers and comicall parasites who hanted the table of rich Callias, that there was neither fire, braffe, nor steele, that could keepe them out, but they would come to sup with him: but as for the minions and favorites of tyrant Appllodorus, Phalaris, or Dionysius, after the decease of their lords and masters, the people fell upon them, did beat them with cudgels, torture upon the rack, burne at a stake, & range them with the accurfed and damned crew; for that they before named did wrong to one alone, but these did injurie unto many by the meanes of corrupting one who was their ruler; even fo those philoso. phers that converse and keepe companie with private persons, do cause them to be well contented, pleafant, gracious and harmeleffe to their owne felves and no more: but who foever reformeth some evill conditions in a great ruler or soveraigne magistrate, framing and directing his will and intention to that which he ought; this man I fay after a fort is a philosopher to the publike State, in that he doth correct the mould and amend the pattern to which all the fubjects be composed, and according to it governed. The cities and states which be well ruled, decree and yeeld honour and reverence to their priefts; for that they doe pray unto the gods for good things, not in regard of themselves, nor of their kinsfolke and friends alone, but universally in 10 the behalfe of all the citizens; and yet these priests doe not make the gods good, nor the givers of good things, but being such alreadic of themselves, to them they powre their praiers & make invocations. But philosophers who live and converse with princes and great lords, cause them to be more just and righteous, more moderate and better affected to well doing; by meanes whereof it is like that they receive more joie and contentment. And if I should speake my conceit, it feemeth unto me that the harpe-maker wrought and made his harpe more cheerefully and with greater pleafure, when he knew that the mafter & owner of the faid harpe should build the wals about the citie Thebes, as Amphion did, orto state and appeale the great civil sedition of the Lacedamonians, by finging to the faide harpe and by fweet exhortations, as fometimes Thales did; femblably the carpenter or ship-wright who maketh the helme to a thip or gally, 40 wil joy more when he shal know that the said helme shal serve to guide & rule the admirals ship, within which Themistocles shal fight against the Persians in the defence of the libertie and freedome of Greece: or that of Pompeius, with which in a navall battell at fea he defaited and vanquished the armie of the pirats. What suppose you then will aphilosopher thinke of his owne speech and doctrine, when he shall come to discourse with himselfe; that he who shall receive the same being a man of authoritie, a prince or great lord, shall thereby doe good unto the common weale, in ministring right and justice indifferently to everie man; shall punish the wicked, and advaunce those that bee good and vertuous. I am verily perswaded (for my part) that a good and gentle ship-wright, will more willingly make an helme, when hee shall know that it must serve to rule the great shippe Argo, renowned throughout the 50 world: likewife a carpenter or wheele-wright, will not with fo good a will lay his hand to make a plough or a chariot, as he would to frame those tables or boords, in which he wish that Solon was to engrave his lawes. And (I affure you) the discourses and reasons delivered by Philosophers, if once they be well and furely imprinted in the hearts of great personages, who have in their hands the government of States, if they once get fure footing and take good rootin them, they become as forcible and effectuall as politive lawes. Hereupon it was that Plato failed into Sicilie, in hope that the grave sentences and principles of his Philosophy, would be as good as lawes, and worke holefome and profitable effects in the affaires of Dionysius. But hee found that Diony flus was like writing eables all rafed, and full of blurs and blots, and that he could not leave off the tineture and deepe die of tyrannie, being fo furely fet on, and having by continuance of time entred and pearced deepe, fo that it could not be washed out; whereas it behooved that thole who are to make their profit by good advertisements and fage leffons, 'hould still be in motion and fo continue.

TOVCHING PRINCE OR RULER UNLEARNED.

The Summarie.

S in the former discourse he follicited Sages and Philosophers to joine themselves in acquaintance with Princes; so in this he desireth one point, whereof hee dareth not affure himselfeto compasse the same, by reason of some difficulties therein observed. For requiring in Princes thus much that they should be wel instructed, for to be capable of good counsell; he showeth withall that it is a verie hard thing to bring them thereto, and torange them in that order for certaine materiall and persinent reasons which he setteth downe. Neverthelesse he passeth on still and proceedesh farther; prooving that the law and lively reason 30 ought to command Kings and Princes; and for to cause them to condescend thereto, he declareth unto them, that the thing which they wish for and desire so ar dently to procure; namely, to maintaine themselves in happie estate, and to make their name immortall, lieth in vertue: then he pointeth out with his finger, four empeachments and hinderances that divert and turne away Princes from so just and nccesfarie a consideration. Which done, for to enrich this speech and treatise of his, and the bester yes to draw great personages to give eare unto reason, he letteth them see and under stand the difference betweene a good Prince and atyrant: also how dangerons a wicked Prince is; concluding by the benefit which commeth by equitie, and the hurt by injustice; that right, and justice, ought to serve as a counterpoise, against the greatnes and puissance of Princes.

AS TOVCHING A PRINCE or Ruler unlearned.

HE inhabitants of the citie Cyrene, requested Plate on a time to leave unto them by writing certaine good lawes; and withall to fee them downe an order in the government of their State, which he refused to do, faying. That it was a verie hard matter to give lawes unto the Cyrenians being fo rich and wealthie as they were for there is nothing so proude and insolent, so rough and intractable, fo favage and hard to be tamed, as a man perswaded well of his fortunate estate. This is the cause that it is no casie enterprise to give counfell unto princes and rulers, and to advice them as touching their government. For they be affraid to receive and admit reason as a master to commaund them; for feare it should take away and abridge them of that, which they esteeme to be the onely good of their grandence and puissance, in case they were subjected once to their duety. Which is the cause also that they cannot skill to heare the discourses of Theopempus King of Sparta, who was the first that brought into that citie the Ephori, and mingled their authoritie with the government of the Kings. For when his wife reproched him for leaving unto his chil. dren the royall power & dignitie, leffe than he received it of his predeceffors: Nay mary (quoti he) butrather farre greater, in that it shall be more firme and affured: for in remitting and letting downe a little that which in absolute royaltie was over stiffe, strait and rigorous, heea. voided by that verie meanes all envie and perill. And verily Theopompus deriving unto others from his owne authoritie, as from a great river, a little rill or riveret; looke how much he gave unto the Ephori, fo much he cut off from himfelfe: but the reason and remonstrance of Philo. fophie, being lodged (as it were) with the Prince himselfe, for to affish him and preserve his perfon, taking from his puissance, as in a full plight and plethoricke constitution of the bodie, that which is excessive and overmuch, leaveth that behind which is found and healthfull. But the most part of Kings, Princes, and Soveraigne rulers, who are not wise and of good understan. ding, refemble unskilfull cutters in stone and imagers, who are of opinion that the enormous and huge statues, called Colosses, which they cut, will seeme more vast and mightie, if they frame them stradling with their legs, with their armes spread abroad and stretched foorth, as also with their mouthes gaping wide open; for even fo, these princes and rulers by their big commanding voice, their grim and sterne visage, sierce lookes and regard of their eie, their odiousbehaviour, and living apart without fociety of any other person, weene and suppose to counterfeit a kinde of gravitie, greatnes and majestic that is required in a mightic potentate; but they differ nothing from the forefaid Coloffes, which without do represent the forme of some god or demi- 10 god; but all within are stuffed full of earth, stone, rubbish and lead: this onely is the difference that the waight and heavines of those monstrous statues, counterpoiseth and keepeth them standing in some fort upright, stedfast, and not enclining one way or other; but ignorant and unlearned princes, rulers, and generall captaines, by reason of their ignorance which is within them, oftentimes do wag and totter to and fro, yea and be overturned and laid along; for comming to build their puissance and licentious power aloft upon a base that is not laid directlieto the plumbe, they reele and tumble downe withall. But like as a rule or fquire, being of it felle even, ffreight and levell, not turning or twining any way, doeth direct and fet ffreight all other things, and make them like it felfe, by being laied thereto; even fo ought a prince, when he hath first established in himselfe, his principallity and power, that is to say, composed his ownelife 30 and maners, to accommodate and frame his subjects accordingly, and to make them semblable: for neither lieth it in him who is ready to stumble and fall himselfe, to susteine and keepe up another, nor he who is ignorant and knoweth nothing is fit to be a teacher, no more than he who is disorderly, meet to redresse and reforme, or who is irregular, able to range and set in order, or who knoweth not how to obey, like for to command. But the most part of men are heereindeceived and thinke not aright, who suppose that the first and principall good in commanding andruling, is not to be ruled and commanded. And thus the king of the Persians imagined all his subjects to be his slaves, unlesse it were his wife alone, of whom especially above all other, he should have the mastrie and lordship.

Against a ruler unlearned.

Who is it then, that thall command a king or prince? even the law, which is the ladie and 40 queene of all, aswell mortall men, as immortall gods, according as Pindarus faith: I meane not the written law in books or upon tables of wood, but the lively reason imprinted in his owne heart, remaining alwaies with him, his continuall refident-keeper, and never leaving his foule abandoned and forlorne without conduct and government. And verily the Persian king had evermore about him one of his chamberlaines ordeined for this office; namely, to fay unto him every morning as he entred into his chamber: Arife my lord, and have regard to those affaires for which Mesoromasdes (that is to say, The great God) would have you to provide. But if a prince be wife and well instructed, he hath alwaies within him this monitor and remembrancer, to refound the fame into his eares, and put him in minde of his dutie. Polemon was wont to fav: That love was a ministeric of the gods in yoong persons, such as they had care of, and were minded 30 to preferve: but more truely a man might fay: That princes be the ministers of the gods, to provide for the affaires and fafetic of men; to the end that of those good things which Godhath bestowed upon them, they should distribute some, and preserve other;

But feest though this starrie firmament, So high above and infinitely vast, In bosome moist of water element, The earth beneath how it incloses h fast?

for this is it, that by influence fendeth downe the principles of those feeds which be fit and conwenient, which afterwards the earth produceth and yeeldeth forth, whereof some grow by showers of raine, others by winds, some also gather warmth and heat by the starres & the moone, but it is the funne who ruleth and governeth all, he inspireth and insuseth into them from himselfe, the gracious inftinct of love. Now, all the goods and gifts (so many and so great) which the gods endow men withall, there is no meanes to enjoy & use aright, without law, without justice, without a prince or ruler: Justice is the end of law; law is the worke of a prince; and the prince is the image of God governour of all things: and this prince or fovereigne majestic hath no need either of Phidias, or of Polycletus and Myran, to cut, cast or forme him; but himselfe it is, who to doeth frame his owne person to the patterne and similitude of God, and by meanes of vertue, worketh and setteth up the most pleasant, excellent and divine statue that may be seene : and like as God hath placed in heaven (as a most beautifull image of himselfe and his divinitie) the funne and the moone; even fuch a representation and light is in a citie and realme. A prince or magistrate, so long as he hath in his heart imprinted the searcof God and the observation of justice; that is to fay, all while he hath divine reason, which is understanding; not a scepter in his hand, nor a thunder-bolt and lightning, or a three-forked mace, as fome foolish princes cause themselves to be portraied and painted, making their follie odious, in affecting that which they never can attaine unto: for God indeed hateth and punisheth those who will seeme to imitate thunder, lightning, fun-beames and fuch like; but contrariwife, those that be zealous followers 20 of his vertue, and who endevour to conforme themselves to his bounty, goodnesse and elemencie, he loveth and advanceth, to them he willingly doth impart his owne equity, loialty, justice, verity and elemency. These quallities are such, as there is nothing in the world more divine and heavenly, not fire nor light, not the course of the sunne, neither the risings or apparitions, nor the fettings and occultations of the starres, no nor eternity it selfe and immortality: for God is not counted happy and bleffed in regard of long life, but for that he is the prince of all vertue: and as this is divinity indeed, fo it is true beauty to be ruled thereby. Anaxarchus for to give comfort and confolation unto Alexander, who was cast downe and in despaire, for the blowly murder which he had committed upon the person of Clytus, faid unto him: That the goddesses Dice and Thenis (that is to fay) Justice and Equity, sat as affiltants to * Jupiter, to shew (quoth * Or as some 30 he) that what foever is done by a prince, is to be thought just and righteous; but hee offended reade, To Cityherein grofly, and faulted much, to the hurt of Alexander, in that he went about to remedy the forow and griefe which this prince conceived in remorfe of conscience and repentance for his heinous finne, by giving him heart and affurance to commit the like againe. And if it be meet and lawfull in this case, to project our conjectures; Jupiter hath not equity and justice for his asscissons, but himselfe is justice and equity; he (I say) is the most ancient and perfectest law that is: thus speake, write and teach all ancient authours; That even Jupiter himselfe can norwell command and rule without justice, which is the virgine (as Hesudus laith) not touched & desiled, but pure and immaculate, lodged alwaies with shamefastnesse, modestie, pudicitie and utilitie. Hercupon it is, that men ordinarily give this addition unto kings and princes, calling them 40 'Aldie, that is to fay, Reverend and venerable: for meet and convenient it is, that those who feare least, should have most majestic and honour. And verily a prince and ruler ought to be asraid much more to do ill, than to receive and fulfaine harme, for a finich as the one is the cause of the

to be afraid lest his subjects should (ere he be aware) take wrong or be hurr any way; Aluch like as dogs that be of gentle kinde, Who watchfully about the folds attend. In case they once by subtill hearing finde -A savage beast approch, and this her tend, feare not for themselves, but in regard of the cartell which they keepe. In like maner, Epamie 50 nondas, when the Thebanes fell diffolutely to drinke and make good cheere at a certaine feltivall time, himselfe went all alone to survey the armour and wals of the citie, saying: That he would falt and watch, that all the rest might quaffe the while and sleepe with more securitie. Care likewifeat utied proclaimed by found of trumpet, to fend away by fea all those who escaped alive upon the overthrow which there hapned; and when he had embarqued them all, and made his praiers unto the gods to vouchfafe them abon voiage, he returned into his ownelodging, and killed himselfe; thewing by this example what aprince or commander ought to feare, and what other. And this is a civill and generous feare; proper and peculiar to a good prince, namely;

he should contemne and despite. Contratiwise, Clearehus the tyrant of Pontus, shutting himfelfewithin a cheft, flept there as a ferpent within her hole: and Aristodemus the tyrant of Agos went up into a hanging chamber aloft which had a trap dore, whereupon he caused a little bed or pallet to be fet, and there he flept and lay with his concubine and harlot which hee kept, and when he was gotten up thither, the mother of the faid concubine came ordinarily to take downe the ladder, and brought it thither againe every morning. How thinke you, did this tyrant tremble for feare, when he was in a frequent theater in the palace, in the counfell houle and court of justice, or at a feast, considering that he made a prison of his bed chamber? To say a verietruth, good princes are afraid for their subjects fake, but tyrants feare their subjects; and therefore as they augment their puissance, so doe they encrease their owne feare; for the more 10 persons that they commaund and rule over, the greater number they stand in dread of: for it is neither probable nor feemely as some philosophers affirme: That God is invisibly subsistent and mixed within the first and principal matter, which suffrethall things, receiveth a thousand constreints and adventures, yea and is subject to innumerable changes and alterations: but hee fitteth in regard of us above, and there is refiant continually in a nature alwaies one, and ever in the same estate, seated upon holy foundations (as Plato faith) where he insuseth his power, and goeth through all, working and finishing that which is right according to nature : and like as the funne in heaven, the most goodly and beautifull image of him, is to be seene by the reflexion of a mirror, by those who otherwise can not endure to behold himselfe as he is; even so God ordeineth in cities and focieties of men, another image of his, and that is the light of justice 20 and reason accompanying the same; which wife and blessed men describe and depaint out of fentences philosophicall, conforming and framing themselves to that which is the fairest and most beautifull thing in the world; and nothing is there that doth imprint in the soules and spirits of men such a disposition, as reason drawne and learned out of philosophie, to the end that the same should not befall unto us which king Alexander the great did; who having seene in Corumb, Diogenes how generous he was, effected highly and admired the haughtie courage & magnanimitie of the man, infomuch as he brake foorth into these words; Were I not Alexander furely I would be Diogenes: which was al one in maner as if he should have faid; That he was troubled & encombred with his wealth, riches, glory and puissance, as impeachments and his derances of vertue, and bare an envious and jealous eie to the homely course cloke of the phi-30 losopher, to his bagge and wallet, as if by them alone Diogenes was invincible and impregnable, and not (as himselfe) by the meanes of armes, harnish, horses, speares, and pikes: for surely he might with governing himselse by true philosophical reason have beene of the disposition on and affection of Diogenes, and yet continue neverthelesse in the state and fortune of Alexander; and so much the rather be Diogenes because he was Alexander; as having need against great fortune; (like a tempelt raised with boilterous winds, and full of surging waves) of a strongercable and anchor, of a greater helme alfo, and a better pilot: for in meane persons who are of lowestate, and whose puissance is small, such as private men be, follie is harmelesse; and sotish though such be yet they doe no great hurt, because their might is not answerable thereto; like as it falleth out in foolish and vaine dreames: there is a certeine griefe (I wot not what) 40 which troubleth and difordereth the mind , being not able to compasse & bring about the extution of her defires & luits: but where might & malice are met together their power addeth folly unto passions & affections; & most true is that speech of Denys the tyrant, who was wont to fay; That the greatest pleasure & contentment which he enjoied by his tyranny was this that whatfoever he would was quickly done, & prefently executed; according to that verse in Home:

No fooner out of mouth the word was gone, But presently withall the thing was done.

A dangerous matter it is for a man to will and defire that which he ought not, being not able to performe that which he willeth and defire the whereas malicious mischiese making a swift course through the race of puissance and might, driveth and thrusteth forward every vio 50 lent passion to the extremitte, making choler and anger to turne to murder, love to proove adultery; and avarice to growe into confiscation of goods; for no some is the word spoken, but the partic orace in suspicion is undone for ever; and presently upon the least surmisse and imputation ensueth death. But as the natural philosophers do hold; that the lightning is shown out of the cloud after the clap of thunder (like as bloud illusth after the wound is given and incision made) and yet the said lightning is seene before, for that the eare receiveth the sound found or cracke by degrees, whereas the eie meeteth at once with the flash; even so in these great rulers and commanders, punishments oftentimes go before accusations, and sentences of condemnation before evident proofes:

For wrath in such may not long time endure, No more than flouke of anchor can assure A ship in storme, which taketh stender hold On sand by store, whereof none may be bold.

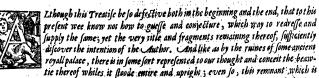

unlesse the weight of reason doe represse and keepe downe licentious power, whiles a Prince or great Lord doth after the manner of the funne, who at what time as he is most high mounted in to the septentrionall or northren parts, seemeth least to move, and by his slow motion maketh his race the more stedfast and affured. For impossible it is that vices in great persons should remaine covert and hidden; but like as those who are subject to the falling sicknesse, so soone as ever they be furprifed with outward cold, or turne round never so little, presently fall into a dimnes of fight, grow to be dizzie in the head and ready to stagger, which passions do bewray and detect their maladie; even fo ignorant persons and such as want instruction and good bringing up, no sooner are lifted up by fortunes favour to wealth and riches, to dignities, promotions, and places of high authoritie, but prefently shee sheweth them their owne fall and ruine; or rather to make the thing more plaine and familiar; like as a man can hardly know whether veffels be found or faultie, fo long as they be emptie, but in case you powre into them any liquor, 20 it appeareth whether they leake and filing or no; even fo, the foules of men that be putrified and corrupt, can not containe and hold fure their might and authoritie, but run out by meanes of their lults and defires, their cholericke fits, their vanities and abfurd demeanors. But what neede we draw foorth the discourse hereof more at large? considering that great men and noble personages are exposed to calumniations and reproches for the least delinquencie and fault that they commit. Cimon was blamed for his good wine; Scipio for his fleepe, and because hee loved his bed well; and Lucullus grew into an ill name in regard of his bountifull table and liberall fare that he kept.

lest unto us, sheweth sufficiently what wee have loss. But albeit the malice and injurie of the since hath deprived us of so great a benefit, and of many others semblably; yet notwithstanding, that so which remaineth may prosit us, mained and imperfect as it is, and suffice to range and contrue us nour datie. In the beginning, our Author discourse the miletie of a coverous person, and one that solvance work missing the master of the missing to the principal design and purpose. It has twee is the absolute work missingles of wretchednesses and instellect, having need of no other ministers or instruments to cause a man to be miserable; whereupon he doe hoolest and gather, that there is no danger nor calamitic, but we ought to choose rather than to be sufficiently and victions. Afterwards he answereth those objections which are made to the contrarie, and conclude th, that adversing can not prejudice or hurt us any thing so long as it is not accompanied with vice.

THAT

ficient to make a man wretched.

Eabideth much who hath his bodie fold for a dowrie (as Euripides faith) to wit, small availes he hath thereby, and those verie uncertaine. But unto him who passeth not through much ashes, but a royall fire (as one would say) wherewith he is scorched and but at round about, who continually draweth his winde thicke and short, to and is full of sear and sweat by trudging over sea for gaine, she giveth in the end a certaine Tantalian riches (that is to say) such as he is not able to enjoy by reason of the continual occupations wherewith he is encombred. For verie wisely did that Sieyonian who bred and kept a race of horses, when he gave unto Agamemnon the king of the Achæans as a present, a notable swift mare for a courser, because he might be dispensed with for going in warfare to Trop:

That unto Troy that fately towne, he might not with him go
To ferve in armes; but flay at home, and rest there far from wos
Where he might live in folace much, enjoying all his owne, For Jupiter in measure great, bad wealth on him be flowne.

to the end, that he staying behinde at home, might roule and welter at case in a depth of riches, and give himselse much time and leasure for assured repose void of all paine and trouble. However, who would be esteemed men of action and great affaires, never expect until they be called, but of themselves intrude and thrust their heads into princes cours pack until they be called, but of themselves intrude and thrust their heads into princes cours and stately palaces, where they must watch, waite and give attendance in all dutiful service, with 30 much paine and travell, to gaine thereby at last, a great horse, a faire chaine, or some such blessed favour.

Homerus de Prosefilas. Meane while the wife is left alone behind In Phylace, and thinkes he is unkind To leave her so: her face she rents and teares; The bouse remaines halfe built, when he it reares.

and the husband is carried here and there wandring in the world, drawen on with certaine hopes which oftentimes in the end deceive him and worke his shame. But if peradventure he obtains fomething that his heart defired, after a certaine time that he hath beene turned round about with the wheele of fortune, so long untill his head be dizzie, and mounted on high in the aire, he 40 wisheth and seeketh nothing more than evasion and meanes to escape, deeming and calling those happie, who leade a private life, without exposing themselves to such perils: and they again repute him bleffed and fortunate, feeing him fo highly advanced above themselves. This in one word you see, how vice doeth dispose men unto all forts of infelicitie, being of it selfea perfect artifan of infortunity, and needs none instruments and ministers besides. As for other tyrants, who study nothing more, than to make those most wretched and miserable whom they pinch, doe mainteine executioners and tormentours, devife red-hot fearing yrons to burne, and invent racks and other instruments for to put the reason lesse soule to extreame torture; but vice without any fuch preparation of engins, fo foone as it feizeth upon the foule, prefently overturneth and bringeth it to ruine and destruction, filleth a man with dolour and griefe, with la- 10 mentations, forowes and repentance. For a certaine proofe hereof, you shall see many endure to have their flesh mangled and cut, without faying one word; abide to be whipped and scourged patiently; who being put to the racke and other tortures by their cruell mailters or tyrants, will not give one screeke or crie, so long as the soule repressing the voice by reason, as with the hand keepeth it downe, and conteineth it from breaking out: whereas contrariwife, a man shall hardly or never command either anger to stay and be quiet, or dolour to be filent, no nor perfwade him that is surprised with sudden seare to rest still, or one who is stung with remorse and repentance to forbeare crying out, to hold his hands fro tearing his haire & finiting his thighs; offuch force and violence is vice & finne, above either the heat of fire or the edge of the fword. Moreover, cities & states, when they publish their purpose to put forth to making any thips or huge statues called coloss, give eare willingly to the workmen disputing one against the other, as touching the workmanship, heare their reasons, & see their models & platformes which they bring, and afterwards make choise of him to goe in hand with that piece of worke, who with leffe coft and charges will do the deed as well or rather better, and more speedily. Now put the case that we publish by proclamation to make a man infortunate, or cause a life to be wretched and miserable, and that there present unto us for to enterprise this, fortune on the one side and to vice on the other; the one (to wit, fortune) is full of her tooles and inftruments of all forts, and provided of furniture costly and chargeable, for to make a life unhappie and milerable; as for example, brigandife and robbeties, bloody warres, inhumane cruelty of tyrants, and tempests at fea; the draweth after her flathes of lightning out of the aire, the mixeth and dreffeth a poisoned cup of deadly hemlocke, the bringeth fharpe edged fwords to do the businesse, the stirreth flanders and raifeth falle furmifes and calumniations, the kindleth burning agues and hote feavers, the commeth with fetters, manacles and other yrons jingling; finally, the buildeth cages and prisons for this purpose; and yet the most part of all this geere proceedeth rather from view than fortune : but suppose that all came from fortune; and that vice standing by all naked, and having need of no other thing in the world without it felfe to affaile a man, Thould demand of 20 fortune, how she could make a man infortunate and heartlesse in these tearnes? What fortune? doest thoumenace povertie? Metrocles will be ready to laugh thee to scorne, who in Winter time used to sleepe among sheepe, and in Summer scason tooke his repose in cloisters and church porches; and so challenged for his felicity the king of Perssa, who was wont to Winter in Babylon and paffe the Summer in Media: threateness thou servitude and bondage? bringest thou chaines and yrons, or the wofull condition to be folde in open market as a flave? Diogenes will despife thee for all that, who being exposed and offered to sale by the rovers and theeves that tooke him, cried and proclamed himfelfe aloud: Who will buy a mafter who? doest thou temper or brew a cup of poison? why didst not thou before offer such a cup to Socrates for to drinke? but hee full meekely with all mildneffe and patience, without trembling for feare and 30 changing either countenance or colour for the matter, drunke it off roundly; and after he was dead, those that survived, judged him happy, as one who in the other world made account to live an heavenly and bleffed life: presentest thou fire to burne withall? loe, how Decima a Romane captaine hath prevented thee; who when there was a fire made in the mids betweene two armies for to confume him, voluntarily and with a formall praier offered himfelfe as an holocaust or burnt offering unto Saturne, according to his you made for the safetic of the Romane empire. The honest and chaste dames of the Indians, such as entirely love their husbands, ftrive and be ready to fight one with another about the funerall fire; and as for her who obteineth the victorie, and is burned therein together with the dead corps of her husband, all the re? doe deemeright happie, and testifie so much in their hymnes and songs. As for the Sages at d 40 wife Philosophers of those parts, there is not one of them all reputed a holy man or bleffed, it he do not whiles he is alive, in perfect health and found fenfe and understanding, separate his owner foule from the body by the meanes of fire, and after he hath cleanfed and confumed all that was mortall, depart out of the flesh all cleane & pure: but (forfooth) from abundance of wealth and riches, from an house sumptuously built and furnished, from a costly and daintie table full of fine & delicate viands, thou will bring me to a poore thred bare cloake, to a bag and wallet, and to begging of my daily bread from doore to doore; well, even these things were the cause of Diogenes selicitie; these woon unto Crates freedome and glory: but thou wilt crucific mee or cause mee to be hanged upon a jibbet, or sticke my body thorow with a sharpe stake? and what cared Theodorus whether his corps rotted above ground or under the earth? these were the hap-50 piesepultures of Tartarians and of the Hircanians, to be eaten and devoured of dogs; as for the Bactrians, by the lawes of the countrey those were thought to have had the most bleffed end, whom the fowles of the aire did eat after they were dead; Who then are they whom these and fuch accidents do make unhappy ? even fuch as are false-hearted, base-minded, senselesse and void of understanding, untaught, and not exercised in affaires of the world, and in one word, fuch as reteine still the opinions which were imprinted in them from their infancie. Thus you fee how fortune alone is not a sufficient worke-mistresse of unhappinesse and infelicity, in case the have not finne and vice to aide and helpe her: for like as a thred is able to divide and faw (as it were) thorow a bone which hath lien foaking long before in after and vineger; and as workemen can bend, bow and bring into what fashion they will, yvorie, after it hath bene infused and mollified in alc or beere, and otherwise not; even so fortune comming upon that which is al. ready of it selfe crazie and corrupt, or hath bene susteined by vice, is of power to pierce, wound and hollow the fame.

Moreover, like as the poison Pharicam, otherwise called Napeshus or Aconitum, being hunful to no other person, nor doing harme to those who handle and heare it about them; but if it touch never so little one that is wounded, presently killeth him by meanes of the fore or wound which receiveth the influxion and venim thereof; even fo he whose soule is like to be destroied and overthrowen by fortune, ought to have within himfelfe and in his owne flesh some ulcer. to fome impostume or maladie for to make those accidents which befall outwardly, wretched, pitifull, and lamentable. What ? is vice then of that nature that it had neede of fortunes helping hand to worke wretchednesse & infelicitie? from what coast I pray you doth not fortune raise tempests upon the sea, and trouble the water with surging billowes? environeth not she andbefetteth the foote of defart mountaines, with the ambuthes and forelayings of theeves and robbers? powreth not the downe with great violence, stormes of haile-stones out of the clouds upon the fertile come fields? was it not vice and malice that stirred up Melitus, Anytus, and Callixenses to be sycophants and false accusers? is it not she that bereaveth folke of their goods, empeacheth and disableth men for being commanders and leaders of armies, and all to make them unhappie ? nay the it is that maketh them rich and plentifull; the heapeth upon them he- 40 ritages and possessions; the accompanieth them at sea; the is alwaics close unto them and neer at hand; the caufeth them to confume and pine with lufts and defires; the enflameth and fetteth them on fire with choler and anger; the troubleth their minds with vaine superstitions and draweth them away after the lufts of their eies,

HOW A MAN MAY PRAISE

CURRING ENVIE AND BLAME.

The Summarie.

Mposible it is during the time that we sojorne in this life, that our spirit which knoweth not how to be fill and at rest, It ould not stirre and moove the tongue to speaked the actions either of other men or of our owne; whereby we cannot choose but incure marvellow daungers of flatterie, slander, or els of selfe-praises insomuch as not without good cause that man hath beene called perfect, who knoweth well to moderate this little member, which is at it were the bit and bridle of the whole bodie of man, and the verie helme and fterne of that ship or vessell in which we row and hull to and from the sea of thu world. Requisite it is therefore, that morall philosophie should speake, to the end that it may teach us for to speake. We have seene before in many discourses the dutie of everieone towards his neighbours, as well in words as in 50 deeds: but in this treatife Plutarch seweth the cariage of a man towards himselfe, and above all in that way which is most supperie, to wit, in the question of our owne praises: then after hee hath laide this for a ground and foundation; That it is an unseemely thing for a man to make himselfe seeme great by vaine babble, and alledged the reasons wherefore, he setteth downe one generall exception; to wil, that a vertuous man may praise himselse in certeine cases and occurrences, the which (after he hath taxed the ambition of those who set up a note of their owne praises to be chaunted aloud by others) he particularizeth upon these points ; to wit, if he be driven to answer unto some false slaunderer; if a man bein any diffresse and adversare, or if he be blamed for the best deeds that he bath done. After this, be enterlaceth certaine advertisements or corrections; to wit, that a man ought to mingle his owne praises with these of other meny that he ascribe not the whole honor of a woorthy deed to his own selfer that he atter only those things which be chiefe and principall, and stand upon that which is most commendable, and that he give a certaine luster thereto, by the foile of confessing his owne imperfections: which done, he proceedes hto declare what kinde of menthey ought to bee who are allowed to praise themselves; to what this praise ought to be referred and have respect; and wherefore they sould enter into it; moreover, at what time, and for what occasion he ought to make head unto a third, who would do sufficiently; and for a finall conclusion, he propose than excellent meanes to avoid the troubles to and inconveniences that might axise from importunate praise, willing that the partie who speaketh of his owne good parts should flie all ambition, not please himselfe in rehearing and recitall of his owne exploits, take heed have in selse-praising hee feigne praises, and neverthelesse in blaming his neighbour to be content for to be praised of another; without putting himselfe betweene and speaking in his owne behalfe. In fumme, fince there is nothing foodious as to fee and heare a man speake exceeding much of himselfe, he conclude the that in no wife a man ought so to do sunlesse there accrew therby great profit and commoditie to the bearers.

vie and blame.

O speake much of ones selfe in praise, either what he is in perfon, or of what valour and power among others; there is no man (friend Herculanus) but by word of mouth will professe it is most odious, and unbefeeming a person well borne and of good bringing up; but in very deed few there be who can take heed and beware of falling into the inconvenience and enormitie thereof, no not even those who otherwisedo blame and condemne the same: as for Euo o o o ripides when he faith,

If words were costly men among, for to be bought and fold, Nomanto praise and magnifie himselse would be so bold: But now (fincethat each one may take out of the aire fo large, As much as will his minde suffice, without his cost and charge) Well pleas a are all men of themselves to beake what comes in thought, As well unitrath as what is true; To for perchibem coffeth nought.

doth use a most odious and importune vanteries especially in this, that he would seeme to interlace amongst the passionare accidents and affaires of Tragicall matters, the speech of a mans felfe) which is not befitting nonportinent unto the fubject argument; femblably Findaras, has ving faid in ong place, chim ຄົວວັນແຂວປ colliger. ສຳຄັດ ແຕ່ເຕັດ ກຸເຕັດ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ ເຂົ້າ

To brag and vaunt unfeafonably, or onthe little aspendies and vau Sound's much of rush and vain folly;

so ceaseth not neverthelesse, to magnific his owne sufficiencie in the gift of poetrie, as being (in trueth) worthy of right great praise jas no man can denie. But those who are crowned with garlands in those facred places and games, are declared victours and conquerous by the voice of others, who thereby calethem of that odious displeasure that solle-praise carrieth with it. And in very deed our heart rifeth again futhat vaine glory of Timothers, in that he wrote himselfe (as touching the victorie which the hechieved against Phrynis) Oh happy man thou Timothe was at what time as the herald proclamed with a loud voice thefe words ? Timothem the Milefian bath conquered Innocampies that Ionne of Carbo : for fixely this carrieth with it no grace at all, but is a meere abfurditie and against all good fashion, for a man to be the trumpeter of his owne victo. rie : for true it is according to Xenophon; That the most pleasant voice that a man can heare, is his owne praise delivered by another, but the most odious thing unto others, is a man commending himselse: for first and formost, we esteeme them to be impudent who praise them. felves', considering that they oughtrather to blush and be ashamed even when others fall to praise them in their presence: secondly, we repute them unjust herein, for that they give and attribute that to themselves which they should receive at the hands of others : thirdly, either if we keepe filence when we heare one to praise himselfe, it seemeth we are discontented or do beate envieunto him, or if we feare that, compelled we are our felves to confirme and approve those praises, and to give testimonie thereof against our owne minde; a thing more befeeming vile 10 and base flatterie, than true honour, namely, if we can abide to praise any in presence. Howbeit, although this be most true, and that the case standeth so, such occurrences may so fall out, that an honourable person who manageth the politike affaires of a common-wealth, may hazzard and venture boldly to speake of himselse and in his owne behalfe for his advantage, not in regard of any glory, grace or pleasure to gaine thereby, but for that the occasion or action that is prefented, requireth that he should speake and give testimonic of himselfe, as he would and might doe of any other matter of trueth, especially when the deeds by him atchieved or the parts that be in him be good and honest, then he is not to forbeare or spare to speake hardly, that he hath done so or els much like: for surely such a praise as this, bringeth forth good fruit, and out of it as from a fruitfull graine or feed, there proceed many other praises, & those farre greater. And 10 certes, a civill and politikeman doeth not defire and love honour as a falarie, folace or recompende for his vertuous actions; but for that to have the credit and reputation among othersof a trustie and faithfull person, in whom men may repose their trust and confidence, doth affoord him good meanes and occasions to performe many other greater and more goodlier actions: for apleasant and easte matter it is to benefit them who love thee and put their trust in thee; whereas on the contrary fide, exceeding hard it is, or rather impossible, to make use of vertue, and to imploy it to the good of those who have thee in suspition, or be ready to raise salecalumniations against thee, and so to force them who do avoid the meanes of receiving any good and pleasure at thy hands. Moreover, it would be confidered, what other occasions there may be, for which a man of 10 honour and honestie may praise himselfe; to the end that by taking good heed and avoiding of that which in selse-praise is so vaine and odious, we faile not to serve our turnes with the profit and commodity that may come thereby. Now of all others, most foolish is their praise who commend themselves to this end, that they would be praifed of others; and such praife as this we hold most contemptible, for that it seemeth to proceed from ambition and an unseasonable appetite of vaine-glory onely: for like as those who have no other food to feed upon, becomfireined to cat the flesh of their owne bodies against nature, which is the very extremity and end of famine; even so those that hunger after honour and praise, if they can not meet without thers to praise them, fall to praise themselves; wherein their behaviour is unseemly and shame full, for that upon a love of vaine-glory they are defirous to make a supply and sufficiency from 10 their owne selves; but yet when as they go not simply to worke nor seeke to be praised by themfelves, but upon a certaine emulation and jealoufie of other mens praifes, they come to compare and oppose their owne deeds for to dim and darken the actions of others; then over and befides their vanity, they adde thereto envie and malice; for according to the common proverbe: He is curious and ridiculous, who fetteth his foot in another mans daunce; but upon envie and jealoufic to thrult a mans felfe betweene the praifes of others, and to interrupt the fame with his owne selfe-praise, is a thing that wee ought to beware of; and not onely so, but also to take heed that wee fuffer not others at fuch a time to praise us, but gently to yeeld honour unto those who are worthy to be praised and honoured; and if peradventure, they be unworthy and deserve not the same, yet ought not wee to deprive them of the praises which are given unto so them, by interpoling our owne, but rather fland up against them, convince them openly, and prove by evident and pregnant reasons that there is no cause why they should be reputed so great, and be so highly honoured. As touching this point therefore, plaine and evident it is, that we ought not fo to doe, howbeit, a man may praise himselfe without blame: first and for most, if he do it by way of his owne defence in answering to a flander raised, or an imputation charged upon him; like as Perieles did in Thue dides, where he untereth these words: Andyet you my masters of Athens are angrie with me, who may vaunt of my selfe to be such an one 25

need not to give place unto any whatfoever, either in forefight and knowledge of that which is behovefull to the common-wealth, or in eloquence and delivery thereof, or in love to the State, or in fincere integrity, free from all corruption, bribery and avarice, against which I stand invincible: for in speaking thus magnificently of himselfe in such a case, he did not onely avoid the blame and reproch of vanity, of arrogancy and prefumptuous ambition, but also that which more is, he shewed with all his wisedome and greatnesse, yea, and the magnanimitic of vertue, which was so farre from being humbled and dejected, that it rather conquered and held under hand, envie; infomuch as others hearing fuch men speake in this wife, proceed not any farther nor be willing to judge and cenfure them, but are caried away and ravifhed with a certaine to joy, yea and inspired (as it were) from heaven to heare such brave vanteries; namely, if the perfons be constant and the reports which they make true, according as the effects which follow do testific. The Thebanes verily (at what time as their captaines were accused, for that when the terme of their government and magistracie, called Beet archia, was expired, they returned not incontinently home, but made an invafion and entred in armes into Laconia, and dealt in the administration of affaires about the citic of Meffene) hardly and with much adoo affoiled and quit Pelopidas, when he humbled himselfe and became a suppliant unto them for pardon: but contrariwife, when Epaminondas came and recounted in magnificent words those brave exploits which he had atchieved in that voiage and at the fame time, protesting in the endethat he was prest and readie to take his death, fo that they would confesse and acknowledge, that manger 20 their minds and against their wils he had pilled and spoiled Laconia, repeopled Mellane, and reduced into a league and amitie with them all the cities of Areadia, they had not the heart fo much as to give their voices and fuffrages in any fentence of condemnation against him, but departed out of the affembly, admiring the haughtie courage of the man, and rejoicing with mirth and laughter to heare him plead his cause with resolution. And therefore the speech of Sthenelus in Homer is not fimply and altogether to be reprooved, when he faith:

Pronounce I dare and it avow, we better warriours be In these daies than our fathers were by many a degree.
30 If we call to minde and remember the precedent words a little before:

Thou sonne of noble Tydeus
a wise and har dy knight,
How hit that thy heart dothpant, for sear e when thou shouldst sight?
Why do'st thou cast thine eie about,
and looke on everie side?
How thou maist our of battell scape, and day st not field abide.

for it was not stherels himselfe unto whom this sharpe and bitter speech was addressed, but he 40 replied thus in the behalfe of his friend whom he had thus reproched, and therefore so just a cause and so fit an occasion gave him libertie to speake thus bravely and boldly of himselfe. As for the citizens of Rome, they were offended & displeased much with Citero praising himselfe so much as he did, and namely relating to often the woorthie deeds by him done against Catiline; but contrariwife, when Seipio faid before them all in a publike affembly: That it was not meet and feemely for them to fit as judges upon Scipio, confidering that by his meanesthey were growen to that grandence as to judge all the world; they put chaplets of flowers upon their heads, and in this wife adorned, mounted up together with him into the temple of the Capitoll, for to facritice and render thankes unto Jupiter: and good reason both of the one and the other; for Cicero rehearfed his owne praise-worthy deeds so many times without any need enforcing him there-50 to onely to glorific himselfe; but the present perill wherein the other stood, freed him from all hatred and envie, notwithstanding he spake in his owne praise. Moreover, this vanterie and glorious boalting of a mans felfe, is not befitting those onely who are accused or in trouble and danger of the law, but to as many also as be in advertitie rather than in prosperitie; for that it feemeth that these reach and catch (as it were) at glorie and take pleasure and joy therein, onely to gratific and content therein their owne ambitious humor; whereas the other by reason of the qualitie of the time, being farre from all suspition of vaine glorie and ambition, doe plucke up and creek themselves upright against fortune, suffaining and upholding what they can the gene-केत भी riofitie of their minds, avoiding as much as lieth in them that bale conceit, to be thought for to beg commiseration and crave pittie, as if they would be mounted for their misadventures, and thereby bewray their abject hearts. For like as we take them for fooles and vaine-glorious fel. lowes, who as they walke ordinarily, lift up themselves, and beare their heads and neckes aloss; but contrariwife, we praise and commend those who erect their bodies, and do all they canto put foorth themselves, either in fight at sharpe, or in buffeting with fists; even so, a man who being overthrowen by adverse fortune, raiseth himselse up againe upon his seet, and addresseth his whole might to make head,

Like as the champion doth arife,

upon his hands to winne a prife. and in stead of shewing himselfe humble, suppliant and pittifull, by glorious words maketha thew of braverie and haughtie courage, feemeth not thereby proude and prefumptuous, but contrariwife, great, magnanimous and invincible. Thus in one place the poet Homer depainteth Patroclus modest and nothing at all subject to envie, when he had done any exploit forunately and with valour; but at his death when he was ready to yeeld the ghost, he described him to speake bravely in this wife:

If twentie Juch with all their might, Had met with me inopen fight, &c.

And Phoeion who otherwise was alwaies meeke and modest, after that he saw himselfe condemned, gave all the world to understand his magnanimitie, as in many other things, so especially 20 in this point, that he faid unto one of those that were to suffer death with him, who made apitious moane and great lamentation : How now man, what is that thou faiest? doth it not the good at the heart to thinke that thou shalt die with Phocion? And verily, no lesse, but rather much moreitis permitted to a man of State, who is injuriously dealt withall for to speake fomewhat frankly of himfelfe, namely unto those who seeme to be oblivious and unthankfull, Thus Achilles at other times rendred the glorie of fortunate successe in his affaires to the heavenly power of God, and spake modestly in this maner:

That Jupiter would give us power and strength, Troy citie strongly wall d to winne at length.

But otherwise when indignities were offred unto him, and he unjustly wronged and abused, he to fang another note, and displaied his tongue at large in anger, breaking out into these haughtic and brave words:

With ships of mine well man'd with fouldiours brave, By force of armest welve cities wonne I have.

For why? approcht bey dare not neere to me,

The brightnes of my morion for to fee.

For libertic of franke speech, being a part of justification and defence in law, is allowed to use great words for plea. And verily Themistocles according to this rule, who all the while that hee performed the exploits of noble service in his owne countrey, never did or faid ought that the 40 voured of odious pride; yet when he once faw that the Athenians were full of him, and that they made account of him no more, forbare not to fay unto them thus: What meane young masters of Athens thus to disdaine & be wearie of those at whose hands you receive so often times benefits; In time of storme and tempest you slie to them for refuge, and shroudyout felves in their protection as under the harbor and covert of a spreading tree; no sooner is the storme overblowne and the weather faire againe, but you, are ready to give a twitch at them, and every one to pull and breake a branch thereof as you passe by. Thus you see how these men perceiving themselves otherwise injuried, in their discontentment sticke not to rehearse their fervice and good deeds past and cast them in their teeth who are forgetfull thereof. But he that is blamed and suffreth a reproch for things well done, is altogether for to be excused and un- 50 blameable, in case he set in hand to praise his owne deeds, for a smuch as he seemeth not to proch and upbraid any , but to answere onely in his own defence, & to justifie himselfe. Certes, this it was that gave unto Demosthenes an honest and laudable libertie to speake for his ownebehoofe; and he avoided thereby all tedious fatietie of his owne praises, which he used through out that whole oration, entituled Of the crowne, wherein he gloried and vaunted of that which was imputed unto him as reprochable, to wit, the embaffages in which he went, and the decrees which he had enacted as touching the warre. Moreover, not farre from these points above to hearfed, the reverfing of an objection by way of Antithesis may be placed, and carieth with it a good grace; to wit, when the defendant doth proove and thew that the contrary to that wherewith he is charged and accused, is wicked and dishonest: After which maner the oratour Lyeurgui, at Athens in his plea and answer to those who laid to his charge that he had given a piece of money to a fycophant for to stop his mouth & appeale him: What kinde of citizen (quoth he) do you take me for to be? who all this long time that I have dealt in the government and managing of State affaires among you, am chalenged before you rather to have given than taken filver injustly. Likewife Cicero, when Merellus faid unto him that he had undone and brought to confusion more men by his testimonie, than faved by his patronage and eloquence; And what to man is there (quoth he) who will not fay by this, that there is more fidelitie in me, than force of unterance. Allo these places in Demosthenes; And who would not justly have condemned me to die, if I had but once gone about in bare word to contaminate the honors and glorious titles that this citie hath? againe, And what (thinke ye) would these wicked persons have said, if whiles I discoursed particularly of these points, the cities had fallen away and revolted : In sum, that whole oration throughout concerning the Crowne, most finely and wittily inferreth his owne praises among those oppositions & solutions which he alledgeth. Over and besides, it is woorth the noting and learning, as a most profitable point, how cunningly in the said oration, and how artificially he intermedled with the speeches that he gave out of himselfe, the commendations also of the hearers, and thereby freed himselfe from the taint of envie, hatred, and 20 selfe-love; namely in avowing how good and gracious the Athenians were to those of Eubaus how woorthily they demeaned themselves toward the Thebanes; what good turnes they had done to the Bryzantines, as also how beneficiall they had bene to the inhabitants of Chersonnefus; faying withall, that himfelfe was but their minister. For I assure you by this meanes the hearer himselfe being secretly woon and gained ere he is aware by his owne praises, enterteineth more willingly and with greater pleafure the speech of the oratour; well contented he is and pleased to heare the good deeds related by another which he hath done; and upon this joy of his there inflieth incontinently an admiration and love of those, by whose meanes hee hath atchieved those acts. Hecreupon Epaminondas one day in open place, when Meneclidas, one of his envious and malicious advertaries mocked him for that he magnified and thought better of 30 himselfe than ever didking Agamemnon; Grand mercy, you my masters of Thebes (quoth he) with whom alone I overthrew in one day and subverted the whole dominion of the Lacedæmonians. Now for a fmuch as the most part of men ordinarily mislike in their hearts, and are mightily offended with one that praifeth himfelfe, but fare not so against him that commendeth another; nay many times they are well pleafed therewith, and ready to confirme fuch praifes by their ownetestimonies : some are wont to have this devise, namely, in taking their time and opportunitie, to commend those who love, chuse, and do the selfe same things, and briefly who are of the like conditions, and given to the fame humor with themselves, do winde and infinuate into the grace and favour of the hearer, and by fuch an occasion drawhis heart unto them; for streightwaies he doth acknowledge in the speaker although he speaketh of another, the re-40 semblance and similitude of the like vertue which deservesh the same praises: for like as he who reprocheth another man for those vices whereof himselfe is guiltie, doth hurt his owne perfon more than the party whom he feemeth to touch; even fo good and honest men in yeelding honor to those persons who are good, doe as much as make mention of themselves to such as are privie to their vertues, and know them well enough; infomuch as prefently they are ready to follow and second them them with these and such like acclamations; And are not you also the fame in every respect? After the soft Alexander in honouring Hercules; and Androcopus likewife in honouring Alexander, procured to themselves ech one due honour from the semblable. Contrariwile Dionyfine by mocking Gelon, and faying by allusion to his name; that he was Gelos indeed (that is to fay) the Laughter and mocketie of Sicilie, perceived not how before hee 50 was aware, by the envie that he drew upon him himselfe, he overthrew the greatnes and dignitie of his owne purssance and seignorie. Aman of State therefore and a politician, ought to learne, observe and practise these rules even in other cases also. And as for those who otherwhiles are enforced to praise themselves, they shall cause this selfe-praise of theirs to be more tolerable and leffe subject to envie and hard conceit, in case they take not all to themselves, and attribute the whole to their owne worthinesse; but as if glorie were some heavie and weightie burthen, discharge one part thereof upon fortune, and another upon God; and therefore wisely said 1-Chilles in Homer :

Since that th' almightie Gods have given me grace, Mine enemie to overthrow in place.

Selfe-praise without incurring envie.

Well likewife did Timoleon at Saracofe, who upon his valiant and noble exploits dedicated an al. tar to Bon adventure, and likewise consecrated an house to his good Angell. But best of all and most wisely did that Python the Aenean, who being arrived at Athens after he had murdered King Cotys, when the oratours strived avie one with another, who should extoll and set footh his praises most unto the people, and perceiving some to carrie an envious eie unto him, and be highly displeased with him; as he passed by, brake foorth into these words: It was some God (quoth he) ô yec Athenians that did this deed, as for my felfe, I did but lend my helping hand, Semblably, Sylla exempted his owne acts from envie, in giving alwaies the praise to his good to fortune; in fo much as in the end, he furnamed himselfe Emperimes, that is, lovely, fortunate, or Venus darling. For all men in manner would feeme to be vanquished rather by fortune, than conquered by vertue; for that they thinke the one to be a good, not pertinent to the conqueror, and the other a proper defect and imperfection of their owne, and which proceedeth from themselves: which is the reason by report, that the lawes of Zalenus wonderfully pleased the Loctians, for that he put into their heads and bare them in hand, that the goddeffe Minerva appeared and came many times unto him; that the endited and taught him those lawes which he penned and gave unto them; finally, that there was nor one of them proceeding from his head, counfell and invention. Peradventure therefore necessarie it is to devise these and such like remedies, and lentitive medicines to meet with those persons, who are by nature fierce and 10 envious; but to such as as be of the better fort, and of a modest and temperate disposition, it would not be impertinent and abfurd to use certaine corrections of praises in this case: as for example; If one haply in our presence fall to praise us for being eloquent, learned, rich, orin great reputation, to pray him not to give such reports of us, but rather for to commendusif we be good and bountiful, hurtful to none, and profitable to many; for in fo doing, we feem not to confer praises upon our selves, but to transfer them; not to take pleasure in them that praise us, but rather to be grieved and difpleased, that we are not praised for such things as we ought, nor as we should; as also to hide the woorse qualities under the better, not so much willing and desirous to be praised, as to teach how it is meet to praise: for this manner of speech (neither with stone nor bricke have I fortified and walled this citie, but if you will needs know how I have 30 fenfed it, you shall finde that I have furnished it with armor, horses, confederates and allies) see meth to come necreand tend unto fuch a rule: yea and the faying of Pericles toucheth it neces; for when the hower of his death now approched, and that he was to goe out of this world, his kinsfolke and familiar friends, weeping, wailing, and grieving thereat (as good reason was)called to minde and rehearled the armies that hee had conducted, the expeditions which heehad made, his puissance that he hadborne, as also how many victories he had atchieved, what Trophees he had erected, what townes & cities he had conquered, and laid to the feignorie of the Athenians; all which he now should leave behind him: but he listing up himselse a little, reproved and blamed them greatly, for relating and alledging those praises, which were common tomanie, and whereof fome were more due to fortune than to vertue; whiles they omitted and let 40 passethe greatest and most beautifull commendation of all others, and that which truely and indeed properly belonged unto him: namely, that for his take, there was never any Athenian that put on blacke or wore a mourning gowne: this example of his, giveth both unto an oratout if he be praifed for his fingular eloquence, meanes and occasion to transferre the praise unto his life and maners; and also to a warrior & generall captaine, who is had in admiration for his martiall proweffe, experience, or fortunate fuccesse in wars, to stand rather upon his elemencie and justice and thereof freely to discourse. And contrariwise againe, when a man hath excessive praifes heaped upon him (as the manner commonly of many is, by way of flatterie to give those commendations which moove envie) meet it is to use such a speech as this:

With gods in beaven above I have no share, To them therefore why dost thou me compare?

But if thou knowest me aright, and takest me truely for such an one as I am, praise these good parts in me; that I am uncorrupt and not overtaken with gifts and briberie; that I am fober and temperate; that I am sensible, reasonable, full of equitie and humanitie. For the nature of envie, is willingly to yeeld unto him that refuseth the greater praises those that be lesse and more modest; neither depriveth she of true commendation those who will not admit and receive sale and vaine praises: and thereforemen thinke not much to honor those Kings and Princes who

who are unwilling to be stilled gods or the children of gods, but rather to be intituled either Phi-Ladelphi, that is, Kinde to brothers and fifters; or Philometores, that is, Loving to their mothers; or Energetoi, that is, Benefactors; or elle Theophiles, that is, Deerely beloved of the gods; which are goodly and beawtifull denominations, meet for men and good princes: like as againe, those who hardly will endure them, that either in writing or speaking, attribute unto them the name of Sophi, that is, Sages or wife men, can well abide to heare those who name them Philosophi, that is, Lovers of wisedome; or such as say of them, that they profit in the study of wisedome, or give them fuch like attribute as is modest and not subject to envie; whereas these ambitious Rhetoritians and vaine-glorious Sophisters, who in their orations (to shew their learning) exto pect these and such like acclamations from their auditorie : O divine and angel-like speech ! ô heavenly and magnifically spoken; lose withall this commendation, as to be faid for to have delivered their minde modefly, courteoufly, and as becommeth civil men. Certes, like as they who be loth and take heed to offend and hurt them that are bleere-eied or otherwise given to the paine and inflamation of them, do mingle among the gallant and lively colours, some duskish thadowes; even fo, fomethere be, who in rehearfing their owne praifes not alrogether resplendent & cleere without any mixture at all, but intermedled with some imperfections, defects and light faults among, by that meanes discharge themselves of the heavie load of envie and hatred, Thus Epirem in Homer, giving out glorious words of his wrestling and buffer fight, vaunting bravely of his valour,

As if he would his teene and anger wreake upon him, and with fifts his boanes all breake.

Is't not enough that herein I do want? For other skill in combat I do want.

But haply this man is woorthy to be mocked and laughed at, who for to excuse his arrogant braverie of a wreftler and champion, bewraied and confessed that otherwise he was but a searcfull coward; whereas contrariwife that man is of judgement, civil also and gracious besides, who alledgeth against himselfesome oblivion or ignorance, some ambitious spirit, or els adesire to heare and learne the Sciences and other knowledge, like as utyffes when he faid:

But lo my minde desirous was to hearken and give eare, I will'd my mates me to unlose, that I might go more neare. And againe in another place; Alshough much better it had beene, yet would I not beleeve: But fee his person, and then trie

if gifts he would me give. Tobe short, all sorts of faults, so they be not altogether dishonest and over-base, if they be set 40 unto praises, rid them of all envie and hatred; and many other there be, who interposing a confession of povertie, want of experience, yea, and (beleeve me) their base parentage, among their praises, cause them thereby to be lesse odious and envied. Thus Agathoeles, as he sat drinking unto yoong men out of golde and filver plate right curioufly wrought, commanded other veffels of stone, earth and potters worke to be set upon the table, saying unto them: Lo (quoth he) what it is to persevere in travell, to take paines, and adventure valuantly? for wee in times past made those pots, (pointing to the earthen veffell) but see, now we make these, (shewing the plate of golde and filver: and verily it seemed that Agathoeles (by reason of his base birth and povertie) was brought up in some potters forge, who afterward became the absolute monarch (almost) of all Sicile. Thus it appeareth what remedies may be applied outwardly, to avoide 50 envie, if a man be forced to speake of himselfe: other meanes there are besides, inhærent (after afort) even in them who be in this wife praifed; and fuch Cate made use of, when he faid, that hewas envied, because he neglected his owne affaires, and sat up watching whole nights for the good and fafetie of his countrey. Like to which is this speech :

What wifedome thinke you was in me, who cleane exempt from care, From charge and travell, like some one, who in the armie were as also this other:

Afresh, reject unneth I will from me. For men ordinarily beare envie unto those who seeme to acquire glory grain, without any cost, to and to come by vertue easily, like as if they purchased house or land for a little or nothing; whereas feldome or never they envie fuch as have bought the fame very deare, with many travels and great dangers. And forasmuch as we ought in praising of our selves to effect not only this; that we offend not the hearers thereby nor procure their envie, but endevour also to profit them and doe them good, as if we feemed not to aime at our felfe-praise, but to shoot at some other thing: in fo doing confider first and formost when a man is in a veine of praising himfelfe, whether he may do it by way of exhortation, to kindle a zeale, and exercise a kinde of emislation and strive for glory in the hearers; after the example of Xeftor, who in recounting his owne proweffe and valiant fervice, encouraged Patroclus and the other nine gallants and brave knights, to enter combat and fingle fight with Hellor: for an exhortation which hath word and 20 deed to meet together, carrying with it example, with a familiar zeale and imitation, is wonderfull quicke and lively, it pricketh, provoketh and flirreth exceedingly, and together with a refo-Inte courage and ardent affection, it carieth with it the hope of compaffing things very accellible and in no wife impossible: and therefore of the three renowmed daunces and quites in Late damon, one which confifted of olde men, chaunted thus:

The ume was, when we gallants were, Youthfull and hardie, void of feare. another, of children, fung in this wife: And we one day shall be both tall and strong, And farre surpasse, if that we live so long. the third, namely of youg men, had this dittie:

But we are come to proofe, and now at best,

Trie who that will, to fight we are now prest. wherein the law-giver, who inflituted these dances, did wisely and politikely, to propose unto yong men fuch familiar examples and at hand, even by those things that were done and executed. Yet nevertheleffe, it were not amiffe, otherwhiles to vaunt and to speake highly and magnifically of ones (elfe, for to daunt, beat downe, represse, and keepe (as it were) under hand, a bragging and audacious fellow, like as Neftor himfelfe did againe in another place:

Conversed have I in my daies, with men of better deed Than you iwis, and yet disaine they never would my reed.

Semblably faid Aristotle unto king Alexander: That lawfull it was and befeeming not onely for those to have an haughtic minde, who had many subjects under them at their commaunds but such also as held true opinions as touching the gods. And verily these points are commodious for us otherwhiles, even in regard of our enemies, foes, and evill willers, according to that verle in Homer :

Children they are of wretched fires, and borne to misadventure, Whose lucke it is my force of armes in battell to encounter.

Age filam alfo, having speech upon a time as touching the King of Persia, who usually was called the Great Monarch: And wherein (quoth he) is that king greater than my felfe, if he beenot more just and righteous. Epaminondas likewise replied upon the Lacedæmonians, who had framed a long acculation against the Thebans: Well it is (quoth he) and a good turne that we yet have made you give over your accustomed short speech. Thus much of those rules which concerne either our private and particular evill willers, or our publike enemies. As

As for our friends and fellow-citizens, we may likewife by using fitly in time and place, and asthecase requireth haughty language, not onely take downe and cause those to vaile bonct who are over-proude and audacious; but also on the other side raise up and encourage such, as be distraied, astonied and beyond measure timorous. For Cyrus also in the mids of battell and dangers of warre was woont to speake bravely, but else where not. And Antigonus the yoonger or fecond of that name, who otherwife was in words fober, modeft, and nothing proude; yet in a battell at fea which he fought necre the ifle Cos; when one of his friends about him faid a little before the medley began: See you not fir how many more ships our enemies have than wee? Why (quoth he) for how many ships doest thou reckon me? And it should seeme that Homer to was of the fame minde and meant fo much, when he feigneth that ulyffes feeing his people affrighted with the hideous noise and fearfull tempest that issued out of the gulfe Charybdis, called to their remembrance his fubtill engine and fingular valour, in faying thus unto them:

My friends and mates, this accident is not fo dangerous, As when that monstrom Cyclops he, a giant furious, Usturn'd and courft with mightie force about his hollow cave? Tet thence we chac'd him by my wit, advice, and promeffe brave. For this manner of praifing proceedeth not from a glozing vaine glorious oratour, nor a vanting Sophister, nor from one that seeketh applause, and clapping of hands; but beseemeth a personage who pawneth unto his friends, as a gage of affurance and confidence his owne vertue and sufficiency. For a matter this is of great importance & consequence tending to safetie in dangerous times, to wit, the opinion, reputation and affiance, that we may have of a man in authoritie, and the experienced prowesse of acaptaine. Now albeit I have sufficiently shewed before, that it is neither convenient nor feemely for a man of State and honour to oppose himfelfe against the glorie and praise of another; yet neverthelesse when the case so standeth, that a false and perverse commendation doth bring hurt and damage, and by example inferreth a 30 dangerous imitation of evill things, together with a wicked purpose and leawd intention in matters of great moment, it were not amiffe to repulse the same backe, or rather to divert and turne away the hearer unto better things, and open unto him the difference: for in mine advice a man may well take content and delight, to see that men abstaine willingly from vice, when they perceive it to be blamed and reprooved; but in lieu of condemning it, if they heare it commended, and if over and befides the pleafure and profit that commonly it feemeth to bring with it, it be held also in honor and reputation, there is not a nature so happie and bleffed, nor so strong and flour withall, but shee is able to conquer it: and therefore a man of policie and government ought to make warre and fight, not so much against the praises of persons, as of things, in case they becorrupt and naught: for these they be that spill and marre our manners, by reason that 40 with fuch praises there entreth commonly a will to imitate and follow such dishonest and foule actions, as if they were good and feemely: but then most of all are they detected what they be, and do appeare in their colours, when they are compared in opposition with true praises indeed. Thus it is reported, that Theodorus the Tragardian actor, faid upon a time unto Satyrus a Comicall player. That it was no great marvell to make the spectators to laugh, but rather a matter of woonder to cause them for to weepe and crie: but (I suppose) a sage and wise philosopher may well fay thus unto the fame Theodorm: Nay (good fir) it is not fo great a matter to fet men a weeping and wailing, but rather to still and stay their forrow and lamentation, were an admirable thing; for if a man praise himselse in this fort, he profiteth the hearer and changeth his judgement. Thus did Zeno speake of the great number of Theophrastus his scholers, who refor-50 ted unto his schoole : His quite (quoth he) is greater than mine, but yet mine accordeth better and maketh the fweeter harmonie. Phoeton likewife, when as Leofthenes still flourished and bare a great name, being demanded by the Rhetoricians who used to make folemne orations, what good himselfe had ever done to the weale-publike, answered them in this manner: None other (quoth he) but this that all the whiles I was lord General, and had the conduct of an army, noncof all you made ever any funerall oration, but interred all your citizens who departed this life in the sepulchers and monuments of your ancestors. As for Crates when he read these verfescontaining the Epitaph of Sardanapalus: What

What hath gone downe my throat I have, my wanton sports remaine, Which Ladie Venus did vouchfafe, or else I count but vaine. wrate thus againe verie wittily and in a pleafant conceit: What during life I studied have and learned, is my gaine, The skill which muses then me gave, and nought else Iretaine.

for such manner of praise as this, is excellent, honest, and profitable, teaching men to love, to efteeme and admire fuch things as be commodious and expedient, and not those that are vaine and superfluous; and therefore this advertisement ought to be ranged with the rest before specified as touching the subject argument now in question.

It remaineth now by order and course according as the present theame in hand requireth. and our discourse admonished us, to declare how every man may avoid this importunate and unseasonable selfe-praise: for surely to speake of a mans selfe, having selfe-love as a commodious fort from whence it issueth, seemeth many times to lay wait and give the assault even unto them who are of all others most modest and farthest from vain-glorie. And like as one precept of health there is, to flie and shunne altogether unholfome tracts and contagious, or at leastwife to take heed of them most carefully if a man be in them; even so there be certeine dange- 10 rous times and flipperie places which one shall flide and fall into upon the least occasion in the world, by rashly speaking of himselfe. For first and formost those who are by nature ambitious, when they heare another man praifed, commonly (as it hath beene faid before) advance forward to talke of themselves, and then anon this humour of selfe-praise being once provoked and tickled (as it were) with an itch, a certeine defire and furious appetite of glorie which hardly can be held in, taketh hold of them, especially if the partie who is praised before them be but equal or inferior to them in merit; for like as they who are hungrie have the greater appetite, and are provoked more to eate when they see others fall to their meate before them; even so the praise of another inflameth the jealousie of those who be given to the greedy desire of honor & glorie. Secondly, the recitall and discourse of those things which have beene happily executed 20 and to a mans minde, drive many men into a brave vaunting, for the joy that they conceive in relating the same: for after they be once fallen into a narration of their victories atchieved in warre, or the enterprises which they have fortunately managed in their foveraigne government of State, or their actions and affaires performd under other chiefe rulers and commanders, or of the speeches which they have made to great purpose and good successe and commendation, they cannot conteine and hold themselves: to which kind of vaunting & speaking of ones selfe, we see those are most subject who are warriors and serve especally at sea 3 likewise this happen usually unto such who are come from the courts of mighty princes, or from those places where there hath beene exploited some great service : for in making mention of princes and grand Seigneours, they can not chuse but interlace ordinarily among, some speeches which those 40 potentates have delivered to their commendation; and therein they doe not thinke that they praise themselves, but recite onely the commendable testimonies that others have given out, of them : and verily fuch as these, be of opinion that the hearers perceive them not, when they recount the embracements, greetings, falutations, and favours which kings, emperours, and fuch great potentates have bestowed upon them; as if for footh they reheated not their owne selfepraises, but the courtesies and demonstrations of the bountie and humanitie of others; whereof every one of us ought most fully and warily to looke unto our selves when we praise any one, that the faid praifes be pure and fincere, voide of suspition, that we do not respect & aime at an oblique felfe-love, & speech of our owne selves, for feare lest we make the commendation of $2. troclin, as it is in Homer, a covert, colour and pretence of our owne praise, and by commending so others cunningly, praise our owne selves. Moreover, all the fort of blames and reprehensions of others, are otherwhiles very dangerous, cauling those to goe out of the way and stumble, who are never so little sicke of vain-glorie; into which maladie old folke many times incurre; and namely when they breake out into the reprofe of their youngers, finding fault with their leawed maners and fashions, for then in blaming others, they fall to magnifying themselves, asif in times past they had done wonders, in comparison of those things which now they condemne: and verily fuch as they be we ought to give place unto, in case they be not onely for age, but alfo in regard of their vertue and reputation venerable : for this maner of rebuke is not unprofitable, but breedeth in those who are chastisfed by them, a great desire and emulation with all to atteine unto the like place of honour and dignitie. But as for our selves we ought to take heed and beware how we trip or tread awry in this case; for the maner of blaming our neighbours, being as it is otherwise very odious and almost intolerable, and which hath need of great caution and warineffe; he that medleth his proper praise with the blame of another, and seeketh glorie by his infamy, cannot chuse but be exceeding hatefull and unsupportable, as if he hunted after renowme and honour by the reprochfull and difhonorable parts of his neighbours. Furthermore, as they who naturally are enclined and disposed to laughter, are to avoid and decline the to ticklings and foft handling in those parts of the body that are most smooth, sliecke and tender, which soone yeelding and relenting to those light touches, stirre up and provoke immediately that passion of laughing; even so this caveat and advertisement would be given unto such as paffionately begiven to this defire of glory, that they ablteine from praifing themselves, at what time as they be collauded by other: for a man that heareth himselfe praised, ought indeed to blush for shame, and not with a bold and shamelesse face to hearken thereto, nay he should doe well to reproove those that report some great matter of him, rather then to finde fault for saying too little, and not praising him sufficiently; a thing iwis that many mendoe, who are ready of themselves to prompt and suggest, yea and to inferre other magnanimous facts and proweffes, fo far forth that they marre all, aswell the praise that they give themselves, as the lauda-20 ble testimoniall of others. And I assure you many there be who stattering themselves, tickle and puffe up their owne conceits with nothing els but winde; others againe upon a malicious iutent, laying some petie praise as it were a bait for them to bite at, draw them on thereby to fall into their owne commendation: some also you shall have who to that purpose will keepe a questioning with them, & propose certaine demands for the nonce to traine them within their toile, and all to have the more matter that they might foone after laugh at. Thus in Menander the glorious foldier made good sport, being demanded of one DEMAND. Good fir how carne you by this wound and fear? SOLDIER. By dint of iavelin launced from a far. DEMAND. But how? for gods fake how? let us all know: SOLDIER. As I a wall did feale I caught this blow, But well I see whiles that I do my best This to relate, these make of me a jest.

And therefore in all these cases, a man ought to bee as warie as possibile hee can, that he neither himselfe breake out in his owne praises, nor yet bewray his weakenesse and folly by fuch interrogatoies; and that hee may in the best and most absolute manner take heede thereto, and fave himselfe from such inconveniences, the readiest way is to observe others neerely that love to bee praifers of themselves; namely to call to minde and reprefent unto their owne remembrance how displeasant and odious a thing it is to all the world, and that there is or can be no other speech so unfavory, tedious and irkesome to heare: for sup-40 pose that we are not able to say that we suffer any other harme at their hands who praise themfelves, yet we do all that we can to avoid fuch speech; we make shift to be delivered from it, and haften all that we may to breath our felves, as if it were an heavy burden which of it felfe and the owne nature overchargeth us, infomuch as it is troublesome and intolerable even to flatterers, paralites, and needy finel feafts in that necessitie and indigence of theirs, to heare a rich man, a prince, a governor, or a king to praise himselse: nay they give out that they pay the greatest portion of the shot, when they must have patience to give eare to such vanities; like unto that jester in Menander, who breaketh out into these words,

He killethme when at his boord I fat And with his cheere I fatter am no whit, But rather pine away, you may be fore, When fuch bald jests to heare I must endure. Andyet as wife and warlske as they feeme, A bragging foole and leaved for I him deeme.

For confidering that we are wont to fay thus, not onely against foldiers and glorious upstarts newly enriched, whose maner is to make much of their painted sheaths, powring out brave and proud discourses; but also against sophisters, rhetoritians, and philosophers, yea and great captaines, puffed up with arrogancy and prefumption, and speaking bigge words of themselves : If we would call to remembrance that a mans owne proper praises be accompanied alwaies with the dispraises of others, and that the end commonly of such vaine-glory is shame and infamie. alfo, that tediousnesseunto the hearers, is (as Demosthenes faith) the reward, and not any opinion to be reputed fuch as they fay, we would be more sparie and forbeare to speake so much of our felves, unleffe forme greater profit and advantage might afterwards grow either to us or to the hearers in place.

WHAT PASSIONS AND

OF THE SOULE, OR THOSE has OF THE BODIE?

The Summarie.

His present question upon which Plutarch hath framed this declamation, wheresf there remains the extant in our hands but one little parcell, hath beene of long time dif. all cuffed and debated among men; the greater is our damage and detriment, that we have heere no better division, nor a more ample resolution of it by so excellent aphilo-Sopher as he was: but seeing that this losse can not be recovered, let us seeke for the cleering of all this matter in other authors; but principally in those, who search deepely to the verie bottom, for to discover the source of all the maladies of the soule, in stead of such writers who have treated of moral philosophie, according to the doctrine and light of nature, onely accompanied with 20 precepts out of her schoole, and have not touched the point but superficially, as being ignorant what is originall and hereditarie corruption; what is sinne; how it entred first into the world; what are the greatest impressions, asfaults, effects, and what is the end and reward thereof. But to come unto thu fragment, our author after he had shewed that man of all living creatures is most miserable, declareth wherein these humane miseries ought to bee considered; and prooveth withall, that the diseases of the foule are more dangerous than those of the body, for that they be more in number, and the same exceeding different, harded be knowen and incurable, as evidently it is to be seene in effect, that those who are afflicted with such maladies, have their judgement depenvate and overturned, refusing remedie with the loffe of rest and repase, and a singular pleasure which they take to discover their unquietvesse, anxietie and milerie.

WHAT PASSIONS AND MALA-

dies be worse, those of the soule or those of the bodie?

Omer having viewed and confidered very well the fundry forts of living creatures mortall, compared also one kind with another, as well in the continuance as the conversation and maner of their life, 50 concluded in the end with this exclamation, Lo how of creatures, all on earth which walke and draw their wind. More miserable none there are nor wretched than mankind.

attributing unto man this unhappie foveraigntie, that he bath the superioritie in all miseries whatsoever thur we setting this downe

for a supposition granted already, that man carieth the victorie, and surpasseth all others for his infortunitie, and is already declared and pronounced the most unhappie wretch of all living creatures, will fet in hand to compare him with his ownefelfe, in a certeine conference of his proper calamities that follow him; and that by dividing him, not in vaine and unfruitfully, but very pertinently and to good purpose, into the soule and the bodie, to the end that wee may learne and know thereby whether we live more miserablie in regard of our foules, or our selves, that is to fay, our bodies: for a disease in our bodie is engendred by nature; but vice and sinne in the foule is first an action, but afterwards becomment a passion thereof: so that it is no small confolation, but maketh much for the contentment of our minde, to know that the worle to is curable, and the lighter is that which cannot be avoided.

The fox in Aelope pleading upon a time against the leopard, as touching the varietie of colours in their skins, after that the leopard had shewed her bodie, which to the ele and in outward apparence was well marked & befet with faire spots, whereas the foxes skin was tawny, foule and ill-favoured to see to: But you (quoth he) fir Judge, if you looke within, shall finde me more fpotted and divers coloured than that leopard there; meaning the craft and subtilitie which he had, to turne and change himselfe in divers sorts, as need required; after the same maner let us fay within our felves: O man, thy body breedeth and bringeth foorth many maladies and paffions naturally of it felfe, many also it receiveth and enterteineth comming from without, but if thou wilt anatomize and open thy felfe, thou shalt finde within, a save, an ambrie, nay a storehouse and treasurie (as Democritus faith) of many evils and maladies, and those of divers and fundry forts, not entring and running in from abroad, but having their originall fources springing out of the ground, and home-bred, the which, vice abundant, rich and plenteous in paffions putteth forth. Now, whereas the diseases that possessed and the flesh, are discovered and knowen by their inflamations and red colour, by pulles also or beating of the arteries, and namely, when the vifage is more red or pale than cultomably it is, or when fome extraordinatie heat or laffitude, without apparent cause, bewraieth them: contrariwise, the infirmities and maladies of the foule are hidden many times unto those that have them, who never thinke that they be ficke and ill at ease; and in this regard worse they be, for that they deprive the patients of the fenfe and feeling of their fickneffe: for the discourse of reason, whiles it is found and 30 hole, feeleth the maladies of the bodie; but as for the difeases of the soule, whiles reason herselfe is ficke, the hath no judgement at all of that which the fuffereth, for the felfe fame that thould judge is diseased; and we are to deeme and esteeme, that the principall and greatest maladie of the foule is follie, by reason whereof vice, being remedilesse and incurable in many, is cohabitant in them, liveth and dieth with them: for the first degree and very beginning of a cure, is the knowledge of a difease, which leadeth and directeth the patient to fecke for helpe; but he who will not beleeve that he is amiffe or ficke, not knowing what he hath need of, although a prefent remedie were offered unto him, will refuse and reject the same. And verily, among those diseafes which afflict the bodie, those are counted worst which take a man with a privation of sense; as lethargies, intolerable head-ach, or phrenfies, epilepfies or falling-evils, apoplexies and fea-40 vers ardent; for thefe burning agues many times augment their heat fo much, that they bring a man to the loffe of his right wits, and fo trouble the fenfes, as it were in a muficall inftrument, which is the reason that practitioners in physicke desire and wish in the first place, that a man were not ficke at all, but if hee be ficke, that hee be not ignorant and fenfeleffe altogether of his disease; a thing that ordinarily befalleth to all those who be sicke in minde: for neither witlesse fooles, nor diffolute and loose persons, ne yet those who be unjust and deale wrongfully, thinke that they do amisse and sinne; nay, some of them are perswaded that they do right well. Never 50 was there man yet, who efteemed an ague to be health, nor the phthificke or confumption to be a good plight and habit of the bodie, nor that the gour in the feet was good footmanihip, ne yet that to be ruddy and pale or yellow, was all one, yet you shall have many who are diseased in minde, to call hastines and choler, valiance; wanton love, amitie; envie, emulation; and cowardife, warie prudence. Moreover, they that be bodily ficke, fend for the physicians (because they know whereof they stand in need) for to heale their diseases; whereas the other avoid and shun the fage philosophers; for they thinke verily that they do well when they fault most. upon this reason we holde, that the ophthalmie, that is to say, the inflamation of bloud shotten cies, is a leffe maladie than Mania, that is to fay, rage and furious madneffe; and that the gout in the feet is nothing to bad as the phrentie, which is an inflamation or impostume bred in the braine, for the one of these patients finding himselfe diseased, crieth out for paine, & calleth for the physic cian, and no fooner is he come, but he sheweth him his diseased eie for to dresse and anoint, he holdeth forth his veine for to be opened, & yeeldeth unto him his head for to becured; where as you shall heare ladie Agave in the Tragadies, so farre transported out of all sense and under ftanding (by reason of her raging fit) that sheeknew not those persons which were most deate and entire unto her; for thus the faith:

This list le one here newly kild, And cut in pieces in the field, ... From hilles we bring to dwelling place, How happy, ô, hat h beene our chace!

As for him who is ficke in bodie, presently he yeeldeth thereto, he laies him downe upon his pallet, or taketh his naked bed, he caseth himselfe all that he can, and is content and quiet all the while that the physician hath him in cure; but if peradventure he tumble and toffe in his bedde, fling and cast off his clothes, by reason that his bodie is tormented with some grievous hotfit, no fooner stirreth he never so little, but one or other that standeth or sitteth by to tend him, is ready to fay gently unto him:

Poore faule, be quiet, feare none ill, Deare heart, in bed fee thou lie ftill.

he staieth and keepeth him downe, that he shall not start and leape out of his bed : but contrari. wife, those that be surprised with the passions of the soule, at such a time be most busie, then they be least in repose and quiet; for their violent motions be the causes moving their actions, and their passions are the vehement sits of such motions: this is the cause that they will not let the foule to be at rest, but even then when as a man hath most need of patience, filence and quietretrait, they draw him most of all abroad into the open aire; then are discovered soonest his cholerike passions, his opinionative and contentious humors, his wanton love and his grievous forrowes, enforcing him to commit many enormities against the lawes, and to speake many words unseasonably, and not befitting the time.

Like as therefore much more perillous is the tempest at sea, which impeacheth and put- 30 teth backe a ship, that it can not come into the harbour to ride at anchor, than that which will not suffer it to get out of the haven and make faile in open sea; even so those tempeltuous pallions of the foule are more dangerous which will not permit to be at rest, nor to fettlehis difcourse of reason once troubled, but overturneth it upside downe, as being disfurnished of pilots and cables, not well ballaifed in the storme, wandring to and fro without a guide and steeres men, carried mauger into rash and dangerous courses, so long, untill in the end it falleth into fome shipwracke, and where it overthroweth the whole life, in such fort that in regard of these reasons and others semblable, I conclude, that woorse it is to be soule-sicke than diseased in bodie; for the bodies being ficke, fuffer onely, but the foules if they be ficke, both fuffer and doe also amisse. To proove this, what neede we further to particularize and alledge for examples 40 many other passions, considering that the occasion of this present time is sufficient to admonith us thereof, and to refresh our memorie? See you not this great multitude and preasseof people thrusting and thronging here about the Tribunall and common place of the citie; they are not all affembled hither to facrifice unto the Tutelar gods, Protectors of their native countrey, nor to participate in common the fame religion and facred ceremonies of divine service; they are not all met heere together for to offer an oblation unto Jupiter Afraus, out of the first fruits of Lydia, and to celebrate and folemnize in the honor of Bacchus, during these holy nights, his festivall revils with daunses, masks, and mummeries accustomed: but like as by yeerhy accesse and anniversarie revolutions, the forcible vigor of the pestilence returneth for to initate and provoke all Asia; so they resort hither to entertaine their suits and processes in law to 50 follow their pleas; and a world here is of affaires, like to many brookes and riverets which run all at once into one channell and maine streame; so they are met in the same place, which is pestered and filled with an infinite multitude of people, to hurt themselves and others. From what fevers or colde, ague-fits, proceed these effects? from what tensions or remissions, augmentations or diminutions? from what diffemperature of heat, or overspreading of cold humours comes all this? If you aske of everie feverall cause here in suite, as if they were men and able to answere you from whence it arose, how it grew, and whereupon it came and first began? you shall finde that one matter was engendred, by some wilfull and proud anger; another proceeded from a troublefome and litigious spirit; and a shird was caused by some unjust desire and unlawfull luft.

THE PRECEPTS OF WEDLOCKE.

The Summaric.

E have beere a mixture, and medley of rules for married folke, who in the persons of Pollianus and Eurydice, are taught their mutuall duety: upon which argument needlesse is to discourse at large, considering that the whole matter is set out particularly, and tendeth to this point: That both at the beginning, in the sequell also and continuation of mariage, man and wife ought to a first support, and love one another with a fingle heart and affection, farreremooved from diffainfull pride, violence, vanitie, and fill hinesse; the which is specified and comprised in 45. articles; how beit in such fort, that there be some of tholeprecepts, which favour of the corruption of thole times, bewraying the insufficiency of humane wisedome, unlesseit belightened with Godstruth. We see also in this Treatise more particular adverresements appropriate to both parties, touching their devoir as well at home as abroad; and all emiched with notable similitudes and excellent examples. In summe, if these precepts following be well weighed and practifed, they are able to make mans life much more easte and commodious than it is. But Plutarch freweth sufficiently by the thirtieth rule, how hard a matter it is to reteine each one in their 30 severall dutie; and that in manner all doe regard and looke upon things with another eie, than they ought. How ever it be, those persons whom vertue hath linked and joined together in matrimonie, may finde here whereby to profit; and so much the more, for that they have one lesson, which naturall, equirie and conscience putteth them in minde of everie day, if they will enter never so little into themfelves, which being joined with the commandements of the heavenly wifedome, it can not be but hufband and wife shall live in contentment and bleffed estate.

PLUTARCH to POLLIANUS and EURY-DICE, sendeth greeting.

Fter the accustomed ceremoniall linke of marriage in this countrie, which the Priestresse of Ceres hath put upon you, in coupling you both together in one bed-chamber, I suppose that this difcourse of mine, comming as it doth to favorize and second this bond and conjunction of yours, in furnishing you with good leffons and wife nuptiall advertisements, will not be unprofitable, but found, veriefitting and comformable to the customarie wedding fong observed in these parts. The musicians among other tunes that they had with the haut-boies, used one kind of note which they called Hippotharos, which is asmuch to say as Leape-mare; having this opinion that it stirred and provoked stallions to cover mares. But of many beautifull and good discourses which philosophic affoordeth unto us, one there is which deserveth no lesse to be esteemed than any other, by which shee seeming to enchant and charme those who are come together to live all the daies of their life in mutuall societie, maketh them to be more but xome, kinde, tractable, and pliable one to the other. Therefore I have made a certaine collection of such rules and precepts which your selves have heard already oftentimes, being both of you trained up and nourished in the studie of philosophie; and reduced them all in sew words to certaine principall heads and articles, to the end that they might be more easily remembred; the which I send as a common present to you both, befeeching withall, the Muses that they would vouchase in your behalfe, and for your owne sake to affist and accompanie the goddesse went is forasimuch as their office is to make a good consonance and accord in marriage and house-keeping, by the meanes of reason and harmonie philosophicall, no lesse than to set in tune a lute or harpe, or any mussicall instrument.

And to begin withall: This is the reason that our auncients ordeined, that the image of Penus should be placed jointly with that of Mercurie, as giving us thereby to understand, that the delight and pleasure of marriage, had need especially to be maintained with good language and wise speeches: they used to set also with these two images, the Graces, and Goddesseo Eloquence Ladie Pitho, that is, Perswassion, intending thereby that those solke whom the bondos matrimonie had linked together, might obtaine what they desired one at the others hand gent ly and by faire meanes, not by debate, chiding and brawles.

2 Solon gave order and commanded that the new-wedded bride should eate of a quincebefore that the came in bed with her bridegrome; signifying covertly in mine opinion by this 10 darke ceremony, that first and above all, the grace proceeding from the mouth, to wit, the breath and the voice, ought to be sweete, pleasant, and agreeable in everie respect.

In the countrey of Baotia, the custome was upon the wedding day when the nuptial vaile was put over the bride, for to fet also upon her head a chaplet made of wilde preckie Spirach branches, for that this plant out of a most sharpe and pricking thorne, putteth foortha most pleafant and delectable fruit; even fo, the wedded wife in case her husband do not reject and flie her companie, for the first difficulties and troublesome inconveniences incident to marriage, shall bring unto him afterwards a sweete and amiable societie; but they that can not endure at first the jarres and quarrels of their yoong wives, whom they married virgins, may for all the world be resembled to those who give away ripe grapes from themselves to others, because they 30 be sowre before they are ripe; semblably, many new wedded-wives, who take a disdaine to their husbands by reason of some debates and encounters at the first, doe much like unto those who having abidden the sting of the Bee, cast away the honie-combe out of their hands. It behooveth therefore new-married folke, to take heed especially in the beginning, that they avoideal occasions of diffention and offence giving; considering this with themselves, and seeing daily that the pieces of woodden vessels which are newly joined and glued together, at the first are foone disjoined, and go afunder agains upon the least occasion in the world, but after that in continuance of time the joint is strongly settled and soundly confirmed, a man shall hardly part and separate one piece from another with fire or yron edged toole.

4 And like as fire kindleth soone & catcheth a slame if it meet with light stubble, chaffe, or 40 the haire of an hare, but it quickly goeth out againe, if there be not put thereto some matter or fewell anon, which may both hold in and also maintaine and feede the same; even so, we are to thinke that the love of yoong-wedded persons, which is enslamed and set on fire by youth, and the beautie of the bodic onely, is not firme and durable, unlesse it be furely sounded upon the conformitie of good and honest maners, and take hold of wisedome, whereby it may engendera lively affection and reciprocall disposition one toward the other.

Fishes are soone caught and taken up by baites made of empoysoned paste, or such like medicines, but their meat is naught and dangerous to be eaten; semblably, those women who compound certaine love drinkes, or devise other charmes and forceries for to give their husbands, and thinke by such allurements of pleasure to have the hand and command over them, it so is all to nothing, that afterwards in their life together they shall find them to be blockish, soolish, & sense companions. Those men whom Cree the famous sorceresse enchanted with hir witch craft, didher no pleasure, neither served they her in any stead, being transformed (as they were) into swine and affects; whereas the loved and affected entirely and exceedingly Ussse, an ingenious man and who conversed wisely with her; but such wives as had rather bee mistresses and over-rule their doltish husbands, than obey them that be wise & men of understanding, may very properly be compared unto them, who choose rather to leade and conduct the blind, than to be guided by those that see, and to follow them that have knowledge. These women will never beleeve that Pasphaie being a Kings wife loved a bull, notwithstanding they see some wives that can not endure their husbands, if they be any thing austere, grave, sober, and honest, but they abandon and give themselves over more willingly to accompanie with such as be composed altogether of luxurious loosenesse, of sithie lust and voluptuousnesse, like as if they were dogs

Some men there be fo tender, feeble, and effeminate, that being not able to mount up their horse-backes as they stand, teach them to stoupe and rest upon their knees, that they may get upon them; and even so, you shall finde divers husbands, who having espoused rich wives and descended of noble houses, never studie to make them better, but keepe downe their wives and hold them under, being perswaded that they shall rule them the better when they are thus humbled and brought low; whereas indeed they should as well maintaine the dignitic of their wives, as regard and keepe the just stature and height of their horses, as well in the one as the other, make use of the bridle.

7 We fee that the moone, the farther that she is from the funne, the brighter she shineth and is more cleere, and when she approacheth neere unto his raies and beames, she loseth her light and is darkened; but a chaste, honest and wise woman must do cleane contrarie; for shee ought to be most seene with her husband, and if he be away, to keepe close and hold her selfe within house.

8 It was not well faid of Herodotm: That a woman cafteth off her pudicitie, when she putteth off her smocke or inner garment; for cleane contrarie it is in a chaste and sober matron, for in stead thereof she putteth on shamefastnes and honestie; and the greatest signe of all other that matried solke do love reciprocally is this, when they have most reverence and shamefast regardone to the other.

Julie as if one take two founds that accord together, the base is alwaies more heard, and the song is ascribed to it; even so, in an house well ordered and governed, all goes well which is done by the consent of both parties; but evident it is and apparent, that the conduct, counsell and direction of the husband, is that which effecteth it.

To The funne upon a time (as the fable goeth) had the victoric over the northern winde; 30 for when the faid winde blew forcibly upon a man, and with the violence of his blafts, did what it could to drive his cloake or upper garment from off his shoulders, the man strived so much the more to hold it on and keepe it close about him; but when the sun came to be hot after the said wind was laid, and set the man in exceeding heat by his beames, he was glad to throw off his said cloake; yea and feeling himselfe to burne with heat, put off his coat, shirt and all; and even semblably do the most part of women, for when they perceive that their husbands by their authoritie, and perforce will take from them their superfluous delights and vaine pleasures, they strive againe and make resistance, and are offended and discontented therewith; but when as contrariwise they come unto them with gentle remonstrances and milde perswasions, then of themselves they will be content peacebly to lay them asside, and endure all with patience.

on 11 Cate deprived a fenatour of Rome of his honorable place, for that in the prefence of his owne daughter, he kiffed his wife, I cannot fimply commend this act of his, for it favoured per adventure too much of feveritie and rigor; but if it be (as no doubt it is) an unfeemely fight for man and wife to kiffe, clip, embrace, and ufe dalliance together in the prefence of others; how can it club but be more shamefull and unfeemly to chide, brawle, and taunt one another before strangers; and when a man hath plaied, sported, and used love delights in secret with his wife, afterwards in open place to checke, tebuke, nip and gird at her with spightfull speeches in the face

to no purpose, if it doe not represent to the life the face of him or her that looketh into it; no 50 more is a woman worth ought (be she otherwise never so rich) unlesses the conforme and frame her selfe, her maners and conditions surable in all respects to her husband. A falle mit rour it is, and good for nothing, that sheweth a sad and heavie countenance to him who is merie and jocund, and contrariwise, which resemble that glad and smiling visage to one who is melancholike, angrie and discontent; even so, a bad woman is she, and a very untoward piece, who when her husband is desirous to solace himselfe and be merry in disporting with her, frowneth and looketh doggedly under the browes, and on the other side, when she feeth him amused in serious matters, and in a deepe study about his affaires, is set on a merrie pin, and given to mirth and laughter; for as the one is a figne of a fowre plumme and an unpleasant yoke-fellow, so the other bewraieth a woman that fetteth light by the affections of her husband; whereas indeed befitting it were, that as (by the faying of Geometricians) the lines and superficers move not at all of themselves, but according to the motions of the bodies; even so a wife should have no proper passion or peculiar affection of her owne, but be a partaker of the sports, serious affaires. fad countenance, deepe thoughts, and fmiling looks of her husband.

13 They that take no pleasure, nor can not away that their wives doe eat and drinke freelie with them at the table in their fight, doe as much as teach them how to cram themselves and fill their gorge apart when they be alone; even fo they that will not vouchfafe to live merrily and be pleasant with their wives, nor can abide to disport and laugh privately with them, teach them 10

the ready way to feeke their pleafures and delights by themselves.

14 The kings of Perfia at their ordinarie meales have their queenes or espouled wives to fit by them at the boord, but when they lift to be merrie indeed and carroufe luftily untill they be drunke, they fend them away to their chambers, and call for their concubines, finging wenches, and muficall trulles in their place; * I can commend them yet for fo doing, in that they would not have their owne lawfull wives to be partakers of their drunkennesse and licentious corruption in loofenesse. If therefore it chance that some private person abandoned to his owne pleasures, untaught, and given to leawd conditions, chance to do a fault in abufing himfelfeeither with his his tune : for paramour or his wives chamber-maid, his wife must not be angrie for the matter and frowneat him for it, but rather thus to thinke with her felfe, and make this construction, that her husband 20 neft matron will not able to being loth and affraid to offend her with his drunkennesse, unbridled lust and intemperance, turan injurie, nor ned another way for that purpose.

Kings if they love mulicke, cause many good musicians to be in their kingdome; if they fet their minds upon their booke, they make many learned clearks; if they be given to feats of activitie and exercise of the body, many of their subjects (by that example) will prove champions and tall men of their hands; even so a husband that loveth to trim and pamper his bodic, caufeth his wife (by that meanes) to study nothing els but the tricking and pruning of her selse; he that followeth his pleafures and wanton delights, maketh her alfo to be lascivious and toplay the harlot; but who that embraceth honestie, and ensueth vertue and good things, by his example shall have an honest, vertuous and wise wife of her.

16 A young woman of Sparra being asked the question by one, whether she had medled or lien yet with her husband : Not I (quoth she) but he hath with me. And in very trueth, in this maner (by mine advice) it would become an honest matron and huswife to behave herselfe toward her husband, that the neither reject and disdaine dalliance and love sports with him, if he begin with her, nor yet herselfe offer such temptations first unto him; for as this is a trickeof a wanton and unshame-faced strumper, so the other bewraieth a proud woman, and one who is nothing lovely nor amiable. 17 A woman ought to have no peculiar friends by herselfe, but to use her husbands friends and take them as her owne. Confidering then, that the gods challenge the first and principall place in friendship, * the wife is to acknowledge and worship the same gods (and none elsbut 40 those) whom her husband honoureth, serveth, and reputeth gods; moreover, the ought to shut and locke the gate against all curious and new inventions of religions, and not to enterteine any ftrange and forren superstitions; for I assure you, to none of the gods can those divine services and facrifices be acceptable, which a woman will feeme to celebrate by ftealth, and without the knowledge and privitie of her husband.

18 Plate writeth, that the citie is bleffed and happie, wherein a man shall never heare these words: This is mine, and, This is not mine: for that the inhabitants thereof have all things there (especially, if they be of any woorth and importance) as neere as possibly they can, commonamong them: but these words ought rather to be banished out of the state of matrimonie, unlesse it be (as the Physicians holde) that the blowes or woundes which are given on the less 50 fide of the body, are felt on the right; even so a wife ought to have a fellow-feeling (by way of sympathic and compassion) of her husbands calamities, and the husband of his wives, much more; to the end, that like as those knots are much more fast and strong, when the ends of the cords are knit and interlaced one within another, even fo the bond of marriage is more firme and fure, when both parties (the one aswell as the other) bring with them a mutuall affection and reciprocall benevolence, whereby the fellowship and communion between ethem is mainteined jointly by them both; for nature herselse hath made a mixture of us, of two bodies, to the end that by taking part of one and part of another, and mixing all together, the might make that which commeth thereof, common to both, in fuch fort, as neither of the twaine can difeerne and distinguish what is proper to the one or peculiar to the other. This communion of goodsespecially, ought principally to be among those who are linked in wedlocke, for that they should put in common, and have all their havorie incorporate into one substance, in such wife, as they repute not this part proper to one, and that part peculiar to another, but the whole proper to themselves, and nothing to another: and like as in one cuppe where there is more water than wine, yet we fay nevertheleffe that the whole is wine; even to the goods and the house ought to beare the name of the husband, although peradventure the wife brought with her the to bigger portion.

Helene was covetous, and Paris lascivious; contrariwise, Ulustes was reputed wise, and Penelope chafte; and therefore the mariage of these last named, was bleffed, happie and beloved; but the conjunction of those two before, infortunate, bringing upon the Greeks and Barbari-ans both, a whole Iliad, that is to fay, an infinite maffe of miferies and calamities.

20 Agentleman of Rome, who espoused an honest, rich, faire and yoong ladie, put her away, and was divorced from her; whereupon being reprooved and sharply rebuked by all his friends, he put forth his foot unto them and thewed them his thoo: What finde you (quoth he) in this shoo of mine amisse? new it is and faire to see to; howbeit, there is not one of you all knoweth where it wringeth me, but I wot well where the fault is, and feele the inconvenience 20 thereof. A wife therefore is not to ft and fo much upon her goods and the down is thee brings, nor in the nobilitie of her race and parentage, ne yet in her beautie, as in those points which touch her husband most, and come neerest to his heart; namely, her conversation and fellowthip, her maners, her carrage & demeanor, in all respects so disposed, that they be all not harsh, nor troublesome from day to day unto her husband, but pleasant, lovely, obsequious, and agreeable to his humor: for like as Physicians feare those feavers which are engendred of secret and hidden causes within the bodie, gathering in long continuance of time by little and little, more than fuch as proceed from evident and apparent causes without; even so there fall out otherwhiles petie jarres, daily and continuall quarels betweene man and wife, which they fee and know full little that be abroad; and thefe they be which breed feparation, and cause them to part soo-30 ner than any thing els, these marre the pleasure of their cohabitation more than any other cause whatfoever.

21 King Philip was enamoured upon a certaine Theffalian woman, who was supposed and charged, by her forceries and charmes to have enchanted him to love her; whereupon queene Olympias his wife wrought fo, that the got the woman into her hands; now when the had well viewed her person, and considered her beautifull visage, her amiable favour, her comely grace, and how her speech shewed well that she was a woman of some noble house, and had good bringing up : Out upon these flanderous surmises (quoth she) and false impurations; for I see well that the charmes and forceries which thou usest, are in thy selfe. In like maner we must thinke, that an espoused and legitimate wife is as one would fay, a fort inexpugnable, namely, such an 40 one, as (in her felfe repofing and placing all thefethings, to wit, her dowrie, nobilitie, charmes and love-drinks, yea, and the very tiffue or girdle of Venus, by her study and endevour, by her gentle behavior, her good grace and vertue) is able to win the affectionate love of her husband

22 Another time, the same queene Olympias hearing that a certaine young gentleman of the Court had married a ladie, who though the were faire and well-favoured, yet had not altogether the best name: This man (quoth shee) hath no wit at all in his head, for otherwise hee would never have married according to the counfell and appetite of his eies only. And in trueth we ought not to goe about for to contract marriage by the cie or the fingers, as some doe who count with their fingers how much money, or what goods a wife bringeth with her, never ca-50 fting and making computation of her demeanour and conditions, whether she be so well qualified, as that they may have a good life with her.

23 Socrates was woont to counfell young men who used to see their faces and looke upon themselves in mirrours, if they were foule or ill-favoured, to correct that deformitie by vertue; if they were faire, not to foile and staine their beautie with vice; semblably, it were very well that the mistresse of an house having in her hand a looking glasse, should say thus unto her selfe if the befoule and deformed: What a one should I beif I were nought or leawd withall? if faire and well-favoured: How highly shall I be esteemed, if I be honest and wife besides? for if an hard-favoured woman be loved for her faire and gentle conditions, the hath more honor thereby, than if the wan love by beautie onely.

24 The tyrant of Sicily (Diony sim) lent upon a time unto the daughters of Lysander certaine rich robes, costly wreathes and precious jewels as presents; but Lysander would not receive these gifts, faying: These presents would bring more shame than honour to my daughters. And the Poet sophocles, before Lyfanders time, wrote to the like effect in thele verfes:

This will (ô wresch) to thee none honour bring, But may be thought a foule and shamefull thing; It doth bewray a fop and foole in kinde, And one who beares amost lascivious minde.

for (according as the Philosopher Crates faid) That is an ornament which doth adorne; and that adorneth a wife, which maketh her more comely and decent: this are not jewels of golde able to do, nor emerauds and other precious stones, nor purple and scarletrobes, but that only which causeth her to be reputed grave, sober, lowly and modest.

25 Those that sacrificed to Juno (surnamed Gametia, that is, Nuptiall) offered not the gall with the rest of the beast that was killed, but plucked it out of the body, cast it aside, and laid it by, about the altar; by which ceremonie, he who oever he was that first instituted it, would give us to understand; that in matrimonie there ought to be no gall, that is to say, no bitter choler and anger at all; hee meant not thereby that a woman should not be grave, for a wife and matton that is mistresse of an house, must carie an austere countenance in some fort, but this austerity to or tartneffe ought to be like that verdure which is in wine, that is to fay, holfome and pleafant, not bitter or eager in any wife, as is Aloe Succotrine, nor refembling any fuch purgative drugs,

26 Plato perceiving Xenocrates the Philosopher (a man otherwise vertuous and welldis posed) to be given a little to over-much severitie, admonished him to sacrifice unto the Graces, even fo I suppose, that a vertuous dame hath need also of the Graces helpe, as much as of any thing els, when the converfeth with her husband, to the end that the may live in joy with him (as Metradorus faith) and not move him to anger and displeasure, for all she be an honest and chaste matron, and so repent another day of her pudicitie: for neither must a frugall huswife and faving dame neglect to be cleane and neat, nor fhe that loveth her husband entirely, ceafe to of fer kindnesse unto him, and deale with him after an amiable and loving fort; for surely the sowre 30 conversation of a woman maketh all her honesty to be but odious, like as sluttery also causethall her frugalitie and thrift to be hatefull and displeasant; insomuch as she who is afraid to look pleafantly, and finile upon her husband, or to fhew fome fuch like love-trickes, because for footh The would not be thought bold and wanton, is much like unto her, who because the would not feeme to have her head befineered with precious perfumes, forbearethalfo to be annointed with oile, and for that folke should not thinke that shee painteth her face, will not so much as wash the same. Poets we see and orators, as many of them as would avoide a base, illiberall, and ill affected kinde of stile, without good grace which breedeth tediousnes in the reader and hearer, studie and endevour with all the wit they have to entertaine and moove both the one and the other by their fine invention, good dispose, and naturall representation of the manners of each 40 person; and even so, an honest dame and huswife shall do well, to avoide and reject all superfluitie, all curiofitie, and in one word what foever favoureth of a whoore, or fuch an one as loveh to shew her selfe abroad in pompous manner, and rather employ all her wit, her art and industrie in the pleafant and amiable carriage of her felfe, in her affabilitie and lovely convertation with her husband, daily and howerly acquainting and accustoming him to honestie and decence with pleasure and delight. Howbeit, if it fall out so, that some one woman be so austere of nature, that by no meanes which the husband uleth, he can make her pleasant and sociable, in this case he must be content and beare his owne crosses and like as Phoeion answered to Antipate, who required him to do a dishonest act and little befeeming his estate: Sir (quoth he) you can not have me to be your friend and a flatterer to; even so must be say to himselfe of such a wife, so who is fowreand unpleafant, but yet honest: It is not meet that I should looke to converse with her as a true espoused wife and a light harlot also.

27 The Egyptian wives by the ancient cultome of their countrey, weare no shooes at all on their feete, to the endthat this fashion of going might put them in mind to keepe home; but far otherwise it is with our dames for the most part, from whom if you take their gilded pantofles, their carkanets, their bracelets, their fine garters, their purple garments and pearles, they will never go once out of their houses.

28 Theano, as the one day dreffed her felfe and put on her raiment, chanced to thew her armea good way bare, and when one that flood by perceived it, and faid withall: Oh there is a faire elbow: True (quoth the) but it is not for every man; and even fo, not the arme onely of a chaste and honest dame ought not to be common, but also not so much as her verie speech; for theis as well in manner to take heed and beware how the open her mouth and speake much, as to discover and lay her bodie naked before strangers, for that her manners, actions, and conditions which the hath, the openeth unto others when the fpeaketh. 29 Phidias, when he made the image of Venus for the Elæans, devised that she should tread with her feete upon a tortoile shell, fignifying thereby that a woman ought to keepe home and not goe foorth of doores, but flay within house with filence; for furely a wife is to speake either unto her husband onely, or elfe by the meanes of her husband; neither must the thinke much and be offended, if like the minftrell that foundeth the hautboies, she utter a lowder and bigger voice than her owne, by the tongue of another.

30 Great men and rich, princes also and kings, in honouring Philosophers, do grace both them and their owne felves; but Philosophers in making court and doing fervice unto those rich and mighty personages, adde thereby no reputation unto them, but make themselves more honored and better accepted; femblably it fareth with wives, for when they be subject to their husbands, they winne praise and commendation, but when they will needs bee masters, they get greater shame by it, and do more undecently, than those whom they have the maithrie of. 20 For by good right, the husband ought to rule over the wife; not as the lord over his flave, or that which he possession; but after the same manner as the soule governeth the bodie, by a certaine mutuall love and reciprocall affection, wherewith he is linked unto her: for as the foule may well have a care of the bodie, without subjecting it selfe to the pleasures and disordinate lusts thereof; even so, may an husband have the soveraignty over his wife, and withall exercise the same neverthelesse in all kindnes, and be readie to gratiste and please her. 21 Philosophers doe hold opinion that of bodies some constit of parts disjoined and diflinct, and separate one from another, as a fleet of ships or an armie of men; others of pieces joined together and touching close one another, as an house or a ship; and some againe bee composed of parts united and incorporate into one nature living and growing together, as the 30 bodies of living creatures. Much like to these compositions is wedlocke: for the conjunction of those in matrimonie, who love entirely one another, and for pure love be linked in marriage, refembleth a bodie, the parts whereof are naturally united together: that copulation of those who marrie for rich dowries, wealth, or procreation of children, may be compared to that bodie which standeth of pieces, that touch onely and meet together in a joint: but such a marriaage as respecteth nothing but carnall companie in bed together, is like unto those bodies, the parts whereof stand afunder, and neither be united in one, nor touch one the other. But like as the natural Philosophers affirme, that liquid bodies or humours be those which are apr to bee mingled wholy one with another in every part; even fo, it behoveth that of those who are joined together in matrimony the bodies, goods, friends, & familiars, be totally intermingled together: 40 which is the reason that the law-giver in setting downe the Romane lawes, forbad expresly fuch as were entred into the bond of wedlocke, to give and receive any gifts interchangeably, or to make mutuall donation; not intending thereby that they should participate in nothing, but that they should repute all things in common betweene them.

32 A custome their was in Lepris, a citie situate in Libra, that the new-wedded bride the morrowafter her marriage, should send unto the bridegroomes mother, for to borrow a brasle pot or kettle to hang over the fire; but his mother-inlaw must denie it and fay, shee hath none for her 3 to the ende that this yoong wife being at the first acquainted with the fashious of her mother-inlaw, favouring fomewhat of a crooked stepdame, might not thinke it strange or be much grieved if it chance afterward that the deale more hardly with her. A wife knowing thus 50 much, ought betimes to meet with all occasions of such ordinarie offences which proceed from nothing els, but a jealousie that the stepmother hath over her, for the love that she beareth unto her sonne: The only remedie of which passion is this, that the new-wedded wife endeuor so to win the affection of her husband, that the doe not withall diminish nor withdraw that affection of his which a fonne ought to beare unto his naturall mother.

33 It feemeth that mothers ordinarily of children, love their fonnes better than the daughters, as at whose hands they hope for more succour another day; and fathers contrariwise aftect their daughters more, as who have more need of their helping hand; and peradventure it may be, that in regard of the honor the one beareth to the other, either of them would feeme to carie greater affection to that which is more proper and familiar to the other : and yet happily this holdeth not alwaies, but there may be some difference therein: but certeinly a civill part it is and very well befitting a wife to fnew herfelfe to have a better inclination to ho nor and make much of hir husbands parents than hir owne; yea & if at any time she be offended or grieved at ought, to conceale her griefe from her owne father and mother, and to lay the fame open and make her mone unto his; for in declaring that the hath the better affiance and trust in them, the gaincth more confidence at their hands, and by feeming to love them better, the is the rather beloved of them againe. The captaines under Cyrus gave commandement to their foldiors, that when the eni- 10 mies gave the charge upon them with great out-cries, they should receive them with silence; & contrariwife, if they came to affaile and fet upon them in filence, they should encounter them with mightic shouts; even so, women that are wife and of good understanding, when they perceive their husbands in choler, & thereupon growing to high words, use to hold their tongues; and on the other fide, if their husbands go up and downe and fay nothing, although they bean. grie, ought to moove speech unto them, and by faire language to appeale and mittigate their moode. Wifely did the poet Euripides in reprooving those that called for the harpe and other minstrelsie at feasts where they dranke wineliberally : For it behoved rather (quoth he) to have musicke when as men be in fits either of choler or melancholie, to delay their anger and heavinesse, than to enervate them yet more, who are in their meriments and pleasure enseebledal 10 readie, semblably you must thinke that you doe a fault, if you goe to bed and companie to gether for to pleasure one another, and when you bee at some debate and difference, youpar beds and lie afunder; not calling at fuch a time for the aide of lady Venus, who knoweth bestand is wont in fuch cases to remedicall: which the poet Homer in one place teachethus verie well, where he bringeth in dame Iuno speaking in this wife:

I heir long debates I will soone end, and bitter braules compose, By bringing them to bed both twaine, to sport and take repose.

Certes a wife ought stall times and in everie place to avoide the occasion of quarrels with 30 her husband, and the husband likewise with the wife; but especially they must beware how they fall out when they are in one bed, for to solace one another and to sleepe together. A good wife there was, who when the was in travell and ready to cry out as feeling the throwes comming thicke upon her, and not able to endure them, when the women about her would have laidher upon abed: And how can (quoth the) this bed eafe the paines of this my maladie, feeing I gat it first upon the same bed; and even so verily the quarrels, braules, shrewd words, and angie fits which arise in bed, hardly can be taken up and ended at any other time, or els where than

It feemeth that lady Hermion spake truely when in a tragedie of Euripides she said thus: Leawd women who to my house did resort,

Have me undone, andrais' da badreport.

Howbeit this is not simply true, neither falleth it out alwaies so when such use to come into an house, but onely at those times when the quarrellous braules and jealous fits of a wife withher hus band openeth not the doores onely of the house, but her eares also to such gossips, Atsuch a time therefore a wife woman ought to stop her cares and take heed of their whifpering and prailing suggestions, for seare least the stirre new coles, or put fire to fire, and to have in reading the faying of king Philip of Macedon: for we read of him, that when his friends incited him 10 anger against the Greekes, who (notwithstanding he was so gracious unto them, and had received many favors at his hands) ceased not to backbite and slander him, made them this answer: What thinke you will they doe then, if I should worke them a shrewd turne? semblablic when so make-bate women shall come twatling and say: How doth your husband missile you, loving him, and making so much of him as you doe in all dutie and loialty ? your answere must be: What will become of me then if I should begin to hate him and doe him injurie?

36 A certeine mafter there was upon a time who espied aslave of his that was long before runne away, and when he had fet his eieupon him, ranne apace for to take hold of him; the poore flave fled ftill, and gat at length a mil-house over his head: That's happie (quoth the mar fter to himfelfe) I would not with to meet with him in a better place 5 even to a woman who up on jealousie is upon the point to be divorced and depart from her husband, and being ill appaid inher mind for being driven to this hard exigent, should thus speake unto herselfe: What is it that my concurrent who is the cause of this my jealousse can wish in her heart to content her better than to feeme do this whereabout I am? namely, to vexe and torment my felfe thus as 1 do, to be fo far out, and in fuch tearmes with my husband, abandoning his house, and forfaking our mariage bed.

The Athenians observe and celebrate three seasons of sacred seednesse in the yeare; the first in the isle Seyros, in memoriall of the first invention of tillage and sowing in that countrey; the fecond in a place called Raria; and the third, under their owne citie walles, which they ro call Buzygion, in remembrance of yoking oxen to the plough: but the nuptiall tillage (as I may fo fay) which is imploied for iffue and procreation of children, and to mainteine our race and posterity, is the most facted of all other, and ought to be observed with all holinesse. And therefore Sophocles well and wifely gave this attribute unto Cytherea or Venus, when hee named her Eucarpos, that is, Fertile or Fruitfull; in which regard man and wife lawfully joined in matrimonie, are to use the same religiously and with all precisenesse, absteining wholly from all incestuous, illegitimate and forbidden conjunctions, and not plowing or fowing there, whereas they are not willing to reape, or if it chance that there come up any fruit, they are alhamed thereof, and willing to hide and conceale it.

38 Gorgias the oratour, in a great affembly at the Olympian games, made a folemne ora-20 tion to the Greeks, who were met there from all parts, exhorting them to live in peace, unitie and concord one with another; at which speech of his, one Melanthus there present: This man (quoth he) telleth us a tale of unitie, and exhorteth us all to concord here in publike, who cannot perswade in his private house at home, himselfe, his owne wife & her chamber-maid to agree and live peaceably together, being but three in all, and no more : for it should seeme that Gorgias call a fancie to the faid wench, and his wife was jealous of her : and therefore his house and familie ought to be in good order, who will buffe himselfe and intermeddle in ordering of publike affaires, or composing of matters among friends; for commonly it falleth out that the faults which we commit against our wives, be more divulged abroad in the world, than the mif-

39 Cats are much offended (they fay) with the odour and fent of sweet perfumes, insomuch as they will runne mad therewith; if it chance likewife, that a woman can not away with fuch perfumes, but that her braines be thereby troubled, and ready to overturne, her husband were of a very strange nature and should deale hardly with her, in case he would not forbeare to use sweet ointments or strong senting odours, but for a little pleasure of his owne, to suffer her for to fall into fo great inconvenience, and to neglect her contentment. Now if it be fo, that fuch accidents of brain-fickneffe happen unto women, not when their busbands be perfumed, but when they are given to keepe queanes and love harlots, it were meere injustice in them, for a fmall pleasure of their owne to offend and disquiet their wives, and not to doe so much for their fake as those who come among bees, who for that purpose will not touch their owne wives for 40 the time, because bees (as it is faid) hate such, and are ready to sting them above all others, but cary so bad a minde with them, as to come and lie by their owne wives side, being polluted and defiled with the filthic companie of other strumpets.

40 They that have the government of elephants, never put on white raiment when they come about them, no more do they weare red clothes who approch neere unto bulles; for that these beasts before named are afraid of such colours especially, and grow fierce and wood therewith. It is faid moreover, that tygers when they heare the found of drummes or tabours about them, become enraged, and in a furious madneffe all to teare themselves. Seeing it is so therefore, that there be fome men who can not abide, but are highly displeased to see their wives in their scarlet & purple robes; and others againe, who can not away with the found of cymbals or 50 tabours; what harme is it, if their wives wil forbeare both the one and the other, for feare of provoking and offending their husbands, and live with them without unquiet brawles and janglings in all repose and patience?

41 A certeine yong woman, when king Philip plucked and haled her unto him against her will: Hand off good fir (quoth she) and let me goe, all cats be gray in the darke, and when the candle is out all women are alike. It is not amiffe to fay to (I confesse) unto dissolute persons and adulterers; but an honest married dame ought (especially when the light is gone) not to be all one with other common naughty packs, but even then when as her body can not be feene, to let her chastitie, honestie, and pure love to her husband appeare most, that it may be well seene that she keepeth herselfe for him alone.

42 Plate exhorted elder folke to behave themselves more modestly before yong persons. than any other, that so they might learne also to reverence their elders and be respecteous of them; for where olde people be thamelesse, it is not possible to imprint any share or grace in the yonger. Now ought an husband evermore to cary in remembrance this precept: To have none in the world in better respect and more reverence, than his owne wife, for asmuch as the bed-chamber is unto her a schoole-house either of chastity and pudicity, or els of loosenesse and incontinence; for the husband that followeth those pleasures himselfe which he debarreth his wife of, doth as much as bid his wife to fight with those enemies unto whom he hath already to yeelded himfelfe prisoner.

43 Morcover, as touching the love and defire to go trim, and to decke and adorne the body, I would with you (ô Eurydice) to endevor for to call to your remembrance those rules which you have read in the treatife that Timexensu wrote unto Ariffilla concerning that argument, And as for you (ô Pollianus) never thinke that your wife will absteine from such curiosity, and lay away those delights and superfluities, so long as she perceiveth that you despise not, nor reject the like vanity in other things, but that you take pleasure both to see and have your cuppes and goblets gilt, your cabinets curioully and coftly painted, your mules and horses set out with rich caparisons, sumptuous trappings, and costly surniture: for an hard matter it is to chaseaway and banish such delicate superfluities out of the nurcery and womens chamber, so long as 20 they fee the fame to reigne in the mens parlour and where they have to do.

44 Furthermore, you Pollianus being now of ripe yeres to studie those sciences which are grounded upon reason, and proceed by undoubted demonstration, adorne from hence forward your maners by frequenting the company of fuch persons, and conversing with them, who may serve you in good stead and farther you that way : and as for your wife, see you doe the part of a studious and industrious Bee, in gathering for her and to her hand from all parts good things which you thinke may benefit & profit her, likewife bring the fame home with you, impart them unto her, devise and commune with her about them apart, and by that meanes make familiar and pleasant unto her the best bookes and the best discourses that you can meet with all:

For why? to her you are in stead, of fire and brother kind; A mother deere from henceforth now to her she must you find.

like as in Homer, Andromache faid of her husband Hettor. And verily in mine opinion it were no leffe honorable for a man to heare his wife fay thus unto him: My husband, you are my teachet, my regent, my master, and instructor in Philosophie, and in the knowledge of the most divine and excellent literature; for these sciences and liberall arts do above all other things divert and withdraw the minds of women from other unwoorthie and unseemely exercises. A matron or dame who hath studied Geometrie, will be ashamed to make profession of dauncing the measures; and she that is alreadic enchanted and charmed (as it were) with the fingular dif 40 courses of Plato and Xenophon, will never like of the charmes and enchantments of witches and forcerers; and if any enchantresse should come unto her, and make promise to draw downethe moone from heaven, the would mocke those women and laugh at their groffe ignorance, who fuffer themselves to be perswaded for to beleeve the same, as having learned somewhat in Aftrologic, and heard that Aganice the daughter of Hegetor, a great Lord in Thesalia, knowing the reason of the ecclipses of the moone when she is at the full, and observing the verietime when the bodie of the moone will meet right with the shadow of the earth, abused other women of that countrey, and made them believe that it was herfelfe who fetched downe themoon out of the skie.

45 It was never heardyet that a woman by course of nature should conceive, and bring 50 foorth a childe of her felfe alone without the companie of man: marie some there be who have beene knowen to gather in their wombe a rude masse or lumpe, without the true forme of a reafonable creature, refembling rather a piece of flesh engendred and growing to a consistence by meanes of some corruption, which some call a Mole. Great heed therefore would be taken that the like befall not to the foule and mind of women; for if they receive not from others the feeds of good matters and instructions, that is to say, if their husbands helpe them not to conceive good doctrine and found knowledge, they will of themselves fall a breeding and be delivered of many strange conceits, absurd opinions, and extravagant passions. But mine advice unto you Eurydice, is to be studious alwaies in the notable sayings and sentences morall of sage, wise, and approved men: have alwaies in your mouth the good words, which heretofore when you were ayoong maiden you heard and learned of us; to the end that you may be a joy to your husband, and be praifed and commended by other women, when they shall see you so honorably adornedand beautified without any cost bestowed upon brooches, tablets and jewels: for you can not possibly come by the precious pearles of this or that rich and wealthie woman, nor have the filken gownes and velvet robes of fuch a Ladie of a strange countrey, for to array or trim your felfe withall, but you must buy them at an exceeding high and deere price : but the ornaments 10 and attite of Theano, of Cleobuline, of Gorgo the wife of king Leonidas, of Timoclea, the fifter of Theagenes, of Clodia the ancient Romane Ladie, of dame Cornelia, the fifter of Scipio, and of other Ladies and gentlewomen so much renowmed and bruited heretofore for their rare vertues, you may have gratu, freely and without a penie cost; wherewith if you decke and adorne your selfe, you shall live both happily, and also with honor and glorie. For if Sappho for her sufficiency in Poetrie, and the skill that the had in verfifying, stucke not to write thus to a certaine rich and wealthie dame in her time:

All dead thou shalt one day entombed be, There shall remaine of thee no memorie, For that no part of roses came to thee That flower upon the mountaine Picric.

Why shouldest not thou thinke better of thy selfe, and take more joy and contentment in thine heart, confidering thou hast thy part not onely of the roses and flowers, but also of the fruits which the Muses bring foorth and yeeld to those who love good letters, and highly esteeme of Philosophie?

THE BANQVET OF THE SEVEN SAGES.

The Summarie.

Hether it were that the persons named in this discourse following were at a banquet in deed, and there discoursed of such matters as are here by Plutarch handled; or that himselfe had collected and gathered the Apophthegmes and histories of his time; or how foever it was; we may fee by this prefent Treatife what was the custome of Sages andwife men in ancient time at their feasts, namely, to invite one another courteously, to solace themselves and make merrie hartily, without many scremonies and complements to shew sincers amitie, and without excessive cost and expense to keepe good cheere after a plaine, open, and simple manner. The principall part of which meetings and frequentings of the table, being emploied in devising sadly, and with setled minde both during their repast, and a prettie while after, of matters honest, pleasant, and tending to good instruction and edification; as this booke and the Symposiakes or Table-discourses, whereof we shall see more hereafter do plainly shew. This manner and custome deser-50 veth to be opposed partly against the solitarie life, and beggerly niggardise of basemisers, coverous penni-fathers, and fuch like enemies of humaine focietie, and in part against the excessive pompe, unmeasurable sumptuositte, dissolute riots and foolish vanitte and gourmandise of those that love nothing but their paunch, and know no other god to worship but their bellie; as also against the fond laughters, bragging vanteries, impudent facings, seurrile mockeries, and dogged backbitings, that sensiesse Jots and previle persons are given unto; and finally against the enormities, violences, and outrages, of Such as are wholy ab and oned and given over to smne and wickednes. Moreover, so come more particularly to this booke folowing, Plutarch bringeth in one named Diocles, who recouteth unto Nicarchus

all that was faid and done at Corinth in a certeine banquet, at which were these persons, namel, Periander the fovereigne lord of that citie, and the hoft who badall the guefts, to wit, Solon, Bias, Tha. les, Cleobulus, Pittacus and Chilon, named in those daies, The seven Sages or wise men of Greece. Item, Anacharsis, Aclope, Niloxenus, Cleodemus and certeine others. But before that he entreshimo any speech of that which passed during the banquet and afterwards, he rehearsethinecom. munication held betweene Thales and those of his company upon the way of Corinth, where they talke of matters handled more at large afterwards: then confequently hee treateth of that which a quell ought to do who is invited to a banquet, and describeth what hapned among some of the guests: proceeding a little forward, he declareth what was the maner of the entrance, the flint and end of the ban. quet, to wir, modest, and seasoned with pleasant speeches (and those most honest and crails) of the bost in and his familie : which done, he entreth into the recitall of the talke that was held after the supper or banques; of which the beginning grew from the musicke of flutes, and by a certeine comparison deviled with a good grace, he caufeth audience to be given unto Niloxenus a ftranger; by occasion whereof, Bias doth expound the riddle or darks question fent by a king of Acthopia unto the king of Acgypt, which in the same traine inferreth an excellent occasion to speake of the duevie and office of kings; of which argument, all the forefaid Sages is were their minds fummarily, together with the propertid. dles and anigmaticall questions from the king of Aegypt to the king of Acthiopia. Now after the descriphering and assoiling of the said riddles, the former Sages fall into a discourse as touching the co. ucrnment popular and occornomicall, upon which point they doe opine and speake their mindes inorder, comming afterwards to conference together of certaine particularities of house-keeping to wit of drin to king and other pleasures; of the quantitie of goods that may suffice a man; of the fingalitie, this and Sobrietie of men in olde time; of the necessitie and delight of drinking and eating; and finally of the difcommodities, inconveniences and miseries incident to mans life in this behalfe. And for a conclusion, bringethin one Gorgias, who being arrived unlooked for, and comming suddenly in place, relateishihe strange accident of Arion Swed by the meanes of a dolphin; which report draweth on the companie to other like narrations and tales: at the end whereof, after grace faid and thanks giving according to the accustomed maner of that people, the quests retire themselves and depart.

THE BANQUET OF THE

Diocles.

Ertes, the long processe and continuance of time (my good friend Nicarchies) can not chuse but breed and bring much darknesse, obfeuritie and incertitude of mens actions and affaires; when as now in matters fo fresh, so new, and so lately passed, you have met with certeine falle reports, which notwithstanding are believed and received for true : for there were not onely those seven guests at the # table in this feaft, as you have heard and are borne in hand, but more than twife fo many, of whom my felfe made one, being familiar and inward with Periander, by reason of mine art and profession, and the host besides to Thales; (for by the commandement of Periander, he lodged in mine house) neither hatin he (who soever he was that related the thing unto you) borne well in minde, and remembred what the speeches and discourses were, which they held; which maketh me verily to thinke that he was not himselfe one of them who were at the banquet. But seeing we are now at good leasure (and for that olde age is no suretie sufficient to give good warrantile for to defer and put off this report unto a farther time, and because you are so desirous to know the trueth) I will rehearse unto you all in order even from the very be 10 ginning.

First and formost, the feast was prepared by Periander, not within the citie, but about the port or haven Leeheon, in a faire great hall or dining chamber neere to the Temple of Venus, unto whom there was also a facrifice offered; for since the infortunate love of his mother, who voluntarily made herfelfe away, having not facrificed unto Venus, this was the first time that he was moved thereto, as being incited by certaine dreames of Meliffa to worship and adore the said goddesse. Now to every one of the guests invited to this banquet, there was a coatchbrought, richly appointed and fet out accordingly, for to convey and conduct them to the place appoint red, for that it was the Summer feason, and all the port-way from the citie, as farre as to the featide, was full of dust, and refounded with great noise by reason of a number of chariots and a world of people going to and fro betweene. As for Thales, seeing at my gates a coatch standing andready to carie him, he fel a finiling and laughing, and fo fent it backe againe : he and I then put our selves in our way, and went faire and softly together on foot over the fields; and a third there was, who bare us companie, to wit, Niloxenus of Naucratia, a man of good woorth, and one who had beene familiarly acquainted with Solon and Thales before-time in Aegypt, and as then was he fent the fecond time unto Bias, but wherefore, himfelfe knew not, unlesse (as hee 10 suspected) it were to bring unto him a second question inclosed and sealed within a packet; for this charge and commandement he had: That if Bias refused and would not take upon him to affoile and expound the same, he should shew it to the wifest Sages of the Greeks. Then began Niloxinus: An happy feast (quothhe) is this to me (my masters) and unexpected, wherein I shall finde you all together, for I carie with me thither a packet as you see, and with that he shewedit unto us: Then (quoth Thales smiling) if you have therein any hard and untoward question to beedisfolved, cary it agains to Pyrene, for Biss will declare the meaning the eof, like as hee affoiled the former: What former question was that (quoth 1:) Mary (quoth he againe) hee tent unto him a theepe for facrifice, commanding that hee thould take out of it the best and woorst piece thereof, and so to fend the faid flesh unto him: hee therefore well and wisely 30 plucked foorth the tongue, and fent it unto him; for which hee was (by good right) well praised, highly effected, and held in great admiration. It was not therefore onely (quoth Miloxenus) that hee came to fo great a name, but also for that hee refused not the amitie of princes and kings as you doe: for Amasis admired many more things in you, and namely among others, when you tooke the measure of the height of the Pyramis in Egypt, he woondered exceedingly, and made high account of your conceit, for that without any great hand-labour, and the same requiring no instrument at all, by setting up a staffe onely plumbe upright, at the very point and end of the shadow which the said Pyramis cast, and by two Triangles which the beames of the funne caused, you made demonstration, that what proportion there was betweene the length of both shadowes, to wit, of the Pyramis and the 30 staffe, the same was betweene the height of the one and the other. But as I said before, you were accused unto the sameking Amasis for bearing no good will unto kings and their estate, which was the cause of your disgrace and disfavour with him; besides, there were brought unto him and presented many flanderous speeches and contumelious answers of yours as touching tyrants: as for example; when Molpagor as a great lord of Ioma demaunded upon a time of you what strange thing you had in your time scene? you answered: A tyrant living to be an old man: Againe, at a certeine banket there being some speech mooved as touching beasts which was the worst and did most harme? you made answer, that: Of wilde beasts a tyrant, and of tame bealts a flatterer was most dangerous; for I may tell you: Kings howfoever they fay that they differ from tyrats, yet take they no pleafure at fuch Apophthegmes as those. That answer (quoth 40 Thalesagaine) was none of mine, but Pittaew it was, who made it one day in fcoffing merilie to Myrillus: for mine one part, I doe not so much mervaile at an aged tyrant, as I doe woonder to fee an oldepilot: howbeit as touching this transposition and taking one for another, I am of the same minde, and am willing to say, as that yoong man did who flung a stone at a dogge, and miffing the dog hit his owne stepmother and felled her withall; whereat: It makes no matter (quoth he) for even fo, the stone hath not light amisse. For, and in truth I my selfe alwaies esteemed Solon a right wife man, for that he refused to be the tyrant of his owne country: and even fo Pittaeun if he had never come to take upon him a monarchie, would not have delivered this speech; Howhard a thing is it to beca good man! And it should seeme that Periander being feized upon (as a man would fay) by the fame tyranny, as an hereditarie disease from his father, 50 did not amisse to endevour what he could to free himselse and get out of it, by conversing with the best men and frequenting their companie, as hee hath done to this day, and training unto him the focietie of Sages and philosophers, and being ruled and advised by them, not approoving nor admitting the perilous and unhappiecounfell of my country-man Thrasibulus, perfwading him to cut the chiefmen shorter by the heads: For a tyrant who chooseth to command and rule flaves and vaffailes rather than free men indeed, nothing differeth from the husbandman, who had leifer gather locusts and catch foules, than reape and bring in good graine of wheat and barley; for these soveraigne domainions and principalities bring with them this onely good thing in stead and recompence of many evils; to wit, a kind of honor and glorie; if menbe so happie as in ruling over good men, they be better themselves, and in command ding great persons become greater themselves; as for such as in their government and place of command, aime at nothing but their fecuritie, without respect of honour and honestie, de ferve to be fet over a number of theepe, horfes, or beafts, and not of men: but this good gentleman stranger heere, hath (I wotnot how) cast us upon such discourses which are no. thing convenient for our present purpose, omitting both to speake and also to demaund those matters that befit better those who goe to a feast i for thinke you not that the guest who is bid. den, ought not to goe prepared as well as the very mafter himselfe is to make preparation. For the Sybarites (as it should feeme) folemnly invite their dames to their feasts, & feeme to bidly them a whole yeere before, of purpose that they might have time enough to trim themselves at their good leafure with rich aray and jewels of gold against they goe to a feast; and for mine owne part, I affure you of this mind I am, that the right preparative of one who is to go unto a great dinner as he should, would require a longer time than so, by how much harder it is to find fit and decent ornament for the manners of the minde, than to provide for the superfluous, needleffe, and unprofitable fetting out of the bodie: for a wife man who hath wit and underflanding, goeth not to a feast carying with him his body as a vessell to be filled, but he goes thither with an intention to passe the time either in serious discourses, or pleasant and mery talke; to fpeake I fay and heare according as the time that give occasion to the companie, if they means with joy and mirth to converse together one with another. A man that is come to a feast may if in he like not a dish of meat, or if it be naught refuse it; or if the wine be not good, have recounted unto the nymphes; but a troublefome gueft, a talkative bufi-bodie, and an unmannerly or untaught neighbour fitting at the boord, marreth all the grace of the viands, be they otherwisene. ver to deinty, he corrupteth the wine, yea and all the fweetnesse of the musicke, how melodious fo ever it be. Neither may a man when he lift vomit and cast up readily againe this trouble and vexation once received: but in fome, a mutuall discontentment and offence taken at therable one with another, flicketh by them and continueth as long as they have a day to live, infomuch as they cannot endure the enterview one of another againe; but like an old furfeit, arisen of wrong done, or of anger conceived by drinking wine, the spight remaineth seltering & compting in the stomacke and never will be digested. In mine opinion therefore did Chilon very well to and wifely, who being invited as it were yesterday to a feast, would never promise to comebe. fore he knew what other guests he should meet with there, even everic one of them; for this was his faying: That a man must endure will be nill he if he be once at sea, a rude companion and uncivil fellow-paffenger in the fame thip where he is embarked; as also in warfare a troublesome mate in the same pavilion, for that he is forced of necessitie to saile with the one and encampe with the other; but for a man to fort himselse indifferently and without discretion with alkinds of men at a banket, bewraieth one that is void of all wit and judgement. As for the fathion and maners of the Egyptians, namely to bring in place ordinarily at their feafts a Scelet, that is to fay, a drie and withered anatomic of a dead man, and there to flew it before all the guests at the boord, to put them in minde of death, and that within a while they all should become such; al- o though I must needs say that such a one were an unwelcome guest, and came very unseasonably among them; yet it cannot be denied but there is some good use thereof; for although he cheere not up the guests there to drinke freely and to make merry, yet he inviteth and stirreth them up to carie mutuall love and affection one to the other, in admonishing them to remember that their life being of it selfe short, they should not seeke to make it long and tedious by troublesome businesse and affaires.

Thus spent we the time by the way, until at length we were come to the banquetting house. And as for Thates he refused to wash or go into a baine: For that (quoth he) I am annointed alreadie; but in the meane time that the rest were bathing, he went walking up and downe to see the pleasant races, the wrestling places, and the faire grove which along the sea was very well so planted and kept accordingly; not because he woondered at the sight of any of all these delights, but for that he would not seeme to despise Periander, or dissaine his magnificence in any thing. As for the others, according as any of them were washed or anointed, the servitors were readie to conduct them into the hall or dining place, appointed for men, and that through a porch or gallerie, within which sate Anacharsis, and before him stood a damosell plaiting and combing the haire of his head with her hands (whom as she ran toward Thates) most willingly and courte-outly he kissed, and after a smilling manner: Well done (quoth he) make that stranger, who of himselfe is the mildest and gentlest man in the world, to have a pleasant and faire countenance, that he looke not upon us fearfull and hideous to fee to. I enquired then what pretie maiden this was: Why (quoth Thales) know you not that wife damofell fo famous and fo much renowmed functis? for that is the name that her father gave her, howfoever the people call her after her fathers name Cleobuline. You praise this virgin (quoth Niloxenus, doc you not) for her quick fpirit in propounding, and her fubrill wit and wisedome in affoiling riddles and darke questions, fuch as be called Aenigmes? For by report there be some of her enigmaticall questions, which are gone as far as Egypt: No marie (quoth Thales againe) I fay not fo; for the ulerh them but as dice or coc-kall bones, when the lift to disport her felfe and passe away the time with those that to encounter her, and are disposed to enter into contention with her: but of a woonderfull courage and haughtie mind the is; a politike head the hath of her owne worthy to governe a State; of a courteous nature the is belide, and of fweet behaviour; in regard of which her carriage, thee maketh her father to feeme a more milde and popular ruler among his citizens and fubjects. It may well be fo (quoth N tloxenus) for furely the feemeth no leffe, if a man behold her homely apparell, and how fimply the goes: but how commeth this inward affection and kindnelle to Anachar sis, that so lovingly she dresseth and trimmeth him? Because (quoth Thales) he is a temperate and foberman, and befides a great fehollar and a learned clearke, and for that he hath willingly and at large recounted unto her the manner of the Tartarians life, and namely how they use to charme the maladies of those that are sicke; and I verily believe that even now whiles the 20 maketh fo much of the man, flroking his head, plaiting and broiding his haire, the learnest fomewhat of him, or discourseth with him about some point of learning. Now when we drew necre to the hall or dining chamber abovefaid, who should meet us but Alexidemus the Milefian, a baffard fonne of Thrasybulus the Tyrant? who was newly come foorth from thence in a great heat, diffempered and troubled, and faying (I wot not what) to himfelfe in a pelting chafe: for understad we could not plainly what his words were, he spake them so huddle: he had no sooner his eie upon Thales, but he feemed to reclaime himfelfe, and fo staied a little, breaking out into these audible tearmes: Periander (quoth he) hath offered me abuse & done me great wrong, in that he would not give me leave to depart, when I was willing and readie to embarke, but by his entreatie hath importuned me to ftay supper; and now fortooth that I am come, he hath 30 fet me at the table in a place most dishonorable for my person, and hath preferred the Acolians, the Islanders, and other base companions, and indeed whom not, and before Throsphulus; for apparantitis, that he despiseth my father who sent me, and meaneth that the disgrace offered unto me should redound upon him. How now (quoth Thales) is it so indeed? and are you afraid that like as the Egyptians hold opinion & fay? That the stars in making their ordinarie revolutions, are one while elevated on high, & another while afterwards falling as low, and according to their heights, or basenesse of the place, become either better or woorse than they were? so you in regard of the place that is given you, should be advanced or debased more or lesse; for by this meanes you are worfe & more base minded than the Laconian, who being by the mafter of the ceremonies fet in the lowest place of the quire or daunce, was no more mooved thereat, but 40 faid: Well done of you, I fee you can skill of the meanes how to make this place more honorable: for when wee bee fet at a table, wee ought not to looke and regard, either beneath whom we fit, or after whom we are placed, but rather how we may accommodate and frame our felves to fortand agree with those next to whom wee fit; shewing presently at the verie first that wee have in our felves the beginning and handle (as a man would fay) of amitic, in that we can finde in our hearts not to be offended with the place that is given us, but to praise our fortune in that wee are matched with fo good companie: for he that is angrie about a place or feat, is more offended with him to whom he fitteth next, than with the matter of the feast that bad him, and hee maketh himselfe odious as well to the one as the other. Tush (quoth Alexidemus) these are but words; for in verie deed I have observed, that even you who would be counted Sages and 50 wife men, lay for meanes enough to make your felves honored; and with that he paffed by us and went his way. Now as we mused and woondered much at this strange fashion and behaviour of the man: Thales turning unto us; This man (quoth he) is a brain-ficke foole, and of a monstrous nature, as you may well know by one tricke that he plaied when he was a verie youth: for when there was brought unto Thrasybulus his father, a most excellent, sweet and precious ointment, he powred it out all into a great boll or standing cup, and wine likwise upon it, and when he had so done, drunke it up himselfe every drop, working by this meanes enmitte in stead of friendship to Thrasybulus. Immediately after this there comes to mea servitor with these words: Periander requesteth you to take Thales & this other stranger with you, and to come and fee a thing that is newly prefented and brought unto him, for to know your opinon, whether he is to take it as an occurrent happened by meere chance, or rather a prodigie that doth prefage and prognosticate some strange event, for he himselse is much troubled in minde thereat, and mightily feareth that it be some pollution or staine to this his fealtivall sacrifice; hee had no fooner faid this, but he brought us into one of the housen that flood upon the garden, where we found a yoong lad, feeming unto us to be some heard-man, he had not yet an haire on his face, and otherwife (believe me) he was faire enough and well-favoured, who opening a leather poke or bag that he had, the wed unto us a yoong monstrous babe, which (as he said) was borne of a mare; in the upper parts about the necke and armes shaped like a man, but all the restre. fembling an horse, howbeit, crying and wrawling, as like as possibly might be to an infantnew come into the world : at which fight Niloxenus turning his face at one fide, cried out: God bleffe us, & turne away his displeasure from us. But Thales after he had looked wistly a good whileup. on the young lad aforefaid, imiled at the matter (as his maner was to play and make good game with me about mine art:) Are you not minded (quoth he) ô Diocles to go about some expiato. rie facrifice for this prodigious fight, and to fet on worke those gods whose care and charge it is to divert fuch imminent perils and misfortunes, this being as it is fo fearfull a prodigie and unluckie accident? Howelfe? (quoth I againe) for I affure you this is a token prefaging difcord and fedition; and I much feare left this matter proceed as farre as to marriages, and the actof generation, even to the prejudice of posteritie, considering that the goddesse before the expiation and fatisfaction of her former anger, threatneth thus the fecond time, as you fee. Thales answered never aword to this, but departed laughing. And when Periander met us at the verie hall doore, and enquired what we thought of this strange occurrent which we went to see? The. les left me, and taking him by the hand: As touching that (quoth he) which Diecles wil perswade you unto, do you as he willeth you at your best leasure: for mine owne part, mine adviseand counfell unto you is, that you entertaine no more fuch youthes as this to keepe your mares, or at least-wife, that you give them wives to wed. At the hearing of which words, it seemed unto me that Periander was exceeding well pleased; for he laughed a good, and after he had embraced Thales, kiffed him. Then Thales turning unto me: I suppose verily (quoth he) ô Diocles that this prodigious token hath wrought the effect, and is come to an end alreadie; for see you not what to an evill accident is befallen unto us, in that Alexidemus will not dine with us? Well, when wee were come within the hall, Thales beginning to speake with a loude voice: And where is the place (quoth he) wherein this honelt man thought fcorne, & tooke fuch fauffe to be fet: which when it was thewed unto him, he turned about, and went to fit there himfelfe, and so tookeus with him; faying withall, I would (for mine owne part) have given any money (rather than failed) to fit at the same boord with Ardalus. Now was this Ardalus a Troezenian, by profession on a Piper, and a Prieft ferving the Ardalian Muses, whose images ancient Ardalia the Trozzenian had erected and dedicated. Then Aesope, who not long before had beene sent by king Crafus, as well to Periander as to the oracle of Apollo in the citie of Delphos, being fet upon a low fettle necreto Solon, who fat above him, came in with his fable, and thus faid: A mule (quoth he)of 40 Lydia having beheld the forme and shape of his owne body within a river, and woondring much at the beautie and goodly stature thereof, began to runne with full carriere, to sling and shakehis head and his maine, like a luftie brave horse; but within a while, remembring that hee was an affes fonne, and foaled by an affe, he staid his swift course all on a sudden, and laid away his pride and infolent bravetie. At these words, Chilo briefly in his Laconian language: Thou hasttold (quoth he) a tale by thine owne felfe, who being a flow-backe like and affe, will needs runneas the faid mule. After this entered in dame Melisa, and tooke her place close unto Periander: Eumet is also sate downe to supper with them: Then 7 hales addressed his speech unto me who fate next above Bias, and faid: My friend Diocles, how hapneth it that you tell not Bias, that your friend and guest Niloxenus of Naucratia is come from beyond sea the second time, sent so from his lord the King unto him with new questions and riddles for to assoile, to the end that he may take knowledge of them while he is fober, and in case for to studie and thinke upon their folutions? Then Bias taking the word out of his mouth: It hath bene (quoth he) his old fashions of long time, for to feeme to fright & aftonish me with such admonitions & advertisements as thefe; as for me I know ful wel that as Bacchus otherwife is a wife and powerfull god, so in regard of his wisedome he is surnamed Lysus, which is as much to say, as unfolding and undooing the knots of all difficulties; which is the cause that I have no feare at all, that if I be full of him, I shall bee leffe heartie and able to mainteine the combat when I come to it and am put to dispute. These and such like pleasant speeches passed to and fro in meriment as they fat at meat. Now when I faw the fetting out, and provision of this supper more frugall and sparie than ordinarie. I thought in my minde that to make a feast and give enterteinment to wise and good men. putteth a man to no greater cost and expences, but rather easeth him of some charges: for that it abridgeth all curiofity of daintie viands, exquifite cates, costly perfumes, precious ointments, confitures and march-pains brought from forreine and farre countries, yea and fine and delicate wines, wherewith Periander being served daily at his ordinary, according to the magnificence of his princely estate, riches, affaires and occasions, yet at such a time he tooke a gloric among these Sages and wife men, in sobrietie, frugalitie, and slender provision; for not in other things onely he cut-off and concealed all superfluitie and needlesse furniture which was usuall in his house-keeping, but also in his wives attire and ornaments, whom hee shewed to his friends and guests nothing costly arraied, nor keeping state, but meanely set out and adorned. Now when the tables were taken away, and that Meliffa had given and dealt chaplets of flowers unto us round about, wee rendred thanks and faid grace unto the gods, in powring out unto them devoutly a little wine; and the minftrell-woman having fung a while after our grace, and according to our vowes, departed out of the roome.

Then Ardalus calling unto Anachar sis by name, demanded of him whether among the Scythians there were any such singing women & minstrell wenches that could play upon wind 100 instruments? unto which demaund he answered extempore and without studying for the matter; No (quoth he) nor so much as vines; and as Ardalus replied againe: But yet there are some gods among them, are there not? Yes iwis (quoth he) that there be, and those who understand the speech and language of men; but yet the Scythians are not of the same mind that the Greeks, who although they thinke themselves to speak more freely and elegantly than the Scythians, yet they hold opinion that the gods take more pleasure to heare the sound of bones and wood, whereof their flutes and hautboies are made than the voice of man. But my good friend (quoth Aespe then) what would you say, if you knew what this pipe-makers do nowe a daies, who cast away the bones of young hind-calves and sawnes, and choose before them assess bones, saying for sooth that they make a better sound? whereupon Cleobuline made one of her in fuch fort, that it is a wonder how an affe which is otherwife a most blockith and abfurd beaft, of any other most remote from all sweet harmonic of musicke, should yeeld abone so slicke, so smooth, and proper, to make thereof a most musicall instrument. Certes, (quoth Niloxenus then)this is the reason that the inhabitants of the city Businis, reproch al us of Naueratia, for that we likewise have already taken two asse-bones for the making of our pipes; and as for them, it is not lawfull to heare fo much as the found of a trumpet, because it fomewhat doth resemble 40 the braying of an affe; and you all know that the affe is infamous and odious with the Acgyptians, because of Typhon. upon this every man held his peace for a while; and when Persander perceived that Wiloxenus had a good minde to speake, but yet durst not begin or broach any speech; My masters (quoth he) I doe like very well of the custome of cities and head-magifirates, in that they give audience and dispatch unto all strangers, before their owne citizens; and therefore me thinks it were well that for a time both you & we forbeare our speeches which are to familiar and as it were native and home-borne among us in our owne countrey, to give accesse and audience, as it were in a solemne counsell and affembly of estate, unto those questions and demaunds which our good friend heere hath brought out of Aegypt; and namely fuch as are mooved from the king to Bias, and Bias I doubt not will confer with you about the fame. 50 Then Bias feconding this motion of his: And in what place (quoth he) or with what companie would a man with rather for to hazard and trie his skill than in this, for to make anfwers accordingly and give folutions, if he be put unto it and need require? especially, seeing that the king himselfe hath given expresse commandement, that in proposing this question he should first begin within, & afterwards go round about the rest & present the same unto you all? Heerupon Niloxenus delivered unto him the kings letter, defiring him to breake it open, and to reade the fame with an audible and loud voice beforeall the companie. Now the substance or tenor of the faid letter ran in this forme. Amasis the king of the Aegyptians, unto Bias the wiselt

"Sage of all the Greekes fendeth greeting. So it is, that the king of the Aethiopians is entred in the contestation and contention with me, as touching wisedome: and being in all other propositions put downe by me and found my inferior, in the end after all; he hath imposed upon me a commandement very strange, woonderfull, and hard to be performed, willing me for footh to drinke up the whole sea. Now if I may compasse the solution of this riddle and darke question, I finall gaine thereby many townes, villages & cities of his but in case I cannot associate the same, I must yeeld unto him all my cities within the country Elephantine. These are therfore to request you, that after you have well considered of the premisses, you sende backe unto me Xiloxenia incontinently with the interpretation thereof. And if either your selse or any of your citizens and country-men have occasion to use me in your affaires and occasions, be sure you shall not to

" faile of me wherein I may stead you. Farewell. This letter being read, Bias made no long stay, but after some little pause and meditation with himselfe, he rounded Cleobulus it the care, who fat close unto him: And then, what is that you fay (my friend of 2 aueratia) will your mafter and lord king Amasis (who commandeth so great a multitude of men, and possession fo large, so faire and plentifull a countrey) drinke all the fea, for to get thereby, I wot not what poore townes and villages of no importance? Then Niloxents laughing at the matter: I pray you (quoth he) confider upon the point what is possible to be done, even as you will your felfe: Mary then (quoth he) let him fend word vnto the Aethiopian king, and enjoine him to flay the course of all rivers that discharge themselves into the fea, untill he have drunke up in the meane time all the water in the fea that is now at this prefent; 20 for of that onely, his demand and commandement is to be understood, and not of the feathat shall be hereafter. These words were no sooner spoken, but Niloxenus tooke so great a contentment therein, that he could not holde, but needs he must embrace and kiffe him immediatly for it; yea, and all the rest commended and approved likewise his speech: but Chilo laughing heartily: O my friend (quoth he) of Naucratia, I befeech you before all the sea be drie and cleane fpent, faile home with all speed, and do the king your master to understand, that he shal not need to travell and busic his braines in searching how he may consume so great a quantitie of salt water, but rather how he may make his regiment and roiall rule (now brackith and unpleasant) to be sweet and potable unto his subjects; for in these seats Bias is a most cunning workeman and a fingular mafter, which when king Amasis hath well and throughly learned of him, he shall not 30 have any use of that golden basen to wash his feet in, and for to conteine the Aegyptians in awe and obedience, but they shall serve him all willingly and love him affectionately, when they shall see him become a good prince, although hee were a thousand times more odious unto them than he feemeth now to be. Certes (quoth Periander) then it were worthily done of usall to contribute unto K. Amasis such like first fruits & presents ars eines, as Homer speaketh, that is to fay, every one of us by the poll, and one after another in order; for by this meanes the accefaric haply and addition will arise to a greater matter, and be more woorth unto him than the principallor stocke for the negotiation wherefore this voiage was undertaken, and besides, there will accrew unto ech of us also some great profit. Meet it were then (quoth Chilo) that Solon should begin the speech; not only for that he is of all our ancient, and hath the highest place 40 of the table, but also because he beareth the greatest and most absolute office, being the man who ordeined and established the lawes of Athens. Niloxenus then turning toward me, and speaking softly in mine care : I believe verily (quoth he) ô Diocles, that many things goe for currant and are believed, although they be untrueths, and many men there be who are delighted with the false rumors and finisher reports that goe of great and wise men, both which themfelves do devife, and also which they receive readily from others; as namely those be which are brought unto us as farre as into Aegypt, of Chilan, namely, that he should renounce all amitte and hospitalitie with Solon for mainteining this: That all lawes were mutable. A foolifh and ridiculous report is this (quoth I:) for if it were fo, Chilon should have fallen out with Lyenrgus, and condemned him, who together with his lawes, altered and changed the whole State of the 30 Lacedæmonians. Then Solon, after a little pause made, began to speake in this wife: For mine ownepart, I am of this minde, that a king or fovereigne prince can finde no meanes to make himselfe more glorious, than by turning his monarchie or absolute government into a democratie or popular state, in communicating his authority sovereigne indifferently to his subjects. In the second place spake Bias, and said: That a prince could not do better for his owne honour, than to be the first man that submitted himselfe to the positive lawes of his conntrey. After him opined Thales: I repute (quoth he) that prince and fovereigne fuler happie, who liveth to olde age, and dieth by a naturall death. Anachar sis inferred thus much more in the fourth place: If he be onely wife. With that faid Cleobulas in his turne: If he repose no confidence in any one about his person. Sixtly came Pittachus with his opinion, faying: If a prince could so nurture and schoole his subjects, that they should not feare him, but for his sake. And after him, in the last place, delivered Chilo this speech: That a prince ought to amuse his minde about no mortall and transitorie things, but meditate onely upon that which was eternall and immortall. Now when every one of these Sages had given out his mot, we requested of Periander, that he also would say somewhat for his part; but he with a countenance nothing mery and cheerefull. but composed to sadnesse and severitie: I will tell you (quoth he) what I thinke of all these sento tences thus delivered by these my lords; that they all in a maner be enough to fright a man who is of judgement and understanding, from all sovereigne rule and government. Then Aesope as one who ever loved to be croffe and finding faults: It were meet therefore (quoth he) that everie one of us should deale in this point apart and severally, lest in pretending to be counsellers unto princes, and make profession of friendship unto them, we become their accusers. Then Solon laying his hand upon his head, and fimiling withall: Thinke you not (quoth he) ô Aefope, that he maketh a ruler more reasonable and a tyrant more gracious and inclined to elemencie, who perswadeth him that it is simply better, not to rule, than to rule? And who is he (quoth Ac-(ope againe) that will believe you in this, rather than the very god himselfe who delivered unto vouthis sentence, by way of oracle:

Why (quoth Solon) Is there any man heareth at Athens now any more voices than of one Sergeant, and one fole magistrate, which is the Law ? notwithstanding, the citie hold of a popular State; but you Aefore are to deeply feene in hearing and understanding the voices of crowes and gaies, that you heare not wel and perfectly in the meane time your owne speech and language; for you that thinke according to the oracle of Apollo, that citie most happie which heareth the voice but of one, suppose notwithstanding that it is the grace of a feast, when all the guests therein met, may reason and discourse, yea and of every matter. True it is (quoth Aesope) for you have not yet fet downe a law, that houthold fervants fhould not be allowed wherewith to be drunke; 20 like as you have made one at Athens, forbidding fervants to make love or to be anointed drie, that is, without the baine. Solon began to laugh at this reply of his: and Cleodemus the Physician inferred thereupon: In mine opinion (quoth he) it is all one to anoint (as you fay) drie, and to talke freely when a man is well whitled and drenched with wine, for most delectable and pleafant is both the one and the other. Chilo taking hold of this speech; Why then (quoth he) so much the rather it behooveth to abstaine from it. Aesope rejoined againe; and verily Thales seemed to fay, that it is a meanes whereby a man shall verie quickly age and looke old. Hereat Periander began to take up a laughter and faid: Now truely Aefope, we are well enough ferved, and are woorthily punished according to our defert, in that we have suffered our selves to be carried away into other discourses and disputations, before wee have heard out all the rest of the con-40 tents in King Amasis letters, according as wee purposed in the beginning; and therefore good fir Niloxenus go on with that which followethin your letters missive, and make use of these personages heere affembled, whiles they bee all in place together. Now truely (quoth Niloxenue) in my conceit that demand of the Aethiopian, a man may well and properly fay to bee nothing else (but if I may use the wordes of Archilochus) a tewed or bruised whip: but King Amasis your host, in proposing of such questions is more gentle and civil; for hee propounded unto him these demands to bee answered: What thing in the whole world is eldeft or most ancient? What is the fairest? What the greatest? What most wise? What most common? Over and besides, What most profitable? What is most hurtfull? What most puissant? and What most easie? What (quoth Periander) did the Aethiopian prince answere to 50 these demands, & affoile them all? Will you see (quoth Niloxenus then) what answers he made? and after you have heard his answers, be you judge whether he satisfied them or no? for the king my mafter hath proceeded therin fo fincerely, that he would not for any thing in the world, be justly thought to cavill and carpe like a fycophant at the answers of another, and yet his care and endevour is, not to faile in reprooving that wherein one hath erred and is deceived: but I will from point to point recite unto you his answers. What is most ancient? Time (quoth he.) Whatmost wise? Trueth. What most beautifull? The light. What most common? Death. What most profitable? God. What most hurtfull? The Divell. What most mightie? Fortune. What most case? The thing that pleaseth. When these answers were read (ô Nicharchin) they all remained filent for a time: and then Thales asked of Niloxensu, whether King Amalis approved these solutions or no: Niloxenus answered, that some of them he allowed; but with others of them he rested not well contented: And yet (quoth Thales againe) there is not one of them all but deferveth great reprehension, for they doe everie one bewray much error and groffe ignorance; and to begin withall; How can it be held and maintained, that Time should be the eldest thing that is, considering that one part thereof is passed already; another present and a third yet to come? for the future time which is to followus, cannot choose but by all reason be efteemed yoonger than all men, or all things which are present. Againe, to thinke that veritie were wisedome, in my judgement is as much as if a man should say, that the cie and to the light is all one. Furthermore, if he reputed the light to be a faire thing (as no doubt it is) how happeneth it that he forgat the funne? Moreover, as touching his answers of God and the devils, they are verie audacious and dangerous. But concerning Fortune, there is no probalitie or likelihood of trueth therein ; for if the were fo powerfull and puissant (as he faith) how commeth it about that the turneth and changeth fo eafily as the doth? Neither is death the commonest thing in the world; for common it is not to the living. Burbecause it shall not be thought, that we can skill of naught, but reprooving and correcting others; let us conferred little our particular opinions and fentences in this behalfe with his: and if Wilexenss thinke fo good, Tam content to offer my selfe first, to answere unto these demaunds beforesaid, one after another. Now will I therfore declare unto you (Nicharchus) in order the interrogatories and answers, ac- 10 cording as they were propounded and delivered. What is most ancient? God (quoth Thales) for he never had beginning nor nativitie. What is greatest? Place; for as the world containest allthings elfe, so place containeth it. What is fairest? The world. And why ? because whatsoe ver is disposed in lively order, is a part thereof. What is wises? Time; for it hath found all things alreadic devifed, and will finde out all inventions hereafter. What is most common? Hope; for it remaineth still with them who have nothing else. What most profitable? Vertue; in that it makethall things commodious, according as they be used. What is most hurtfull? Vice; for it marrethall good things belides, where foever it is. What is most mightie? Necesfitie; for that onely is invincible. What is most easie? That which agreeth to nature; for even pleasures many times we do abandon and forsake. Now when all the companie had approprid 20 and commended highly the answers of Thales: These be questions in deed (quoth Cleodemus unto Niloxenus) meet for kings and princes, both to propose and also to associate : as for that barbarous king of Acthopia, who enjoined king Amasis to drinke up the sea, deserveth as short an answere as that was which Pittaeus made to king Alyattes, who when he demaunded somwhat of the Lesbians by his arrogant and proud letters, had no other answere returned him from Pittacm but this: That he should cate omions and hot bread upon which words Periander inferred and faid: I affure you Cleodemus, it hath bene the maner in old time among the ancient Greeks, to propose one unto another such questions as these. For we have heard by report, that in times pall, the most skilfull and excellent Poets which were in those daies, met at the funerals and obfequies of Amphidamus within the citie of Choleis: Now had this Amphidamus beene a man of 40 great honour in government of the common-weale in his country; who having put the Erettians to much trouble in those wars which they waged against those of Choleis, in the quarrell of Litantes, hapned to leefe his life at the last in a battell. And for that the curious verses which the faid poets provided and brought to be scanned of, were intricate and hard to be judged of by those who were chosen as judges of the doubtfull victorie; and besides the glorie of two renowmed concurrents, Homer and Hesiodus held the judges in great perplexitie, and shame to give their fentences as touching two fo famous personages, they grewe to suchas these questions in the end: and propounded one unto another as Lesches saith after this maner.

Now helpe me Muse for to endise
what things have never beene, Nor hencesorth whiles the world endures for ever shall be seene?
Unto which demand, Hespodus answered readily and extempore in this wise.
When seeds to win the prize, with sound of seet shall runne amaine,
And at the tombe of Jupiter,
their chariors breake in twaine.

For which cause especially it is reported he was so highly admired, that thereby he wonso the tre-sect of gold. And what difference (quoth Cleodemus) is there betweene these questions and the riddles put soorth by Eumetis? which haply are no more unseemely for her to devise in sport and mirth, and when she hath (as it were) twisted them, to propose unto dashes like herselfe, than for other women to delight for their passime, to busic their heads in, and working girdles of rissue, or knitting net-worke coises and cawles; but certeinly that men of wisedome and understanding should make any account thereof, were very ridiculous and a meere more kerie. At which speech of his it seemed that Eumetis was willing enough to have replied, and said somewhat unto him againe, but that maidenly modestic stated her; for her bloud was up, to and she blushed as red as skarlet all her face over: But Aesope taking her part as it were to revenge her quarrell: Nay were it not (quoth he) more ridiculous farre, not to bee able to solve such questions? and namely such a riddle as this, which she pursoorth unto us a little before supper:

Aman I faw, with helpe of fire, who set a peece of brasse, Fast to aman, so as it seem'd to him it sodred was.

Nowtellme, can you with all your curning fay what this should be? No iwis (quoth Cleademuncither meane I to beate my braines about the knowledge of it: And yet there is no man 20 (quoth he) knoweth this thing better, nor uleth it more than you; and if you denie it, I will call to witnesse your ventoses and cupping boxes. Heereat Cleodemus could not chuse but laugh: for there was not a physician in those daies that used cupping and boxing so much as he, and in regard that he practifed it fo much, this remedie or devife in phyficke was in no finall request and reputation. But Mne fiphilus the Athenian a familiar friend and zealous follower of Solon, began to speake in this wife unto Persander: Sir, if I might be so bold, I thinke it good, & my defire is, that the speeches and discourses of this good company, may not bee dealt among the rich and noble perfons onely who are heere in place, but parted equally and indifferently among them all, and go round like a cup of wine, as the manner is in democratic or flate of a citie, governed by the people: this I speake for that we who live in a popular common-wealth, 30 participate in nothing of all that which you have right now delivered as touching foveraigne rule of prince & king: we thinke it reason therefore that you would enter every one of you into a discourse of popular government, & deliver your several opinions upon the point, beginning first agains at Solon. To this motion they all agreed, whereupon Solon thus began to speake: As for you (ô Mne siphilus) like as all the other inhabitants of Ashens, you have heard heeretofore what mine opinion is concerning the government of a weale publike: and yet if it please to heare me now also, I say againe that in my judgement that citie is right well governed, and maintaineth best the popular estate and libertie, wherein those very persons who have not been wronged and oppreffed, do profecute the law upon an oppreffor and wrong doer, yea and feeke to punish him, no leffe than the partie himfelfe who hath fuffeined the injurie & outrage. After 40 him Bias opined thus: That the popular government was best, in which all the inhabitants seared the law as much as a rigorous tyrant. Then Thales followed in this maner: That he reputed fuch a common-wealth best ordered which had in it neither too wealthie, nor yet over poorecitizens. Next to him tooke Anacharsis his turne and delivered his minde in these words: That in his conceit that citie was right well governed wherein all other things being equally determined among the inhabitants, the better codition was measured by vertue, & the worse by vice. In the fifth place Cleobulus affirmed; That the policie of that popular city was fimplie best, the citizens whereof did more dread dishonor than the law. Then Fistaces in his course gave his opinion thus: That he accounted a State passing well governed in which wicked persons might not beare any authoritie but good men onely. Then Chilo when his turne 50 came; pronounced: That pollicie to excel al others when as the people gave greatest care unto the lawes, and least hearkened unto oratours. After them all Pertander in the last place gave his judgement, faying: That he reckoned that popular estate seemed to be best, which came neerest unto an aristocratic or regiment of a wise and noble Senate.

Now when this diffurtation was ended, I requested them to proceed farther, and to instruct us as touching economie or an housholde, how it ought to be ordered; for that sew men were called unto the government of cities and realmes, but every one of us had an house and familie of his owne to be governed: Not so (quoth Aesope, & therewith he laughed) if you reckon Anachar sis

Anachar fis in the number of us, for no house hath he of his owne, and (for sooth) he glorieth therein, that none he hath, faying: That he maketh his abode in a chariot, as (men fay) the fun doth, who is carried round about the world in his chaire, and one while goeth to this quarter, and another while to that quarter of the heaven: And even in this respect (quoth Anacharsis) the funne onely is free, or at least-wife more at libertie, and at his owne dispose, than any other of all the god's, commanding all, and not commanded of any; and therefore he reigneth in deed, and having the remes in his owne hand, conducteth his owne chariothimfelfe: but me thinks you never conceived and comprised the grandence and beautie of the funne, how excellent and admirable his chariotiss for otherwise you would never in bourd and by way of merry jest have compared it to ours: furthermore, it feemeth that you take an house to be these cloisters covered with tile, and walled with clay or earth; which is as much to fay, that a tortoife is the shell, and not the living creature which is therein: and therefore I nothing woonder that you moc. ked Solon upon a time, for that he having viewed the palace of king Crafus, richly furnished and fumptiously adorned, deemed not by and by the owner and lord thereof to be stately and hap. pily lodged; but defired first to see and behold the good parts that were within him, rather than the goods which were about him; and heerein it feemeth unto mee, that you have forgotten your owne tale of the fox, who being come to contest and debate with the leopard, whether of the twaine were befet with more colours and divers spots, required of the judge betweenethem. that he would not regard and confider fo much the outward painting of the skin, as the varietie of the spirit and soule within, for that he should finde the same bedight with a world of divers 10 spots; but you looke onely to the workemanship of cutters in stone, and of masons, esteeming that onely to be the house, and not that which is domesticall and within, to wit, children, wife, friends and fervirours, unto whom (being wife, fober and of good conditions) the father of the familie, and housholder, communicating and imparting that which he hath (fay he were within a birds neaft or in an emmets hole) may avouch that he dwelleth in a good and bleffed house. Lo what mine answere is to Aesope, as also for my part, what collation and dole I contribute unto Diocles; now for the rest of you, let every man conferre (as reason is) to it, what he thinketh good, and utter his mind. Then Solon: That house (in mine opinion) is best, the goods wherein, were neither gotten by unjust and indirect meanes, nor bred any feare, suspition and doubt for the keeping, ne yet drew repentance for the spending of them. After him Bias opined: That 10 he held the familie belt, the mafter whereof was of himfelfe the fame man within, as (for feare of the law) abroad. Then Thales: Wherein the mafter may live at most ease and greatest leasure. And Chobulus: Wherein there be more persons that love, than feare the master. Next delivered Pittaeus his minde, and faid: That he tooke that to be the best house, wherein there wasno defire of superfluities, nor misse of necessaries. After him came Chilo with his sentence: That an house ought as much as is possible, to resemble acitie or state governed by the absolute commandement of a king; adding moreover, that which Lyeurgus answered sometimes unto one who advised him to establish in the citie Sparta the popular government : Beginne (quoth he) first thy selfe to ordeine in thine owne house a popular estate, where every one may be as greata lord and mafter as another. After this speech also finished, Eumet is and Melissa went footh, 40 Then Periander taking a great cup in his hand, dranke to Chilon, and Chilon likewise in orderto Biss. Then Ardalus stood up, & addressing his speech unto Aesope: Wil not you neither (quoth he) let the cup come unto us, seeing that they there send it round about from hand to handamong them, as if it were the can of Bathyeles, and will not impart and let it passe to others? Then (quoth Solon) neither is this cup (fo farre as I fee) any whit popular, standing as it hath done long time before Solon onely. Whereat Pittaeus calling unto Mnesiphilus by name: Whatis the reason (quoth he) that Solon drinketh nor, but goeth against his owne Poems, wherein himfelfe hath written these verses:

Then Anachar fis helped him out, and spake in his behalfe, saying: He doth it (Pittaem) for feare of you and that severe and rigourous law of yours, by which you have ordeined, that who soever by occasion of drunkennesse chances the commit a fault, what-ever it be, shall incurre a double penalty, and be fined twife as much as if he had done it whiles he was sober. Then Pittaem: Yet neverthelesse (quoth he) you carie your selfe so proudly and distainfully in mockage of this my statute, that both the last yere not long fince, being at my brother Lybu his house, whe you were drunke, you demanded to have the prize therof & called for the garland & crown. And why not (quoth Anacharfis) confidering there was proposed a reward for the victory to him that drunke moftand if I were overcharged with wine & drunk with the first, should not I chalenge by right the prize & reward of victory? or els tell me what other end is there of drinking luftily, than to be drunke? Pittaess hereat began to laugh; & than Aefope told fuch a tale as this: The wolfe (quoth he)perceiving upon a time the shepheards to eate a mutton within their cottage, approched unto them and faid; Oh what a stirre and outcrie would you have made at us if I had done that which you doe? Hecreat Chilon: Aefope (quoth he) hath well revenged himfelfe now (whofe mouth ere-while we ftopped that he had not a word to fay) seeing at this present as he doth, that others had taken the answere out of Mnesiphilus his mouth, and not given him libertie to fpeake, being demaunded the question why Solon dranke not? and like it was that he should have answered inhis behalfe. Then Mnesiphilus rendered this reason and faid; That he wish well Solon was of this opinion, that the proper worke of every art and facultie, as well divine as humane, was rather the effect and thing by it wrought, than that whereby it was effected; and the end thereof rather than the meanes tending thereto: for fo I suppose that a weaver will say, that his worke is to make a web for a mantle, a coat or fuch a robe, and not to spoole, winde quils, lay his warpe, shoot oufe, or raise and let fall the weights and stones hanging to the loome: Alfo that the worke of a fmith is to foder iron, or to give the temper of steele for the edge of an 20 axe headrather than any other thing needfull to fuch an effect, to wit, the kindling of coles and fetting them on fire, or the preparing of any stone-grit serving for the former purpose, Semblably, a carpenter or mason emploied in architecture, would much more complaine and finde fault with us, if we should say, that neither a ship nor an house were their worke, but the boaring of holes in timber with an auger or the tempring of morter. In like manner would the muses take exceeding great indignation, and not without good cause, if wee should thinke that their workes were either harpes, lutes, pipes, and fuch instruments of musicke: and not the reforming and inflitution of folks maners, the dulcing and appealing of their passions who delight in long, harmonie, and muficall accord. And even so we must confesse that the worke of Venus is not carnall companie and medling of two bodies; nor of Bacchus, wine-bibbing and drun-30 kennelle, but rather mirth and folace, affectionate love, mutuallamitie, conversation, and samiliarity one with another, which are procured unto us thereby: for these be the works indeed which Plato calleth divine and heavenly: and these he faith that he defired and pursued when he grew aged and was well stept in yeeres. For I affure you Venue is the work-mistresse of mutuall concord, folace and benevolence betweene men and women, mingling and melting (as it were) together with the bodies their foules also, by the meanes of pleasure: Bacchus likewise in many who before had no great familiaritie together, nor any knowledge and acquaintance to speake of, by foftning and moisting the hardnes of their maners, and that by the meanes of wine (like as fire worketh iron to be gentle and pliable) hath engendred a beginning of commixtion and incorporation one with another. True it is I must needs say, that when such personages are met 40 and affembled together, as Periander hath hither invited, there is no need either of cup or flagon for to bring them acquainted: for the mules fetting in mids before them a cup of fobriety, to wit, their conference and speech, wherein there is not onely store of pleasure and delight, but also of erudition, learning, and serious matter, doe excite, drench, enlarge and spread abroad by the meanes of discourse and talke, the amiable joy of such guests, suffring for the most part the wine pot or flagon to stand still above the cup or goblet: a thing that Hesidiedus forbad exprefly among fuch as could skillbetter to carrouse than to discourse. And whereas we reade thus in Homer,

For how soever other Greeks that we are their have so long, Doedrinke about their measure just allowed them among:
Your cap I see stands ever full,
no gage to you is set,
But hartie draughts you may carrouse, no manthere ut o let.

Me thinks I heare and understand heereby that our auncients called this manner of drinking one to another by way of challenge & provocation Aungin, according to the tearme that Homer Fr give the

givethit, and so every man dranke a certaine measure in order: yea and afterwards (like as Alax did) ech one divided portions of flesh to his next fellow sitting at the boord: Now when Man siphilus had thus faid : Cher sias the poet, whom lately Periander had quit of certeine imputations charged upon him, and who was newly returned into his favour at the earnest request of chilon I would gladly know (quoth he) whether Jupiter gage the rest of the gods with a certeine mea. fure and thint of drinking, (for that they use to drinke one to another when they dine and fup with him) like as Agamemnon dealt by the princes of the Greeks when they were at his table? Then Cleodemus: If it be true (quoth he) friend Cherfus as you and other poets doe fay, that certeine doves flying hardly and with great difficultie over the rocks called Planeta, bring unto Inviter that celestials meat named Ambrosia; thinke you not likewise that he had much adoo 10 to get the heavenly drinke Nectar, and that he had but small store thereof, whereby he could not chuse but make spare and give of it to every one according to measure? Yes verily (quoth Cher (i.as) and peradventure they had it distributed equally among them: but fince we are fallen againe into a fresh discourse of house-keeping, which of you will goe on and finish therest which remaineth to be faid thereof? Then Cleebules inferred this speech and faid: As for wife men indeed, the law (quoth he) hath given them a prefeript measure; but as touching fooles, I will tell you a tale which I heard my mother once relate unto a brother of mine: The time was (quoth the) that the moone praied her mother to make her a peticoate fit & proportionable for her body: VVhy, how is it possible (quoth her mother) that I thould knit or weave one to save about thee confidering that I fee thee one while full, another while croiffant or in the waine, & to pointed with tips of horns, & fortime againe halferound? Even fo (friend Cher sias) a manismor able to fet downe a definit & just proportion of substance & goods to mainteine an houseumo a foolish or a naughtie person; for such a one hath need one while of this thing, and another while of that, according to his divers defires & variable events & occasions, much like to Aslow dog, who as he faith, in the winter feafon thrinking together, & lying round for cold wherewith he is ready to be frozen and sterved, is of mind to build himselfe an house: but in summer when helies fleeping stretched out at length, he thinkes himselfe to be very great, and supposeth ita needeleffe thing to builde an house, and besides no small peece of worke to set up a frame bigge and large enough to receive his bodie. See you not likewife ô Chersia, that these kinde of folke will bee thought nowe but fmall and little, and restraine themselves into a 10 narrow compasse, proposing forsooth a streight and laconicall manner of life; but anon all at once they will bee aloft, and if they may not have all that they fee, and poffession onely the estate of private persons, but also of kings and princes, they are undone for ever, and complaine as if they were pined and readie to die for hunger: at which words Cher fias heldhis peace. But Cleodemus then began and faid: Howbeit, we all fee (quoth he) that you my mafters your felves who are fage and wife, have your goods and possessions unequally dealt among you, if a man would go about to measure and count them. True indeed my good friend (answered Cleobulus againe) and this is because the law (like unto a good weaver or knitter) hath given unto everie one of us that which is fit, futable, and convenient for us; and even fo your you felfelit, in your direction for diet, nourishment, and purging of your patients by reason, after the pre-40 feription (as it were) of law, do not fet them downe receits and orders all alike, but fuch as are agreeable and meete for everie one. upon this speech Ardalus replied, saying: How then? Is there alaw that commaundeth Epimenides here our familiar friend and Solons hofte, to forbeare all other viands, and by taking onely in his mouth a little of the composition called Alimon, which hath vertue to put-by hunger (which pleafant electuarie or confection he maketh himfelfe) to continue a wholeday without meate and drinke, without dinner and supper. This speech mooved attention and filence in the whole companie there in place: onely Thales after a jocund and merrie manner answered: That Epimenides did well and wisely not to busie and trouble himselfe about grinding corne, baking meale, or dreffing his owne meates (as Pittacia did): for my felfe (quoth he) whiles I was in the Isle Lesbos, heard a wench of a forrein countrey, 50 as the turned the querne about, fing thus, Grind mil, Grind; for even Pittacus the king of Great Mitylena, is a miller and grindeth. But Solon faid; I woonder much Ardalus, that you never read in Hesiodus his Poeme, the receit of the regiment of that mans diet: for he was the first who gave unto Epimenides the feeds of this nourishment, and taught him to search:

The banquet of the seven Sages.

In Millowes and in Alphodels. which grow on everie ground: What use and profit manifold, for mantheremay be found. Why thinke you (quoth Perlander) that Hefiodus had any fuch meaning in that verfe; and not rather (as he is alwaics a great praifer of sparing and frugalitie) that he exhorted us unto the simpleft viands, as to those which were most pleasant: for furely the Mallow is good to cate, and the Afphodell ftem verie fweete in tafte: as for those which the Physicians came Alima and Adiple. that is to fay, putting-by hunger and thirft; I heare fay and understand that they be medicines and not meats, and that among other ingredients that go to their making, they receive home and a certaine barbarous kinde of cheefe, befides many other feeds which are eafic enough to come by : for how elfe should not (as we read in Hesiodus)

Theoxe and mule cease both to draw in yoke. if need there were of fo great provision? But I marvell much Solon, at your hofte, that having but lately celebrated a folemne feast of Purification among the Delians, he observed not how they themselves brought with great ceremonie into their temple, the enfignes and monuments of the ancient and primitive nourithment of mankinde? and namely, among other things very common, and which grow of themselves without mans hand, the Mallow and the Asphodell: which two hearbs (it is verie probable and like) that Hespodius also recommended unto us for their simplicitie & profit. Not in those regards onely (quoth Anacharsis) but for that they both the one as well as the other, are commended as especiall hearbs for the health of man. True 20 (quoth Cleodemus) and great reason you have so to say: for Hestodus was well seene in Physicke, as may appeare by that which he hath written to exactly and skilfully of dier, and the regiment of our feeding, of the manner of tempering wine, of the vertue and goodnesse of water, the use of baines, bathes and women, of the time of keeping companie with them, and of the positure of infants in the wombe, and when they thould be borne. But to judge aright, Aefope had more reason than Epimenides to avow himselfe the disciple of Hesiodia, for the talke which the hauke had with the nighting all, gave unto Aesope the first beginning of his faire, variable, and many tongued learning of his. But willing I am to heare Solon; for verie like it is, that he having lived and converfed fo familiarly many yeeres together with Epimenides at Athens, asked of him oftentimes and knew full well upon what accident or occasion, and for what purpose he chose 30 and followed this strait course of life. And what need was there (quoth Solon) to demaund that of him? for all the world knoweth, and most evident it is, that as the greatest and most soveraigne good of man, is to have no need at all of nouriture; so the next unto it is to require the leaft nourishment that is: Not so (quoth Cleodemus if I may be so bold as to speake my mind: For I do not thinke that the foveraigne good of man is to eate nothing, especially when the table is laide and furnished with meat; for to take away the viands set thereupon, is as much as to fubvert the altar and facrifice unto the gods, and to overthrow the amity and hospitalitie among men. And like as Thales faith: That if the earth were taken out of the world, there must of necesfitte enfue a generall confusion of all things; even so we may fay, put downe the boord, you doe as much as ruinate the whole house; for with it you abolish fire which keepeth the house; the 40 tutelar-deitie of Vesta; the amiable custome of drinking together out of one boll and cup; the laudable manner of feafting friends; the kindfashion of entertaining strangers, and all reciprocall hospitalitie, and mutuall usage of guests; which be the principalland most courteous conversations that can bee devised among men one with another; and to speake in summe more truely; farewell then, all the fweetnes of humane life and focietie, in case there be allowed any retrait at all, solace and passion apart from businesse and affaires, whereof the need of sustenance and the preparation thereto belonging, yeeldeth most matter, and affoordeth the greatest part. Moreover, the mischiese hereof would reach as far as to agriculture, and that were great pity, considering that if husbandrie were laid downe with the decay & ruine therof, there would ensue againe a rude & deformed face of the whole earth, as being neglected, & not clenfed from fruit-50 leffe trees, bushes & weeds, and overflowed with the inundation of waters & rivers running our of their chanels to and fro without order, for want of good husbandrie and the diligent hand of man: over and befides, perish there shall with it, all arts and handicrafts which the table mainteineth and keepeth in traine, giving unto them their foundation & matter, in fuch fort as they will come all to nothing, if you take it away:nay more than that; What will become of religion and worship done to the gods? for furely, men will exhibit but little or none honour at all unto the Sunne, and much leffe unto the Moone, as having nought els from them but their light & heat onely: and who will ever cause an altar to be reared and furnished as it ought to be, to Jupiter, for fending downe feafonable raine, or to Ceres the patronesse of agriculture, or to Nep. tune the protectour of trees and plants? who will ever-after offer any factifices unto them? how shall Bacchus be the authour of joy and mirth, if we have no more any need of that pleasant li. quor of wine which he giveth? what shall we facrifice? what shall wee powre upon the altars? what oblations shall we offer unto the gods? and whereof shall wee present any first fruits? In one word, this abuse would bring with it a totall subversion and generall consusion of the best and chiefest things. True it is, that to follow all kinde of pleasures, and in every maner were bruitishnesse; and even so to flie them all, and in no wife to embrace them, were no lesse follie and fortifhnesse. The soule may well enough enjoy other pleasures and delights, which are better and more noble; but the bodie can finde none at all more harmlesse and honest, to content to it selfe with, than to cat and drinke, whereby it is sed and nourished; a thing that there is no man but he both knoweth and acknowledgeth; in regard whereof, men use to set and spread their tables in publicke and open places, for to cat and drinke together in the broad day-light; whereas to take the pleasure of Venus, they wait for the night, and feeke all the darknesse they can, suppo. fing it to be as beaftly and fhameleffe to do the one in publike and common, as not at all to doe the other but forbeare it altogether. When Cleodemus herewith brake off, and ended his speech. I followed in the fame traine, and feconded his words in this wife: But you overpasse one thing befides, namely, that by this meanes, together with our food and nourithment, we banith and drive away all fleepe: now if there be no fleepe, there will be no dreames, & fo by confequence, we may bid farewell to a most ancient kinde of oracle and divination which we have by them, 20 Over and besides, our life will be alwaies after one fashion, and to no purpose, but in vaine shall the foule be clad (as a man would fay) within the bodie, feeing that the greatest number and the principall parts of the faid bodie were made and framed by nature for to serve as instruments of nourithment; as for example, the tongue, the teeth, the stornacke and the liver, &c. for thereis nothing in the whole structure and composition of mans body, that either lieth still & idle, or is ordeined for any other use; infomuch as who foever hath no need of food, needeth not the body alfo; which is as much to fay, as that hee standeth in no need of himselfe; for every one of us doth confift aswell of bodie as soule. Thus much may serve for my part, to have spoken in the defence of the bellie; now if Solon or any other have ought to fay and object against it, by way of accusation, ready we are and disposed to give him the hearing. Yes mary (quoth Solon) un- 20 leffe we would be reputed of leffe judgement and understanding than the Aegyptians, who ripping open the belly of a dead bodie, Thew it unto the funne, and cast away the guts and entrails together with the paunch, into a running river; but afterwards, when they have thus rid away the garbage, and cleanfed the corps, the rest they imbaulme and be carefull of: for to say a trueth, these inwards, be the very pollution and inquination of the flesh, and to speake properly, the very hell of our bodie; for to they fay, that the place of the damned is full of (I wot not what) horrible rivers and winds confused together with fire and dead carcases. For no creature living, is nourished with any food that liveth; but we (in killing thosecreatures which have foules, or in destroying plants, herbs and fruits which participate likewise of life, inasmuch as we see them to be nourifhed and grow) do evill, and finne very grievoully, foras much as what soever is transmu-40 ted and turned into another, loseth that nature which it had before, and wholly is corrupted, for to become nourishment to another. As for abstinence from eating of flesh, as (by report) Orpheus did in olde time, is rather a subtile shift of Sophistrie, than any perfect shunning or forbearing of those since which are committed in delicious fare and superfluous gormandize; but the onely way to avoid enormitie in this behalfe, and the meanes to keepe a mans felfe perfeetly pure and undefiled, according to the absolute rule of justice, is to be content with that which is within himselfe, and to live without defire of any thing without, whatsoever: but he that is by God framed to that nature and condition, that without the dammage and hurt of another, he can not possibly preserve his owne being and safetie; unto him he hath given a nature which will continually move him to injustice, & to commit wrong. Were it not then (my good 50 friend Diocles) very meet and requifit to cut off together with injustice and finfulnesse, the belly, stomacke and liver, yea, and all other such parts which give unto us the appetite of nothing in the world that is honest, but resemble partly the instruments of a cooke, and vessels of the kitchin, to wit, chopping knives, cawdrons, pots and kettles, and in part are like unto the utenfils of a mill, of a chimney, oven or furnace, or fuch tooles as serve either to digge pits, or be used in bake-house and pastrie? for to say a trueth, you may plainely see and perceive that the soule in many men lieth hidden within the bodie, as it were in a certeine mil-house, turning round continually (as one would fay) about a querne, in purface after the necessities thereof, even as we here, cre-while perceived by experience in our owne felves, when we neither faw nor heard, nor regarded one another; but every one of us inclining forward and stouping downe to our victuals ferved our owne need & looked to our food, but now when the tables be taken up, as you fee, having chaplets of flowers on our heads, we take delight in deviling together, & holding honest discourses, we rejoice in fellowship & good company, we passe the time away in ease & repose, being once come to that point, that we have no more any defire or need of nourithment: It then we could hold us fo flill, & continue while we live in this prefent flate, fo that we neither feared wat & poverty, nor yet knew what was covetousnes & desire of riches, should we not lead (thinke to you) a bleffed and eafie life, as having leifure to converfe together and joy in our mutual focietie? For know wel this, that looking after the needles superfluities immediately ensuch upon the appetite and defire of things necessarie. But whereas Cleobulus is of this opinion, that needes there must be meat & food, to the end that their might be tables and standing cups upon them, that men may drinke one to another, also that they might facrifice to dame Ceres & her daughter Proferpina: another man may as well and truely fay: There ought to be watres and battels, to the end that we may have wals and fortifications for our cities, arcenals for our navy, and armories also, that for the killing of an hundred enemies, wee might in chankes giving to the gods offer factifices thereupon, called Hecatomphonia, according as they fay, there is a thatute importing so much among the Messenians. Or all one it were as if some other should be angrie or 20 offended with health, faying: It were great pitie, if because there are none sicke, any more there should be no use of easie beds, fine linner sheets, soft pillowes and coverings, nor any need to facrifice unto Aefeulapius or other gods, to divert and turne away our maladies; and fo the art of phylick, with all the tooles, instruments, drugs and medicines belonging thereto, be cast aside and neglected, without honor and regard. For what ods is there betweene the one and the other, confidering that we receive food as a medicine to cure our hunger? Befides, all they that keepe a certaine diet, are faid to cure themselves, using this remedie, not as a pleasure delightsome and defireable, but as meanes to content and fatisfic nature. For furely we may reckon more paines than pleasures, that come unto a man by his feeding; or to speake more truely, the pleafure of eating hath but a little place, and continueth as fmall a while in mans bodie; but the trou-30 ble and difficultie which it hath in providing and preparing, with how many fhamefull inconveniences and painefull travels it peftereth us, what should I relate unto you? for I suppose, that in regard of all these vexations, Homer took upon him to proove, that the gods died not, by this argument, that they received no food:

For neither ease they bread in heaven, nor pleafant wine to drinke: Thus bloodlesse since they be, we them immortall name and thinke.

As if by these verses he would give us to understand, that our eating and drinking is not onely the meanes of our life, but also the cause of our death: for thereupon a number of diseases take 40 hold of our bodies, which are gathered within the fame, and proceed no leffe from fulneffe than emptineffe, and many times we have more adoe to concoct, confume, and diffipate our foode, than we had to get and provide it. And much like as if the daughters of Danaus were in doubt what to do, and what life to lead, or how to be emploied, after they were delivered and freed once from their fervile taske imposed upon them, for to fill their tunne boared full of holes; even so doubt we (in case we were come to this passe, as to cease from stuffing and cramming this upsatiable fiesh of ours, which will never say Ho, with all forts of viands that land or sea may affoord) what we should do? and al because for want of experience & knowledge what things be good & honest, we love all our life time to seeke for to be provided of necessaries : and like as they who have beene flaves a long time, after they come once to be delivered from fervitude, do of them-30 felves and for themselves the verie same services, which they were woont to performe for their masters, when they were bound; even so, the soule taketh now great paines and travel to feed the bodie, but if once the might be difpatched and difcharged from this yoke of bondage, no fooner shall she finde her selfe free and at libertie, but she will nourish and regard herselfe, she will have an eie then, to the knowledge of the truth, and nothing shall plucke her away, or divert and withdraw her from it. Thus much ô Niebarchue as touching those points which were then delivered concerning nourishment. But before that Solon had fully finished his speech, Gorgias the brother of Periander coured into the place, being newly returned from Tenarin, whither he had beene fent before by occasion of (I wot not what) oracles, for to carrie thither certaine oblations unto Neptune, and to doe facrifice unto him; we all faluted him and welcomed him home; but Perlander his brother comming toward and kiffed him, caufing him afterwards to fit downe by himselse upon the bed-side, where hee made relation unto him alone of certaine newes, Perunder gave good eare unto his brother, and shewed by his countenance that he was diverfly affected, and verie paffionate upon that which he heard him to report; and by his vifage it feemed one while that he forrowed and grieved, another while that he was angrie and of fended; he made semblant for a time, as if he distrusted and would not give credit unto him. and anon againe he seemed as much to woonder and stand in admiration; in the end he laughed and faid unto us: Veric gladly would I out of hand recount unto you the tidings which my to brother hath told me, but hardly dare I, neither will I be over halfie fo to doe, for feare of Thales, whom I have heard otherwise to say: That well we might make report of newes that be probable and like to be true; but touching things impossible, we ought altogether for to hold our peace. Hereupon Bias: But as wife a faying (quoth he) was this of Thales: That as we ought not to beleeve our enemies in things that be credible, fo we are not to diferedit our friends even in those things that are incredible. For mine owne part, I thinke verily by this speech of his, that hee tooke those for his enemies who were leawd and foolish, and reputed for friends such as were good and wife. I would advise you therefore (ô Gergias) that either you would declare your newes here before all this companie, or rather reduce that narration which you come with all to pronounce aloude unto us, into those new kinde of verses which are called Dithyrambes, 10 Then Gorgius fet tale on end and began to speake in this maner: After we had facrificed for the space of three dates together, and the last day performed in a generall assembly all the night a feltivall folemnitie with plaies and dances along the ftrond by the fea fide, as the moone flone at full upon the sea, without any winde in the world flirring at all, so as there was a gentle gene rall calme, and every thing still and quiet; behold we might discover a farre off a certeine monon or trouble in the fea, bending toward a promontorie or cape, and as it approached neutr thereto, raifed withall a little fcumme, and that with a great noife by reason of the agitation of the water and waves that it made in such fort, as that all the companie of us woondered what it might be, and ran toward the place whereunto it feemed to make way and bend the course for to arrive; but before that we could by any conjecture geffe what it was, (the swiftnesse thereof 30 was fuch) we might evidently deferie with our eie a number of dolphins, some swimming round about it thicke together, others directing the whole troupe toward the easiest and gentlest landing place of the banke, and some there were againe that followed behinde as it were in the rereward: now in the mids of all this troupe there appeared above the water I wot not what lumpe or maffe of a bodie floting aloft, which we could neither differne nor devife what it was, untill fuch time as the faid dolphins all close together and shooting themselves into the shore, landed upon the banke a man both alive and alfo mooving; which done they returned toward the rocke or promontoric aforefaid, leaping and dauncing wantonly as it should seeme for we ric joy more than they did before: which the greatest part of our company (quoth Gorgian) see ing, were fo greatly attaid, that they fled from the fea amaine all amazed; my felfe with fome 40 few others tooke better heart and approached nere, where we found that it was Arion the harper, who of himselfe tolde to us his name, and easie he was otherwise to be knowne, for that he had the same apparell which he was wont to weare when he plaied in publike place upon his hape: So we tooke him up incontinently and brought him into a tent (for harme he had none in the world, fave only that by reason of the swiftnesse & violent force of his cariage he was wearie and feemed ready to faint) where we heard from his mouth a strange tale, and to all men incredible, unleffe it were to us who faw the end and iffue thereof. For this Arion reported unto us, that having beene of long time refolved to returne out of Italy, and so much the rather because Periander had written unto him for to make haste & come away upon the first opportunity presented to him of a Cotinthian carricke that made faile fro thence, he presently embarked, but no soo 50 ner were they come into the broad and open sea, and that with a gentle gale of winde, but he perceived that the mariners conspired together for to take away his life, whereof the pilot himselfe also of the same ship gave him advertisement secretly, namely, that they intended to put the thing in execution that night. Arion thus finding himselfe destitute of all succour, and not knowing what to doe; it came into his minde as it were by a certeine heavenly and divine infpiration (whiles hee had yet some time to live) for to adorne his bodie with those ornaments which he accustomed to put on when he was to play upon his harpe for a prize in some frequent Theater; to the end that the fame habit might ferve him for his funerall weed now at his death; and withall to fing a dolefull fong and lamentable dittie before his departure out of this life, and not to shew himselfe in this case lesse generous than the swans : being therefore thus arraied and decked accordingly, and doing the marriners to wit before hand, that he had a wondeffulldefire to chaunta fonctor hymne unto Apollo Pythius, for the fatetic of himselfe, the thip and all those fellow passengers who were within it, he stood upright on his feet in the poope cloleto the thip fide, and after he had founded a certaine invocation or praier to the fea-gods, he chanted the canticle beforefaid, and as he was in the mids of his fong, the funne went downe and feemed to fettle within the fea, and with that they began to discover Peloponnesus. Then the 10 marriners who could no longer flay nor tarrie for the darke night, came toward for to kill him; when he saw their naked swords drawen, and beheld the foresaid Pilot how he covered his face, because he would not see so vilanous a spectacle, he cast himselfe over thip-boord, and leapt as farre into the seafrom the ship as he could; but before that his whole bodie was under the water, the dolphins made hafte, and from beneath were readie to beare him up for finking. Full of feare and perturbation of spirit hee was at first, insonuch as being associed thereat, hee wish not what it might be; but within a while after, perceiving that he was carried at eafe, and feeing a great flote of dolphins environing gently round about him; and that they fucceeded and feconded one another by turnes, for to take the charge of carrying him, as if it had beene a fervice imposed upon themail, and whereunto they were necessarily obliged; and seeing besides that 20 the carrike was a good way behind (by which he gathered that he went apace, and was carried a way with great celerity:) He was not (quoth Gorgias) so fearful of death, or defirous otherwise to live, as hee had an ambitious defire to arrive once at the haven of fafetic, to the ende that the world might know that he stood in the grace and favour of the gods, and that he reposed an affured beliefe and firme affiance in them, beholding as he did the skie full of flarres, the moone arifing pure and cleere with exceeding brightnesse, and the whole sea about him smooth and caline; but that the course of these dolphins traced out a certaine way and path, so that hee thought thus within himselfe, that the divine justice had not one cie alone, but as many cies as there were starres in the heaven, and that God beheld all about what soever was done both by fea and land: Which cogitations and thoughts of mind (quoth he) mightily ftrengthe-30 ned and fulfained my bodie, which otherwise was readie to faint and yeeld with travell and wearinefle: finally, when the dolphins were come as farre as to the great promontoric of Tenarus, fo high and fteepe, they were veric warie and careful that they ran not upon it, but turned gently at one fide, and fwom behind it a long the coast, as if they would have conducted a barke fafe and found, to a fure bay and landing place, whereby he perceived evidently that carried he was thus by the guidance of the divine providence. After that Arion (faid Gorgias) had made all this discourse unto us, I inquired of him, where he thought that the ship above said inteded to arrive. At Corinth (quoth he) without all doubt, but it will be very late first, for it being toward evening when I leapt into the fea, I suppose that I was carried upon the dolphins backs no lesse than a course of five hundred furlongs, and no sooner was I from ship-board, but there insued present-40 ly a great calme at fea. Moreover, Gorgias faid: That he having learned the names aswell of the fhip-mafter as the pilot, and withall knowen what badge or enfigne the fhip carried, made out certaine pinnaces, and those manned with souldiours, for to observe what creeks, commodious baies, and landing places there were upon the faid coast; but as for Arion, Gorgias conveied him secretly with him, for searc less if the mariners should have had any advertisement of his deliverie and fafetie, they might flie away and escape: But as God would have it, every thing fell out so, as we might see (quoth Gorgias) the very immediat hand of the divine power; for at one and the same instant that I arrived here, I had intelligence also that the said thip was fallen into the hands of those fouldiors whom I set out; and so the mariners and passengers within it were taken all prisoners. Hereupon Periander commanded Gorgias presently to arise to apprehend 50 them, and lay them up fast in close prison, where no person might have accesse unto them, or certifie them that Arion was alive and fafe. Then Aelope : Mocke on now (quoth he) at my gaies and crowes that talke and tell tales, when you fee that dolphins also can in this wife play their youthfull parts, and atchieve fuch proweffes. Nay (quoth I then) we are able to report, Mejope, another narration like to this, which hath bene fet downe in writing, and received for currant and good these thousand yeeres passed and more, even from the daies of Ino and Athamas. Then Solon taking occasion of speech by these words: Yea, but these matters, ô Discles (quoth he) concerne the gods more neerely, and furpaffe our puiffance; but as for that which befell to Hefodus, was a meere humane accident and not impertinent unto us, for I suppose you have heard the historic tolde. No I assure you (quoth I:) But woorth it is the hearing (quoth Solon againe.) And thus by report it was. A certaine Milesian with whom as it should seeme Heliodus had familiar acquaintance, in fo much as they lodged, eat and drunke together ordinarily in the citic of Lorres kept their hofts daughter fecretly, and abused her body, so as in the end he was taken with the manner. Now was Hefiodus suspected to have beene privie to him of this vilannie from the verie beginning; yea and to have kept the doore and affifted him in concealing the fame, whereas indeed he was in no fault at all, nor culpable any way; howbeit, by means of false suspitions and finister surmizes of people, hee incurred much anger and was hardly thought of, neither could be avoide the unjust imputations of the world: for the brethren of to the young damofell lay in ambush for him neere unto a wood about Loeri, set upon and slew him outright together with his fervant or page Troilus, who tended upon him. After this murther committed, and their bodies cast into the sea, it chanced that the corps of Trailing being carried foorth into the river Daphnus, refted upon a rocke environed and dashed round about with the water, and the fame not far from the fea, which rocke thereupon tooke his name, and is fo called at this day. But the dead bodie of Hesiodus, immediately from the land was received by a float or troupe of Dolphins, and by them carried as farre as to the capes Rhion and Molychria. It fortuned at the verie fame time that the citizens of Locri, held a folemne affembly and celebrated festivall facrifices, called Rhia, which they performe even at this daie also in the verie fame place with great magnificence and state: this corps being espied floating toward them, 20 (you may wel thinke) canfed all the company there to marvell not a little, who thereupon ranne all to the thore, and taking knowledge that it was the corps of Hestodus, because it seemed stell killed, they laid all other bufineffe apart & with all speed, sent about and made inquisition of this murther, by reason of the great renowme and name that went of Hesiudus: and this they sollowed with fuch diligence, that quickly they found out the murtherers, whom after they were apprehended, they threw alive headlong prefently into the fea, drowned them, and razed their house. Now was the corps of Hesiodus enterred neere unto the said Nemeium; howbeit, sew ftrangers there be that know of this his fepulcher, for concealed of purpose it is, by reason of the Orchonenians who made fearch for it (by report) and were definous by the appointment of certaine oracles to take up his reliques, and burie them in their countrey. If then the Dolphins be 30 fo kind and lovingly affected to the dead, much more probable it is, that they be willing and readie to helpe those who are alive, especially if they be drawen and allured by the found of the pipes, fluits or other harmonic: for who is there of us all that knoweth not how these creatures are delighted in fong, following and fwimming along those vessels where they heare musicke, as taking great pleafure in the fongs and muficall inftruments of those passengers, who do sing or play in a faire and calme feafon: also they are not a little pleased to see young children swimming & they joy and strive to be douffing, badling, & diving together with them: and therefore provided it is by an unwritten law, as touching their fecuritie, that they foould not be hurt; by vertue whereof none doe fish for them, no nor doe them any harme, unlesse haply when they chance to be taken in any nets, they hinder the taking of other fifthes, or otherwise hurt them, 40 and then beaten they are and corrected gently for it, like as little children who have done amilie and made a fault. And here I call to minde what I have heard recounted for certaintie of the inhabitants of Lesbos, that in times past within their countrey, there was a young maiden faved by a Dolphin, from perill of being drowned in the fea: but for that Pittaeus should know this much better, it were more reason that he himselfe reported it. True it is indeed (quoth Pittaeus) the tale is verie notorious and related by many. For there was an answere given by oracleto those founders, who first peopled Lesbos; that when in failing upon the sea they arrived at a rock called Meffog wan, that is to fay, Mediterranean, they should cast into the sea for Neptune abull, but for dame Amphitrite and the Nymphs Nereides a virgin alive. Now seven principall conductors & kings there were of that company which were to inhabit there, and Echelaus made the 50 eight, expressly named by the oracle for the planting of a colony, and he as yet a batcheler & unmaried. Now when the other feven, who had daughters mariageable, & yet unwedded, call lots among themselves whose daughter should be offered (as is before said) it fell out so, that the lot light upon the daughter of Smintheus; her therfore they arraied with rich robes, & adorned with coftly jewels of gold for that purpose, and being come to the place appointed, after they had made their praiers and oraifons accordingly, as in fuch a case, and were now at the verie point to throw her into the sea; a certaine young man, one of the passengers in the ship, of a gentle nature and good disposition (as it appeared) whose name was Enalus, being enamoured of the faid yong damofell, entred prefently into a refolution to fuccor her in this extremitic, although hee faw well that it was in manner unpossible, and embracing her fast about the middle, he call himselfe and her together into the fea: and even then there ran a rumor, although without any certaine ground or author; howbeit beleeved by many of the armie, that both of them were caried to land and faved alive: but afterwards (by report) the faid Enalus was feen in the ifle Lesbos. who made relation, that he and shee both were mounted upon dolphins backes, and so carried fafe to the firme land without any danger. I could rehearfe other strange narrations belonging hereto, more marvellous than these, able as well to ravish with admiration, as to affect with deto lectation the minds of any that shall heare them; but hard it is to averre them all for true, and to bring proofe thereof, namely: That when there arose a mightie huge billow of water about the island like a rocke, so as no men durst approch nere unto the sea, Enalus only came thither and anumber of Polype fifhes, or poulpes followed after, and accompanied him to the temple of Neptune, where the biggeft of them brought unto Enalus, a ftone which he tooke and dedicated there in memoriall of this miracle; which stone we call Ei to this day. But in summe (quoth he) if a manknew well the difference betweene impossible and unusuall, and could distinguish betweene that which is contrarie to the order or course of nature, and the common opinion of men, in not beleeving too rashly, nor discrediting a thing too easily, he might observe wel from time to time your rule ô Chilon, [Nothing overmuch] which you ordeine to be kept. After him 20 spake Anachar sis, saying: That is not to be wondered at, that the good lieft and greatest matters in the world were done by the will and providence of God, confidering that according to the good and wife opinion of Thales, there is in all the chiefe and principall parts thereof a certeine foule: for as the organ and instrument of the foule is the body; fo the instrument of God is the foule: and like as the body hath many motions of the owne, but the greater part of them, and namely those which are most noble, proceed from the soule; even so the soule likewise doth worke some of her operations by her owne instinct, but in others she yeeldeth herselfe to be ordered, turned, managed and directed by God, as it pleafeth him to use her, being indeed of all instruments the most meet and handsome: for it were a very strange and absurd thing, that wind, water, clouds & raine, should be Gods instruments, by meanes wherof he nourisheth and main-30 teineth many creatures, and whereby he destroieth and overthroweth as many; and that he should use the ministerie of no living creatures in any worke of his: Reason it is yet and probable, that feeing fuch creatures depend wholy upon the puissance and omnipotencie of God, that they should serve al his motions, yea and obey his wils and second his purposes, more than bowes are accommodate to the Scythians, and harpes or hauthoies to the Greekes. After this speechthe poet Chersias made mention of many others who had beene miraculously and beyond all hope & expectation faved from death, and among the reft he gave instance of Cypfelus the father of Periander, whom being but a yoong babe and infant new borne, certeine bloudie murderers were fent to kill, and upon the fight of him, for verie pittie turned away and forbare to commit fo bloudy afact; but afterwards bethinking themselves, and repenting such soolish 40 compassion, they returned backe agains to seeke him out but could not finde him, for that his mother had hidden him within a little corne flasket or twiggen hamper, called in Greek Cyp/ele: in remembrance whereof Cypfelus afterwards when he was a man dedicated a chappell within the temple of Apollo in Delphos, as believing how at that time hee had been emiraculously preserved, and by the hand of God kept from crying, which might have bewraied him to the murderers. Then Pittaew addressing his speech to Persander faid thus: Chersias hath done me a great pleasure to mention this chapell or cell; for many a time desirous I was to know of you what should be the meaning of those frogs which are seene graven round about the foot of the palme tree therein; and what they did concerne either the faid God Apollo, or the man himselfe who built and dedicated the faid house. And when Periander willed him to aske Chersias that 50 question, who wist well enough what it was, for that he was with Cypfelus at the dedication thereof 3 Chersias smiled and said: I will not expound the mysteric thereof, unlesse I may know first of them that be heere, what is meant by these olde said sawes; Nothing too much. Know thy felfe: and that other mot, (which hath caused some to continue single and unmaried, others to forbeare fureti-ship, and many to be distrustfull, to be mute and filent) to wit, Give thy word and pay: Be furety, and be fure of a shrewd turne. And what need is there quoth Pittacias that we should interpret and declare these sentences, considering you so greatly praise the sables that Descript hath composed, which show the substance of every one? Aesope answered: So faith Chersias indeed when he is disposed to jest and be merry with me: but when he speaketh in good earnest, he affirment that Homer was the sirst author of these sentences, saying that Homer knew himselfe well enough, who advancing forward to set upon other captaines of the Greeks, Refused well and wifely for to fight,

With Ajax, some of Telamon that knight.

He faith moreover, that use fer approach and commended this fentence, Nothing too much; when he admonished Diomedes in these tearnes:

Sir Diomede, prasse not me overmuch

Ne yet dispraise I lo ve no doings such.

And as for furcti-thip, others are of opinion that he condemneth it as a leawd, naughty, and to dangerous thing in these words

Taste oftentimes for their kind heart much infortunity.

But this Poet Chersus here saith: That the fiend Ate, which is as much to say as Plague or Infortunitie, was by Jupiter stung downe from heaven to earth, for that she was present at the caution or warrantise which he interposed as touching the nativitie of Hercules, whereby Jupiter was circumvented and overtaken. Then Solon: Seeing it is so (quoth he) I am of this minde, that we should give eare and credit to the most wise Poet Homer, whose counsell this is:

Since that the night comes on apace, and hath surprised us, Full meet it is her to obey, and end our speeches thus.

After we have therefore given thanks in powring out wine and offering it to the Muses, Negture and Amphirite, let us (if you thinke so good) end this our affembly and banquet. Thus Nieurehus this our mery meeting brake up, and was for that time dissolved.

The Summarie.

Trannie in any publike government, be it of prince, seignourie or people, as it is daugerous and det estable; so we are no lesse to seare anarchie, and the horrible consusion of those States where every one is a lord of master. The wise man said very wel: That a people or citie destitute of government, is necre to ruine; and publike assaires prosper well, when there be store of good counsellers. And on the other side, experience sheweth that humane societic can not stand without magistrates, the mainteiners of lawes of good order, which be the nerves or snewes, she cords and props of our life and conversation one with mother. But if there be any way in the world slipperie, it is that of the management of State assaires, by 50 reason of the leawanesse of some whom I may call Sage sooles, who runne by heaps after publike offices, not suffering men of honour to enter into them, as searing to be afterwards ranged and ordered by the sone of since then that ambition is a mortall plague in the mind and underslanding of him who would advance himselfe by crooked and indirect meanes, it behoweve ho not he contrary side, that those who have a sincere assection to serve in publike place, take heed that they be not discouraged, although other whiles they be kept under and put downe by such persons as by good right ought to serve, and not command. To holde therefore some meane in this case, between mounting up unto wain-glory, and salling imo cowardife, Plutarch for to content and fatisfie a friend of his, greeth good inflructions to every manshat entrethintothe managing of State affaires: and in the first place he requireth at his hands a good will, free from vanitic and lightnesse, void of avarice, and delivered from ambition and envie: afterwards , his advice is, that be endevour to know shofe well, whom he must governe, for to acquis him well in his owne durie, in case he be inducted unto any high degree, in reforming himselfe and being furnified with a good confcience, knowledge & eloquence, proper instruments for to go thorow all difficulties. This done, he teacheth a States manto manage well his owne words, also what way he ought to take for the entrance into the conduct of his weightic affaires; what friends he is to chuse, and how he is to demeane himselfe aswell with them as his enomies: afterwards, he discusseth and handleth 10 this question, to wis, Whether such a person as he whom he hathrepresented, ought to intermeddle and deale in all offices, and resolveth that he ought to manage none but that which is of greatest importance. From this be proceedes be to fleake of that discretion which is requisit for the ranging and bringing into order of flanderers and enemics; and withall, with what maner of affaires a politician should buse and implay himselfe, and where to his spirit and minde is to tend; wishing above all, that he should enterteine the amitie of other lords and rulers, who are able to further and advance the publike good; and in the meane time to be well advised that he doe not goe about to save, or ruinate rather, his owne countrey by forren meanes. Heerenpon he discourseth of those maladies whereumo common wealths be subject, and holdeth this: That if there doe arife any mischiefe, it ought to be repressed, kept downe and cured at home. Confequently, he flewethunto a magistrate the maner of conversing with his col-20 leques or companions in office : and after he had commended those who walke singly & goroundly and plainly to worke, hee entreth very pretily into a discourse arising from the precedents, namely, astouching policie and good government, declaring wherein it doth confift : and fo toucheth in a word, the ductie of good jubjects in a state well ruled. Which done, hereturnesh to his former purpose, and makethmention of certeine cases, wherein a magistrate may accommodate and frame himselfe to his owne people: alfowhat persons he ought to use & employ for assistance in the execution of important affaires, and from what vices he is to keepe himselfe pure and cleane; how he ought to ofteeme and regard true honour, standing upon two points: the one, that he do trust and relie upon himselfe: the other, that he bewell beloved of the people, unto whom he ought to shew himselfe liberall. To this above said, there is joined accreeine discretion to be used in the largestes of magistrates to their subjects (athing much 30 practifed in oldetime, and in these daies turned cleane against the haire) proposing all in one traine, the true and most expedite way how to gaine the hearts of men, to which no prince nor governour shall ever attaine unleffe he be fuch an one as our authorit doth describe: and representing on the other side, the ridiculous and unhappie condition of ambitious persons, and other such as thirst after shamefull olorie, whose name serveth for nought els but to play with the least peties in a common-wealth. And for a finall conclusion, he treateth of seditions and civill warres; namely, how a good magistrate ought to cary himselfetherein; what a care he should have to quench with all speed such fire, and keepe his subjects in good unitie and concord, and how he should easily come thereto, which is the very closing up of the booke, inriched with notable arguments, sentences, similitudes and examples, for those especially, who have the command of others, and yet are besides, to appeare before the throne of their so vereigne, 40 the examination, triall and fearefull judgement of whom, they can not avoid.

INSTRVCTIONS FOR THEM that manage affaires of State.

F therebe any speech in the world, sir Menemachus, unto which a

Of all the Greekes there is no man, Who blame the se words or gaines are, Bus yet for sooth you say not all, Nor come are so the finiall.

certes, it is in the case of those Philosophers, who exhort sufficiently in generall tearmes, to undertake the affaires of State and publike government: but they teach us not how, nor give us precepts and directions thereto; who (me thinks) may well be resembled to those, who fauffe and draw out the wicke of a lampe, but they powre no oyle into it, Seeing then that you

you have upon verie good reason deliberated and resolved to meddle in the State affaires of your countrey, and desire according to the nobilitie of your house and native countrey, from whence you are descended, and considering that you are not yet come to that maturitie of yeeres, as to have seene evident. It the life of a wise man and true Philosopher in matters of government, or viewed his carriage and demeanor in State affaires; ne yet to bee a spectator of worthie and goodly examples practised in deed and effect, and not discoursed upon in word onely; in which regards you have requested me earnessly to give unto you certaine rules, precepts, and advertisements for your better knowledge & instruction, how you ought to behave your selfe in this behalfe; me thought I could not with any honessie denic your request: but my desire & wish rather is, that whatsoever I have collected to this purpose, may be answerable both to the ardent zeale of your intention, and also to the willing forwardness of mine affection; and verily to gratise your minde, I have accompanied these precepts with many faire and beautifull examples.

First and formost therefore, let this be laid for a fure ground & strong foundation, That who. foever mindeth to be a States man, and to mannage affaires of policie, bring with him a good intent, mooved by reason and judgement, and in no wise arising upon any blind passion, or defire of vaine-glorie, or jealousie and emulation of another, or finally upon default of other occupations: for like as there be some who spend most of their time in the common-hall or market 20 place, although they have nothing there to do, because they have no good thing at home tobe emploied about; even fo, you shall have diverse men that thrust themselves into civill and publike affaires, for that they have no private busines of their owne, worth tending, and so they use policie as a course of life, or rather a pastime and recreation. Others there be againe, who being by fome fortune or chance arrived, or rather cast upon the management of common-weale, and having thereof enough & (as it were) their bellies full, can not with any eafe withdraw and retire themselves, when they are once in, resembling those for all the world, who being embarked in fome vessel take the seasonly for to be rocked & shaken therin a little for their exercise; but after they be caried by a gale of winde into the deepe, when their heads once begin to turne, and their ftomacks ficke and readie to cast, they looke out backe toward the land, but for all that, forced 30 they be to tarrie still on ship-boord, and to frame themselves to their present fortune.

Their lovely joies and pleasures are then gon, To walke upon the batches gaily dight, With rowers seats in foist or gallion, Whiles sea is calme and weather faire and light: Which yeelds prospect most pleasant so their sight, And bearts content, so cut the waves aright.

And these are they, who as much as any, or rather most of all, discredit the thing, in that they repent and be much discontented with their choise; namely, when in stead of glorie which they promifed themselves, they fall into infamie, and whereas they looked to be feared of others by 40 the meanes of their great credit and authoritie, they bee carried into a world of affaires full of troubles and dangers. But he who commeth to the government of weale publike, and beginneth to enter upon it by found judgement and true discourse of reason, as a most honest vocation in it felfe, and most agreeable to his estate and qualitie, will no whit be discouraged or dismaied at any of these accidents, nor ever change his resolution. For a man is not to take upon him the managent of State affaires, with intent to negotiate and trafficke there, or to make a gainefull trade and occupation thereof to himselfe, like as in times past at Athens, Stratocles and Dromoelidas, with those about them, for to go unto their golden harvest (for so by way of jest and merrie speech they called the Tribunall seat, and publike pulpit where orations were made unto the people) no nor upon any fit of a fudden paffion that commeth upon him, as Cajus Gracebus did 50 at Rome sometime, who at the verie time when his brothers troubles were hot, and his death fresh and new, retired for a while out of the way, and betooke himselfe to a private course of life, farre remote from the common-wealth affaires; but afterwardes, being suddenly enkindled and inflamed againe with choler, upon certaine outragious dealings and opprobrious wordes given him by fome, would needes in all the hafte upon a spleene, rush into the government of State, and quickly had his handes full of bufineffes, and his ambitious humour was soone sed and satisfied: but then when as he would with all his heart have withdrawen himfelfe, changed his life, and taken his repofe, he could not by any meanes lay downe his authoritie and puffance (to fuch greatnes it was growen) but was killed before he could bring that about. As for these who compasse and dresse themselves as plaiers for to act upon the scatfold in some great Theater, and champions to contend with other concurrents, or else aime at vaine-glorie; it can not be, but they must needs repent of that which they have done, especially when they once see that they must ferve those whom they thought they were woorthie to rule, or that they can not chuse but displease them, whom they were destrous to gratific and content. And verily this is my conceit of such, that they runne headlong upon policie and State matters, like unto those who by some misdeventure, and sooner than they looked for, be fallen thereof, and wish they had never come there, but were out againe, whereas they, who considerately, and upon good deliberation goe downe into the said pit, carrie themselves soberly with quietnes and contentment of spirit, they are vexed, offended and difinated at nothing, as who at their fust entrie, put on a resolute minde, proposing unto themselves vertue and their dutie onely, and intending no other thing for to be the scop and end of all their actions.

Thus when as men have well grounded their choise in themselves, untill it be so furely setled & confirmed, that unnerh or hardly it can be altered or changed; then they ought to bendall their wits to the confideration and knowledge of the nature, of their citizens and fubjects, whole charge they have undertaken, or at least wife of that disposition, which being compounded (as to it were) of them all, appeareth most and carrieth greatest sway among them. For at the verie first and all at once, to goe about a change and to order and to reforme the nature of a whole comminaltie, were an enterprise, neither easte to be effected nor fase to bee practifed : as being a thing that requireth long time and great authoritie and power. But doe they must as wine doth in our bodies; which at the beginning is moistned (as it were) and overcome by the nature of him who drunke it, but afterwards by gentle warming his ftomacke, and by little and little entring into his veines, it becommeth of ftrength to affect the drinker, and make a change and alteration in him; femblably, a wife politician and governor, untill fuch time as he hath wonne by the confidence reposed in him, and the good reputation that he hath gotten, so much authority among the people, that he is not able to rule and lead them at his pleafure, will accommodate 30 and apply himselfe to their manners and fashions such as he sinder them, and thereby conjecture and confider their humors, untill he know wherein they take pleafure, whereto they are inclined, and what it is, wherewith they will foonest be lead and carried away. As for example, the Athenians as they are given to be hastic and cholcricke; so they be as soone turned to pitte and mercy; more willing to entertaine a fuspition quickly, than to have patience and at leasure to be enformed, and take certaine knowledge of a thing; and as they be more enclined and readie to fuccour base persons and of low condition; so they love, embrace and esteeme merrie words and pleafant conceits, delivered in game and laughter, more than fage and ferious fentences; they are best pleased when they heare themselves praised, and least offended againe with those that flour and mocke them; terrible they are and dread, to their verie rulers and magistrates, and 40 yet courteous and milde enough, even to the pardoning of their professed enemies. The nature of the Carthaginian people is farre otherwise, bitter, fell, fierce, sterne and full of revenge; obsequious to their betters and superiours; churlish and imperious over their inferiours and underlings; in feare most base and cowardly; in anger most cruell; firme and constant in their resolution, and where they have taken a pitch; hard to be mooved with any sports, pastimes, and jolitie; and in one word, rough & untractable. You should not have seene these fellowes, if Clean had requested them sitting in counsell (for a smuch as he had sacrificed unto the gods, and was minded to feast some strangers that were his friends, and come to visit him) to put off their affembly to another day; to arife laughing and clapping their hands for joy; nor, if whiles Alcibiades was a making unto them a folemne oration, a qualle should have escaped from under 50 his gowne and gotten away, would they have runne after her away to catch her, and given her to him againe? nay they would have fallen all upon him; they would have killed them both in the place, as if they had contemned them and made fooles of them: confidering that the banished captaine Hanne, because in the campe and armie when he marched, he used a lion as a sumpter horseto carrie some of his baggage; saying, that this savoured strongly of a man that affected tyrannic. Neither do I thinke that the Thebanes could ever have contained themselves, but have opened the letters of their enemies, if they had come into their hands: like as the Athenians did, who having furprized king Philips posts and curriers would never suffer one of their letters miffive to be broke open, which had the superscription to Queene Olympias my wise; nor discover the love-secrets and merrie conceits passing from an husband being absent in another countrey, and writing to his wise. Neither doe I thinke, that the Athenians on the other side, would have endured and borne with patience the proude spirit and scornefull contempt of Eparmondas, who would not make answere to an imputation charged against him, before the bodie of the people of Thebes, but arose out of the Theater where the people was assembled, and thorow them all went his way, and departed into the place of publike exercises. The Lacedamonians likewise would never have put up the insolent behaviour and mockerie of Stratesles, who having perswaded the Athenians to sacrifice unto the gods, in token of thankesgiving for a victorie, as if they had beene conquerours, and afterwards upon the certaine newes of adeleas to ture and overthrow received, when he saw the people highly offended and displeased with him, demaunded of them what injurie he had done them, if by his meanes they had beene metrie and feasted three daies together?

As for the flatterers that belong to Princes courts, they play by their lords and mallers. as those fowlers do, who catch their birds by a pipe counterfeiting their voices; for even fo they, to winde and infinuate themselves into the favour of kings and princes, doe resemble them for all the world, and by this devise entrap and deceive them. But for a good governour of a State, it is not meet and convenient that he should imitate the nature and the manners of the people under his government; but to know them and to make use of those meanes to every particular person, by which he knoweth that he may best win and gaine them to him: for the igno- 20 rance and want of skill in this behalfe, namely, how to handle men according to their humours, bringeth with it all disorders, and is the cause of irregular enormities, as well in popular governments, as among minnions and favorites of princes. Now after that a ruler hath gotten authoritie and credit once among the people, then ought he to strive and labour, for to reforme their nature and conditions if they be faultie; then is he by little and little to lead their gently (asit were) by land unto that which is better: for a most painefull and difficult thing it is to change and alter a multitude all at once: and to bring this about the better, he ought first to begin with himselse, and to amend the misdemeanours and disorders in his owne life and manners, knowing that he is to live from thence foorth (as it were) in open Theater, where he may be seene and viewed on everie fide. Now if haply it be an hard matter for a man to free his owne mind from 10 all forts of vices at once, yet at least wise he is to cut-off, and put away those that bee most apparent and notorious to the eies of the world. For you have heard (I am fure) how Themistoeles when hee minded to enter upon the mannaging of State-matters, weaned himselfe from fuch companie wherein hee did nothing but drinke, daunce, revell and make good cheere; and when he fell to fitting up late and watching at his booke, to fasting and studying hard, hee was woont to fay to his familiars, that the Trophea of Miltindes would not fuffer him to fleepe and take his reft. Pericles in like case altered his fashions in the whole course and maner of his life, in his person, in his sober and grave going, in his affable and courteous speech, shewing alwaies a staied and settled countenance, holding his hand ever-more under his robe, and never putting it foorth, and not going abroad to any place in the citie, but onely to the tribunall and 40 pulpit for publike orations, or els to the counsell house. For it is not an easie matter to weld and manage a multitude of people, neither are they to be caught of every one, and taken with their fafetie in the catching; but a gracious and gainfull piece of worke it were, if a man may bring it thus much about, that like unto suspicious & crastie wilde beasts, they be not affrighted nor let a madding at that which they heare and fee, but gently fuffer themselves to be handled, and be apt to receive instruction; and therefore this would not in any wife be neglected, neither are such to have a small regard to their owne life and maners, but they ought to studie and labor as much as possibly they can, that the same be without all touch and reproch : for that they who take in hand the government of publike affaires, are not to give account, nor to answere for that onely which they either fay or doe in publike, but they are fearched narrowly into, and manie a 50 curious eie there is upon them at their boord; much listening after that which passeth in their beds; great fifting and feanning of their marriages and their behaviour in wedlocke, and in one word all that ever they doe privately, whether it be in jest or in good carnest. For what need we write of Alcibiades, who being a man of action and execution, as famous and renowmed a captaine as any one in his time, and having borne himselfe alwaies invincible and inferiour to none in the managing of the publike State, yet notwithstanding ended his daies wretchedly, by meanes of his diffolute loofenes and outragious demeanour, in his private life and convertation athome, infomuch as he bereft his owne countrey of the benefit they might have had by his other good parts and commendable qualities, even by his intemperance and fumptuous superfluitie in expence? Those of Athens found fault with Cimon, because he had a care to have good wine: and the Romaines finding no other thing in Scipio to reproove, blamed him for that hee lovedhis bed too well: the ill-willers of Pompey the Great, having observed in him that otherwhiles he scratched his head with one finger, reprochedhim for it. For like as a little freckle, mole or pendant-wert in the face of man or woman is more offensive, than blacke and blew marks, than scars or maimes in all the rest of the bodie; even so, small and light faults otherwise of themselves, thew great in the lives of Princes, and those who have the government of the 10 weale-publike in their hands, and that in regard of an opinion imprinted in the minds of men touching the estate of governous and magistrates, esteeming it a great thing, and that it ought to be pure and cleere from all faults and imperfections. And therefore deserved Juliu Drusus, a noble Senatour and great ruler in Rome to be highly praised, in that, when one of his workemen promifed him (if he fo would) to devife and contrive his house so, that whereas his neighbours overlooked him, and faw into many parts thereof, they should have no place therein exposed to their view and discoverie, and that this translating and alteration thereof should cost him but five talents: Nay (quoth he) thou shalt have tentalents, and make mine house so, that it may bee feene into on everie fide, to the end that all the citie may both fee and know how I live; for in trueth he was a grave, wife, honest, and comely personage. But peradventure it is not so neces-20 sarie that a house lie so open as to be looked into on all sides: for the people have cies to pierce and enter into the verie bottom of governours manners, of their counfels, actions, and lives, which a man would thinke to be most covert & fecret, & no leffe quick-fighted are they in their private carriage, as in that which they fee them doe, and heare them speake in publike; loving fome with a kinde of admiration, and hating others in difdainfull and contemptuous manner. What? will some one say, do not some cities otherwhiles love to be ruled by governors, whom they know to be diffolute and difordinate in their manner of life ? Yes, I believe it verie well. And so for sooth, we see some women when they are with childe, long many times to cate grit of flones, and they who are flomacke-ficke, and have a peevifh appetite, defire falt-fifh, and fuch other naughtic meates; but within a while after, when the fit is once past, they reject, refuse and 20 lothethetame; even to many States and Comminalties often-times upon an infolencie, wantonnesse and disordinate desire, or for default of better governours, be served with those that come first, and they care not with whom, notwithstanding they have them in contempt and detestation, but afterwards they are very well content when such speeches goe of them, as Plate a comicall Poet in one of his Comedies inferreth to be spoken by the people themselves:

Agyrtius els 1'll captaint chuse anon.

And againe in another place, he bringeth in the people calling for a bason and a seather for to provoke vomit, saying thus:

Assuming headit keepes and feedeth now, Amaladie most foule, I do avow.

And the people of Rome, at what time as Car boavouched a thing, and bound it by a great oath, yeadand the famewith a curfe and exectation, if it were not for yet for all that all with one voice fware aloud to the contrary, and protefled that they would not beleeve him. Also at Lacedemon, when one Demosthenessa wicked and diffolute person, had delivered his opinion and advice, verie well sitting and behoovefull to the matter in question, the people rejected it; but the Ephori having chosen one of their Ancients and honourable counsellers of Estate, willed him to speak 50 to the same point and the like effect; which was as much as if they had taken it out of one soule and slittine vessels, and all to please and content the people and multitude so effectuall is for the government of an Estate, the affured perswasion of the honors is of a personage, and as forcible likewise is the contrarie. I write not thus to this end, that we should inegled the grace of eloquence and the powerfull skill of well-speaking, as if all should lie upon vertue, and nothing els, but that we are to thinke, that Rhetoricall speech and brave utterance is not the thing alone which perswadeth the people, but that it is a good helpe, and doth cooperate in perswasson, so that we may in some fort correct and a. mend that sentence of Menander:

The honest life of him that speakes in place, And not his tongue, doth credit win and grace.

For life and language both ought to concurre, unlesse haply one would say, That it is the pilot onely that governeth the ship, and not the helme; and the rider alone turneth the horse head. and not the reines or bridle; semblably, that the science of policie and government of wealepublike useth maners and not eloquence, as an helme or bridle, to manage, direct and governea whole citie, which is (according to Plate) a creature (as one would say) most easie to be turned. fo that it be conducted and guided, as it were, in the poope : for feeing that those great kings, to the formes of Jupiter (as Homer calleth them) fet out and puffe up their magnificent part, with long robes of purple, with scepters in their hands, with a guard of squires and pensioners about their persons, with whom they were environed on everie side, yea, and with the oracles of the gods in their favour, subjecting unto their obeisance (by this outward venerable shew) the com. mon fort, and imprinting an opinion that they are in greater state than men; and yet for all this, were defirous to learne how to speake wisely, and not carelesse and negligent to winne grace by good speech,

Who doth upon great kings attend,

And makes them ay more reverend. with her perswasive grace and vertue dulcing and appealing the violent mood and siercenesses the people. Seeing (I fay) that mightie princes be furnished with so many helps and meanes; is it possible that a private person, with a simple robe and popular habit, taking upon him to weld and rule a whole citie or State, should ever be able to effect his purpose, namely, to rame and range into order an unruly multitude, unlesse he have eloquence to aide him in this businesse, for to perswade and bring them to the bent of his bow? for mine owne part, I thinke No. Assor the masters and captaines of gallies and other ships, they have other officers under them, as 10 their boat-swaines, to give knowledge what they would have to be done; but a good governout of State ought to have within himfelfe the skill and knowledge of the steeres-man to sit at steme and guide the helme, and besides that, good speech also to make known his will and pleasure, to the end that he need not at all the voice of another, nor beforced to fay as Iphierates did when he was overcome and braved out by the eloquent words of Aristophon: My adversaries plaier acteth better than mine, but furely my play is much better than theirs: and that he have notneed often-times to have in his mouth these verses of Euripides:

Would God the feed and race of mortall men Were speechlesse cleane, or could not speake words ten. these: As also of these:

Oh God, that mens affaires and causes all Required no words, and for no speech did call, That oratours, whose tongues do plead so hard, Were not emploied, nor in fo good regard.

d, orthographic d, orthographic (consisting compatible (consistency consistency compatible For these sentences perhaps might give leave to some Alcamenes, Nesiots, and Ictines, or such maner of people, who live by their handy-worke, gettheir living by the sweat of their browes, and are past all hope to atteine unto any perfection of eloquence, to flie there-fro: as it is reported of two Architects or great Masons at Athens sometimes, who came in question for their skill, whether of the twaine was more fufficient to make a great fabricke and publike piece of worke; the one, who could speake very well and expresse his minde with varietie and eleganicie so of words, pronounced a premeditate oration as touching the frame and building thereof; which he did to well, that he moved the whole affembly therewith; the other, who was more skilfill in Architecture, & the better workman by far, but one that could not deliver his mind fo eloquents ly, when he came before the people, faid no more but thus: My masters of Athens, that which this man here hath faid, I will do. And verily fuch good fellowes as these, acknowledge no other goddesse or patronesse than Minervathe artisan, surnamed Ergane, and who as Sophocles faith:

But the minister or prophet to Minerwa Polias, that is to fay, the protectresse of cities, and to Themis or Justice the protectresse of counsell:

Who of mens counsels president.

Diffolves, or holds them resident. he (I say) having but one instrument to use and occupie, which is his speech, by forming and 10 fashioning some things to his owne mould, and others which he findeth untoward and not pliable to the desseine of his worke (as if they were knurres and knots in timber, or flawes and rifings in yron) by foftning, polithing and making plaine and finoothe, embelifheth in the end a whole citie. By this meanes the Common-wealth of Pericles, in name and outward appear rance being popular, was in trueth and effect a principality and regall State, governed by one man the principall person of the citie: and what was it that did the deed ? furely the force and power of his eloquence: for at the fame time there lived Cimon, a good man, Fphialtes also and Thursdides, who being one day demanded by Archidamus the king of the Lacedamonians, whether hee or Pericles wreftled better : That were (quoth hee) very hard to fay; for when in wreftling I beare him downe to the ground, he is by his words able to perswade the standers by 20 and beholders, that he is not fallen, and so goeth cleere away with it. And verily, this gift of his brought not onely to him honour & glorie, but also safetie to the whole citie; which being by him ruled and perswaded, preserved and mainteined full well the wealth and estate which it had ofher owne, and forbare to defire the conquest of any other: whereas poore Wicias, although hee had the fame good meaning and intention, yet because he wanted that perswafive facultie with his smooth tongue and eloquent speech, like unto a gentle bit, when he went about to bridle & restraine the covetous desire of the people, could not compasse it, but mauger and in fpight of his heart was overfwaied, caried away, and haled by the very necke into Sicilie; fuch was the violence of the people. An olde faid faw it is, and a true proverbe: That it is not good holding of a wolfe by the eares; but furely of a city or State, a man must principally take 30 hold by the cares; and not as some doe, who are not sufficiently exercised nor well seene in the feat of eloquence, fearch other abfurd and foolish handles to catch hold by, for to win and draw the people unto them: for divers you shall have, who thinke to draw and leade the multitude by the belly, in making great feafts and banqueting them; others by the purfe, in giving them largeffes of filver; fome by the eie, in exhibiting unto them goodly fights of plaies, games, warlike dances and combats of fencers at the utterance; which devices are not to draw and leade the people gently, but to catch them rather cunningly: for the drawing or leading of a multitude, is properly to perswade them by force of eloquence; whereas the other allurements and enticements refemble very well the baits that are laied for to take brute and wilde beafts, or the fodder that herd-men use to feed them with. Since then it is so, that the chiefe instrument of a wise and 40 fage governour, is his speech, this principall care would be had, that the same be not too much painted and fet out, as if he were some young gallant that defired to shew his eloquence in a Theater and frequent affembly of a great faire or market, composing his oration as a chaplet of flowers with the most beautifull, sweet and pleasant phrases or tearmes that he can chuse; neither ought the same to be so painfully studied and premeditated as that oration of Demosthenes was, which Pytheas faid (by way of reproch) that it smelled of lamp-oile; nor full of over-much fophisticall curiofitie of enthymemes and arguments too witty and subtile; nor yet with clauses and periods exactly measured to the rule and compasse. But like as Musicians are defirous that in touching and stroke of their strings there should appeare a sweet and kinde affection, and not a rude beating; even so in the speech of a sage ruler, whether it be in giving counsell or decree-50 ing any thing, there ought not to be seene the attificiall cunning of an Oratour, nor any curious affection; neither must it in any wife tend to his owne praise, as if he had spoken learnedly, formally, tubully, wittily and with precise respect and distinctions : let it be full rather of naturall affection without arte, of true heart and magnanimitie, of franke and fatherly remonstrance, as may become the father of his countrey, full of forecast and providence, of a good mind and understanding, carefull of the common-weale, having together with honest and comely dignitie a lovely grace that is attractive, confifting of grave tearmes, pertinent reasons, and proper sentences, and the same fignificant and persuasive. For in trueth the oration and stile of a Statesman and governour admitteth in comparison of a lawier or advocate pleading at the batte in court, more sententious speeches, histories, sables and metaphors, which do then move and affect the multitude most, when the speaker knoweth how to use them with measure, in time and place convenient; like as he did, who said: My masters, see that you make not Greece one-cied: (speaking of the citie of Athens, when they were about to destroy it) and according as Demades also did, when he said, that he sat at sterne to governe, not a ship, but the shipwracke of a citie and Commonwealth: Semblably Archibechus in saying,

Let not the stone of Tantalus This isle alwaies hang over thus.

Likewise Pericles when he gaue advice and commanded to take away th.: eie-fore of the haven 10 Pirean, meaning thereby the little ifle Aegina. In the same maner Phocion speaking of the victoric atchieved by Generall Leosthenes, said thus; The stadium or short race of this watre is good, but I sear (quoth he) the doliehus thereof; that is to say, the afterclaps and length there. of. In summe, as speech standing somewhat of hautinesse, grauitic, and greatnesse, is more besitting a gouernour of State: and for example heereof, go no surther than to the orations of Demosthenes penned against king Philip, and among other speeches, set downe by Thurydidin, that which was delivered by the Ephorus Sthenelaidas: also that of king Archidamus, in the citie Platese: likewise the oration of Pericles after that great pestilence at Athens. As for those long sermons, cariying a great traine of sentences and continued periods after them, which Theopompus, Ephorus and Anaximenes, bring in to be pronounced by captaines unto their 20 sold of the same they be armed and stand arranged in battell-ray, a man may say of such as the Poer did.

Over and befides; true it is that a man of government may otherwhiles give a taunt and nipping scoffe, he may cast out also amerrie jest to moove laughter, and namely, if it be to rebuke, chaftife, yea and to ouippe one and take him vp for his good, after a modest maner, and noto touch him too neere and wound him in honour and credite to his difgrace, with a kinde of fcurrilitie. But about all it may befeeme him thus to doe when he is provoked thereunto, and is driven to replie and give one for another by way of exchange : for to begin first in that fort, 20 and to come prepared with fuch premeditate stuffe, is more befitting a pleasant or common jefter, who would make the companie laugh, befides that, it carieth also an opinion of a malicious and spitefull minde: and such are the biting frumpes and broad jests of Cicero and Cato the elder; likewise of one Euxithem a familiar and disciple of Aristotle; for these many times began first to scoffe and taunt; but when a man never doth it but by way of reply or rejoinder, the fodaine occasion giveth him pardon to be revenged, and withall such requitals carie the greater grace with them. Thus dealt Demosthenes by one who was deepely suspected to be a theefe: for when he would feeme to twit Demosthenes by his watching and fitting up all night at his booke for to endite and write: I wot well (quoth Demostheres) that I trouble and hinder thee very much with keeping my candle or lampe burning all night long. Also when he answe. 40 red Demades, who cried out aloud: Demosthepes would correct me (as much to fay forfoorth) as if according to the common proverbe, the fow should teach Minerva: Minerva (quoth he, taking that word out of his mouth) what's that you fay? Minerva was surprized not long since in adulteric. Semblably it was with no ill grace that Xenet wanswered his country-men and fellow citizens, who cast in his teeth and upbraided him, for that being their leader and captaine he fled out of the field: With you(quoth he) my loving and deere friends, I ran away for companie. But great regard and heed would be taken, that in this kinde he overpasse not himselse, not go beyond the bonds of mediocritie in fuch ridiculous jelts, for feare that either he offendand displease the hearers unseasonably, or debase and abject himselfe too grofly, by giving out such ridiculous speeches: which was the fault of one Democrates, who mounting one day up into the 50 pulpit or publicke place of audience, said openly to the people there assembled; That himselfe was like unto their citie, for that he had finall force, and yet was puft up with much winde. Another time also, and namely when the great field was lost before Charonea, he presented himselfe to speake unto the people in this maner: I would not for any thing that the common wealth were driven to fuch calamitie and fo hard an exigent, that you should have patience to heare me, and neede to take counfell at my hands: for as in the one he shewed himselse a base and vile person, so in the other he plaied the brain-sicke soole and sencelesse asse: but for a man of State, neither is the one nor the other decent and agreeable. Furthermore, Phoeion is had in admiration for his brevitie of speech, insomuch as Polyeuctus giving his judgement of him, faid: Demoss heres indeed is the greatest Oratour, and the most famous Rhetorician, but Phocion beleeve me, is the best speaker; for that his pithie speech was so couched, that in few words it contained much substance and good matter. And even Demosthenes himselfe, howsoever he made no reckoning of all other orators in his time, yet if Phoeson rose up to deliver a speech after him, would fay: Lo heere standeth up now the hatchet or pruning knife of my words. Well then, endevour you as much as possibly you can, when you are to make a speech before the multitude to speake considerately and with great circumspection, directing your words so, as to they may tend to fafetie and fecuritie, and not in any case to vse vaine and frivolous language: knowing well that Pericles himselse, that great governour, was woont to make his praier unto the gods before hee entred into his oration in publicke audience : That he might let fall no word out of his mouth impertinent to the matter which he was to handle; and yet for all this, you must be well exercised neverthelesse, and practised in the knowledge how to be able to answere and replie readily; for many occasions passe in a moment, and bring with them as many fuddencases and occurrences, especially in matters of government. In which regard, Denos shees was (by report) reputed inferior to many others in his time, for that otherwhiles he would withdraw himselfe and not be seene when occasion was offered, if he had not well premeditated and studied aforehand of that which he had to say. Theophrastus also writesh 20 of Alibindes, that being defirous to speake, not onely that which was convenient, but also in maner and forme as it was meet; many a time in the mids of his oration would make a flay, and be at a nonplus, whiles he fought and studied for some proper tearmes, and laboured to couch and compose them fitting for his purpose: but he who taketh occasion to stand up for to make a speech of sudden occurrences, and respective to the occasions and times presented unto him, fuch a one I fay of all others doth most moove and astonish a multitude, he I fay is able to leade them as he lift and dispose of them at his pleasure. After this maner plaied Lean the Bizantine, who was fent upon a time from those of Constantinople vnto the Athenians, being at civill debate and diffention among themselves, for to make remonstrances unto them of pacification and agreement: for a very little man was he of stature, and when the people sawe him 20 mounted up into the place of audience, everie one began to teigh, tittre, and laugh at him; which he perceiving well enough: And what would you do and fay then (quoth he) if you fawe my wife, whose crowne of hir head will hardly reach up so high as my knee? At which word, they tooke up a greater fit of laughter then before throughout the whole affembly: And yet (quoth he againe) as little as we both be, if we chance to be at variance and debate one with another, the whole citie of Constantinople is not big enough for us, nor able to holde us twaine. Pytheas likewise, the Orator, at what time as he spake against the honors which were decreed for king Alexander, when one faid unto him: How now fir, dare you prefume to speake of so great matters, being as you are, fo yoong a man? And why not (quoth he) for Alexander whom you make a god among you by your decrees, is yoonger than my felfe.

Furthermore, over and befides a ready tongue and well exercised, he ought to bring with him astrong voice, a good breast and along breast, to this combat of State government; which I assure you, is not lightly to be accounted of, but wherein the champion is to be provided for all feats of masteries or fight; for searce lest if it chance that his voice saile or be wearie and faint, he be overcome and supplanted by some one

Catchpoll, Crier, and of that ranke, Wide-mouth d Jugler or mount-banke.

And yet Cath the yoonger, when he suspected that either the Senate or the people were fore-fitalled by graces, laboring for voices and such like prevention, so as he had no hope to perswade and compasse since the ment about, would rise up and holde them all aday long with an 50 oration; which he did to drive away the time, that at least-wise upon such a day there should be nothing done or passe against his mind. But as touching the speech of a governor, how powerfull and effectuall it is, and how it ought to be prepared, we have this already sufficiently treated, especially for such an one as is able of himselse to devise all the rest, which consequently sollow-th hereupon.

Moreover, two avennes (as it were) or waies there be to come unto the credit of government; the one short and compendious, yeelding an honourable course to win glory and reputation; but it is not without some danger; the other longer and more base and obscure, howbeit alwaies fafe and fure. For somethere be, who making faile and setting their course (as a man would fay) from some high rocke situate in the maine sea, have ventured at the first upon some great and worthy enterprise, which required valour and hardinesse, and so at the very beginning entred into the middes of State-affaires, supposing that the Poet Pindar w faid true in these his

Aworthy worke who will begin, Must when he enters first therein, Set out a gay forefront to view Which may farre off the luftre shew.

For certeinly the multitude and common fort being fatisfied and full already of those gover-10 nours whom they have bene used to a long time, receive more willingly all beginners and new commers, much-like as the spectatours and beholders of plaies or games have better affection a great deale to fee a new champion entring freth into the lifts. And verily all those honours, dignities and powerfull authorities which have a fudden beginning and glorious encrease, doe ordinarily aftonish and daunt all envie: for neither doth the fire (as Ariston faith) make a smoke which is quickly kindled; and made to burne out of a light flame; nor glorie breed envie when it is gotten at once and speedily; but such as grow up by little and little, at leisure, those be they that are caught therewith, some one way and some another. And this is the cause that before they come to flower (as it were) and grow to any credit of government, fade and become dead and withered about the publike place of audience. But whereas it falleth our according to the 20 Epigram of the courrier or runner Ladas,

No sooner came the sound of whip to eare, But he was at the end of his carreare, And then withall, in one and selfe-same trice

He crowned was with laurell for his price. that fome one hath at first performed an ambaffage honourably, rode in triumph gloriously, or conducted an armic valiantly, neither envious persons nor spightfull ill-willers have like power against fuch as against others. Thus came Aratus into credit the very first day, for that he had defaited and overthrowen the tyrant Nicocles. Thus Alcibiades woon the spurres, when hepra-Etifed and wrought the alliance betweene the Mantimeans and the Athenians against the Lace-30 damonians. And when Pompey the great would have entred the citie of Rome in triumph, before he had shewed himselfe unto the Senate, and was withstood by Sylla, who meant to impeach him, he flucke not to fay unto him: More men there be fir, who worthip the Sun rifing, than the Snn fetting; which when Sylla heard, he gave place and yeelded unto him without one word replying to the contrary. And when as the people of Rome chose and declared Cornelius Scipio Confull all on a fudden, and that against the ordinary course of law, when as himselfe flood onely to be Aedile, it was not upon some vulgar beginning and ordinary entrance into affaires of State, but for the great admiration they had of his rare and fingular proweffe, in that being but a very youth, he had mainteined fingle fight and combat hand to hand with his enemy in Spaine, and vanquithed him; yea, and within a while after, in the necke of it, had atchieved many 40 worthy exploits against the Carthaginians, being but a militarie Tribune or Colonel of a thoufund foot, for which brave acts and fervices of his, Cato the elder as he returned out of the campe cried out with a loud voice of him:

Right wife and sage indeed alone is he, The rest to him but slitting stadowes be.

But now fir, feeing that the cities & States of Greece are brought to fuch tearmes, that they have no more armies to conduct, nor tyrants to be put downe, nor yet alliances to be treated and made, what noble and brave enterprise would you have a yoong gentleman performe athis beginning and entrance into government? Mary, there are left for him publike causes to plead, ambaffages to negotiate unto the Emperour or some sovereigne potentate; which occasions 50 do ordinarily require a man of action, hardy and ardent at the first enterprise, wife and warie in the finall execution. Befides, there be many good and honest customes of ancient time, either for-let or growen out of kinde by negligence, which may be fet on foot, renewed and reformed againe: many abuses also by ill custome are crept into cities, where they have taken deeperoot, and beene fetled, to the great dishonour and damage of the common-wealth: which may be redreffed by his meanes. It falleth out many times, that a great controverfie judged and decided aright; the triall likewife and proofe of faithfull trust and diligence in a poore mans cause mainteined and defended frankly and boldly against the oppression of some great and mightie adverfarie; also a plaine and stout speech delivered in the behalfe of right and justice, against some grand Signiout who is unjust and injurious, have affoorded honorable entries unto the management of State affaires. And many there be, who have put foorth themselves, made their parts knowen, and come up, by enterteining quarrels and enmitties with those personages, whose authoritie was odious, envied and terrible to the people : for we alwaies fee that prefently the puiffance and power of him that is put downe and overthrowen, doth accrue unto him who had the upper hand, with greater reputation: which I speake not as if I did approve and thought it good for one to oppose himselfeby way of envie unto a man of honour and good respect, and who by his vertue holdeth the chiefe place of credit in his countrey, thereby to undermine his estate, like as Simmias dealt by Pericles, Alemson by Themistocles, Clodius by Pompeius, and Meneclides the Oratour by Epaminondas; for this course is neither good nor honourable, and besides, lesse gainefull and profitable: for fay that the people in a fudden fit of furious choler commit fome outrage and abuse upon a man of worth; afterwards, when they repent at leasure (being coole) that which they did hastily in their heat of blood, they thinke there is no readier nor juster means to excuse themselves to him, than to deface, yea, and undoe the said partie who first moved and induced them to those proceedings. And verily, to set upon a wicked person, who either by his audacious and inconfiderate rashnesse, or by his fine & cautelous devices hath gotten the head over a whole citie, or brought a state to his devotion, such as were in olde time Cleon and Clino-20 phon at Athens; to fet upon those (I say) for to bring them under, yea, and atterly to destroy them out of the way, were a notable preamble (as it were) to the Comedy for him that is mounted upon the stage of a common wealth, and newly entred into the government thereof. I am not ignorant likewife, that fome by clipping the wings, or paring the nailes (as a man would fay) of an imperious Senate and lordly Seignoury, taking upon them too much, and tyr mnizing by vertue of their absolute sovereigntie, which was the practise of one Ephraltes at Athens; and another in the citie Elis, whose name was Phormio, have acquired honour and reputation in their countrey: but I holde this to be a dangerous beginning for to be enterprifed by them that would come to the managing of State affaires. And it feemeth that Solon made choife of a better entrance than fo, for the citie of Athens being divided into three parts or regions; the first 30 of those that did inhabit the hill; the second of them who dwelt upon the plaine; and the third of fuch as kept by the water-fide; he would not feeme to fide with any one of these three parts, but caried himfelfe indifferent unto them all, faying & doing what he could to reconcile and reunite them together: by which meanes chosen he was, by the generall consent of them all, the lord Reformer, to draw new lawes and conditions of pacification among them; and by this practife he established and confirmed the State of Athens. Thus you see how a man may enter into the government of the common-wealth by honourable and glorious commencements: and this may suffice for the former avenue of the twaine aforesaid unto the affaires of State;

As for the other way, which as it giveth more fure accesse, so it is not so expedite and short; there have beene many notable men who in old time made choise thereof, and loved it better: 40 and by name, Aristides, Phocion, Pammenes the Theban, Lucullan in Rome, Cato and Agefilaus at Lacedamon : for like as the ivie windeth about trees stronger than it selfe, and riseth up alost together with them; even so each one of these before-named, being yet yoong novices and unknowen, joining and coupling themselves with other ancient personages who were already in credit by rifing leafurely under the wing and shadow of others, and growing with them, grounded themselves and tooke good root against the time that they undertooke the government of State. Thus Clifthenes raised Aristides; Chabrias advanced Photion; by Sylla, Lucullus rose; Cato by Fab. Maximus; Epaminondas came up by Pammenes; and Agesilaus by Lysander; but this man named last, upon a certeine inordinate ambition and importune jealousie did wrong unto his owne reputation, by casting and rejecting behind him a worthy personage, who guided and 50 directed him in all his actions: but all the rest wisely and honestly reverenced, acknowledged, yea, and aided with all their power, even to the very end, the authors of their rifing and advancement; much like unto those bodies which are opposed full against the Sunne, in returning and fending backe the light that shineth upon them, doe augment and illustrate the same so much the more. Thus when evill tongued persons, who envied and maligned the glory of Seifio, gave out thathe was but the plaier and actour onely of those woorthy feats of armes which lice keed ted ifor the authour thereof was Lalim his familiar friend: yet Lalim for all these speeches was never mooyed nor altered in his purpose, but continued still the same man to promote and second the glory and vertue of Scipio. As for Afranius the friend of Pompeius, notwithstanding he was but of base and low degree, yet being upon tearmes to be chosen Consult, when he underflood that Pompeius favoured others, gave over his fute, and let fall the possibilitie that he had; faying withal: That it would not be so honourable unto him for to be promoted unto that dignitic of Consulate, as grievous and troublesome, to obteine the same against the good will, and without the favour and affiltance of Pompeius; and so in deferring and putting off the matter but one yeere longer, he had not the repulse when the time came, and therewith he kept his friend fill, and enjoied his favour. And by this meanes it commeth to passe, that those who are thus led by the hand of others, and trained to the way of preferment and glorie, in gratifying one do gratifie many withall; and befides, if any inconvenience chance to enfue, the leffe odious they to be and hatefull for it: which was the reason that Philip king of Macedonie earnestly exhorted and admonished his some Alexander that he should provide himselfe of many friends and servitours whiles he might, and had leafure, even during the reigne of another; namely, by converfing and conferring graciously with every one, and by cheerefull behaviour and affabilitieto all, for to winne their love and favour; but when he was once invested in the kingdome, to chuse for his guide and conductour in the managing of State-affaires, not simply him who is of most credit and greatest reputation, but rather the man who is such an one by his desert and vertue for like as every tree will not admit a vine to wind about the trunke & body thereof; for some there be that do choke & utterly marre the growth of it; even so in the government of cities & States, those who are not truely honest and lovers of vertue, but ambitious and desirous of honour and 20 fovereignty onely, affoord not unto yong men the meanes and occasions of worthy enterprises and noble acts, but upon envie and jealousic holde them under and put them backe as farreas they can, and thus make them to confume and languish, as if they deterined from them their gloric, and cut them (hort of that which is their onely food and nourishment. Thus did Marine in Afrike first, and afterwards in Galatia by Sylla, by whose meanes hee had performed much good service; and in the end would not use him at all, but cast him off; for that in trueth, hee was vexed at the heart to fee him growe up as hee did, and to winne fo great reput ation under him, howfoever hee would have feemed to colour the matter, and make the fignet in the colet of his ring which he fealed withall, the pretenfe and cloake thereof. For sylla being treasurer in Africke, under Marius the lord General, was fent by him unto king Bocchus, and brought with 30 him Jugurtha prisoner; and being a yoong gentleman as he was, and beginning to taste the fweetenesse of glorie, he could not carrie himselfe modestly in this good fortune of his, but must needs weare upon his singer a faire scale ring, wherein he caused to be engrauen the historic of this exploit, and namely how Bocchus delivered into his hands Jugurtha prisoner: heereat Syllatooke exceptions, laid this to his charge, and made it a colourable occasion of rejecting and putting him out of his place : but he joining himselfe with Catulus and Metellus, good menboth, and the adversaries of Marius; soone after chased Marius and turned him out of all in a civill war, which was well neere the ruine and overthrow of the Romaine empire. Sylla dealt not fo with Pompeius, for he evermore advanaged & graced him from his very youth, he would arise out of his chaire, and vaile boner vnto him when hee came in place: semblably hee carried 40 himselfe toward other yong gentlemen and gallants of Rome, imparting unto some the meanes of doing the exploits of captaines and commanders: yea quickning and putting others for ward who were unwilling of themselves; and in so doing he filled all his armies with zeale; emilation, and defire of honor, striving who should doe better, and by this meanes became himfelfe superior evermore, and ruled all; at length desirous to be not the onely man, but the first and the greatest among many that were likewise great. These bothe men therefore with whom? young States man ought to joine; to these he ought to cleave, & in them as it were to be incorporate: not as that cockatrice or Basilisk in Aelops sables, who being carried alost on the shoulders of the eagle, no fooner came neere to the funne beames, but fuddenly tooke his flight, and came to the place before the eagle: and after that maner to rob them of their honour, and fe- 50 cretly to catch their glorie from them; but contrariwise to receive it of them with their consent and good favour, and to give them to understand that they had never known how to rule unleffe they had learned first of them to obey well, as Plato faith.

Precepts of policie.

Next after this followeth the election and choise that they ought to make of their friends: In which point, they are not to take example either by Themistocles or Cleon: As for Cleon when he knewthat he was to undertake the government upon him, affembled all his friends together, and declared unto them that he renounced all their amitie, faying; That friendship was oftentimes a cause that disabled men, and withdrew them from their right intention in affaires of State; but it had beene farre better done of him to have exiled and chased out of his minde all avarice and contentious humors, to have clenfed his heart from envie and malice: for the government of cities hath not need of those who are friendlesse and destitute of familiar companions, but of fuch as be wife and honest: but when he had banished and put away his friends, he entertained round about him a fort of flatterers, who daily stroked and licked him, as the comicall poets use to fay. He became rough and severe to good and civill men, but in stead thereof he debased himselfe to court, flatter, and please the multitude, doing and saying all things to content them, and taking rewards at every mans hand, combining and forting himselfe with the to woorst and most leaund people in the whole citie, by their meanes to make head, and set against the best and most honorable persons. Themistocles yet tooke another course, who when one faid unto him; You shall do the part of a good ruler and magistrate, in case you make your selfe equall unto every one alike; answered thus; I pray God I may never sit in such a throne or seate, wherein my friends may not prevaile more with me, than they that are not my friends. But herein he did not well, no more than the other, thus to promife any part and authoritie of his government unto those with whom he hadamitie, and to submit the publicke affaires unto his private and particular affections: howbeit, for all this, he answered very well unto Simonides, requesting somewhat at his hand that was not just: Neither were he a good musician or poet, (quoth he) who should fing against measures: nor the magistrate righteous who in favour of a-20 ny person doth ought against the lawes. For intruth a shamefull thing it were and a great indignitie; that in afhip the mafter or owner thereof should give order to be provided of a good pilot and steresman; that the pilot also should chuse good bote-swaines and other mariners,

Who can the helme rule in the sterne below, And hoife up faile above, when windes do blow.

Also that an architect of master builder, knoweth how to chuse those workemen and laborers under him, who will in no case hurt his worke, but set it forward, and take paines with him for his best behoofe: and a States-man or governour, who as Pindarus saith well,

And policy ought to direct. 30 not know at the very first to chuse friends of the same zeale and affection that he is himselfe, to fecond and affift him in his enterprifes, and to be as it were the fpirits to inspire him with a defire of well doing; but to fuffer himselfe to be bent and made pliable unjustly and violentlie; now to gratifie the will of one; and anon, to ferve the turne and appetite of another: For fuch a man refembleth properly a carpenter or mason, who by error, ignorance, and want of experience, useth his squires, his plumbs, levels and rules so, that they make his worke to rise crooked and out of square in the end. For certeinly frends be the very lively tooles, and sensible instruments of governors; and in case they doe amisse and worke without the right line, the rulers themselves are not to slip and go awry with them for companie, but to have a carefull eie unto this, that unwitting to them they doe not erre and commit a fault. For this it was that wrought 40 Solon dishonor, and caused him to be reproched and accused by his owne citizens, for that having an intention to case mens greevous debts, and to bring in that which at Athons they called Sifachthia, as if one would fay, an aleviation of fome heavie burden, which was a pleafing and plaufible name, importing a generall striking out of all debts, and a cancelling of bonds; he imparted this deffeigne and purpose of his to some of his friends, who did him a shrewd turne, and most unjustly wrought him much mischiefe; for upon this inkling given unto them, they made hafte to take up and borrow all the money they could, as farre as their credite would extend: not long after when this edict or proclamation aforefaid concerning the annulling of all debts was come foorth and brought to light; these frends of his were found to have purchased goodly houses, and faire lands, with the monies which they had levied. Thus Solon was charged 50 with the imputation of doing this wrong, together with them, when as himselfe indeede was wronged and abused by them. Agestlam also shewed himselse in the occasions and sutes of his frends most weake and feeble minded, more iwis than in any thing else, resembling the horse Pegasus in Euripides, and helping his familiar frends in all their diffresses more affectionatly and willingly than was meet and reason: for whensoever they were called into question in justice for any transgressions, he would seeme to be privie and partie with them in the same. Thus hee saved one Phabidas, who was accused to have surprised secretly the castle of Thebes called Ladmia, without commission on and warrant, alledging in his defence, that fuch enterprifes ought to be executed by his owne proper motive, without attending any other commandement. Moreover, he wrought fo with his countenance and favour, that one Ephodrias, who was attaint for an unlawfull and heinous act, and namely, for entring by force and armes with a power into the countrey of Atties, what time as the Athenians were allied and confederate in amitie with the Lacedæmonians, escaped judgement, and was found unguiltie; which he did, being wrought thereto and mollified (as it were) by the amourous praiers of his sonne. Likewise, there is a missive of his found, and goeth abroad to be seene, which he wrote unto a certaine great lord or potentate in these tearmes: If 10 N wim have not trespassed, deliver him for justice sake; if he have transgressed, deliver him for my fake; but howfoever it be, deliver him and let him go. But Photion contratiwife would not fo much as affift in judgement Charillus his own fonne in law, who had married his daughter, when he was called into question and indited for corruption & taking money of Harpalu, but lesthim and departed, faying: In all causes just and reasonable I have made you my allie, and wil imbrace your affinitie; in other cases you shall pardon me. Timoleon also the Corinthian, after thathe dealt what possibly he could with his brother by remonstrance, by praiers and intreaty tore. claime and diffinade him from being a tyrant; feeing that he could doe no good on him, turned the edge of his fword against him, and joined with those that murdered him in the end : for a magiftrate ought to friend a man and stand with him not onely with this gage, as farre as to theal- 20 tar, that is to fay, untill it come to the point of being forfworne for him, according as Periules one day answered to a friend of his, but also thus farre forth onely, as not to doe for his sakeany thing contrary to the lawes, against right, or prejudiciall to the common-weale: which tulebeing neglected and not precifely observed, is the cause that bringeth great losse and ruine to a ftate; as may appeare by the example of Phabidas and Sphodrias, who being not punished according to their deferts, were not the least causes that brought upon Sparta the unfortunate warre and battell at Leuttra. True it is, that the office of a good ruler and administratour of the weale-publicke, doth not require precifely and force us to use severity and to punish every slight and small trespasse of our friends; but it permitteth us after we have looked to the main-chance and secured the State, then as it were of a surplussage to succour our friends, to assist and helpe 30 them in their affaires, and take part with them. Moreover, there be certeine favours which may be done without envie and offence; as namely, to stand with a friend rather than another, for the getting of a good office; to bring into his hand fome honourable commission, or an eafie and kinde ambassage, as namely, to be sent unto a prince or potentate in the behalfe of acity or State, onely to salute him and doe him honour; or to give intelligence unto another city of important matters, in regard of amity, league and mutual focietie; or in case there fall our some bufinesse of trouble, difficulty and great importance, when a magistrate hath taken upon himfelfe first the principall charge thereof, he may chuse unto him for his adjunct or assistant in the commission some especiall frend, as Diomedes did in Homer:

To chuse mine owne companion, since that you will me let, ulyssesthat renowmed knight, how can I then for get?
inlyffes likewife as kindly rendreth unto him the like praise againe:
           These coursers brave, concerning which of me you do demand, O aged fire , arrived heere of late, from Thracian land Are hither come, and there were bred:
               their lord them lost in fight, Whom valiant Diomedes flew by force of armes outright,
           And twelve friends more and doughtie knights,
               as ever horfe didride,
            Were with him flaine for companie,

This modest kinde of yeelding and submission to gratific and pleasure friends, is no lesse ho nourable to the praifers than to the parties praifed; whereas contrariwife, arrogancie and felfelove (as Plato faith) dwelleth with folitudes, which is as much to fav, as it is forfaken and abandoned of all the world. Furthermore, in these honest favors and kinde courtesies which we may bestow upon some frends, we ought to affociate other frends besides, that they may be in some fortinteressed therein also; and to admonith those who receive such pleasures at our hands, for to praife and thanke them, yea, and to take themselves beholden unto them, as having bene the cause of their preferment, and those who counselled and perswaded thereto: but if peradventure they moove us in any undecent, dishonest and unreasonable fittes, we must flatly denie them; howbeit, not after a rude, bitter & churlish fort, but mildly and gently by way of remonthrance, 10 and to comfort them withall, shewing unto them that such requests were not beforming their good reputation and the opinion of their vertue. And this could Epaminondas do of all menin the world best, and shift them off after the cleanliest maner; for when hee refused at the instant fute of Pelopidas, to deliver out of prison a certeine Tavernor, and within a while after, let the famepartie goe at libertie at the request of his lemmon or harlot whom he loved, he said unto him: Pelopulas, such graces and favours as these, we are to grant unto our paramours and concubines, and not unto fuch great captaines as your felie. But Cate after a more furly and boiflerous fortin the like case answered unto Catulus, one of his inward and most familiar friends. This Catalus being Cenfour, mooved Cato who then was but Questour or Treasurer, that for his fake he would difmiffe and fet free one of his clerks of the Finances under him, against whom 20 he had commensed fute and entred processe in law: That were a great shame in deed (quoth he) for you, who are the Cenfour, that is to fay, the corrector and reformer of our maners, and who ought to schoole and instruct us that be of the yonger fort, thus to be put out of your course by our under officers and ministers: for he might well enough have denied to condescend unto his request in deed and effect, without fuch sharpe and biting words, and namely, by giving him to understand that this displeasure that he did him in refusing to doc the thing, was against his will, and that he could neither will nor chuse, being forced thereto by justice and the law. Over and besides, a man in government hath good meanes with honesty and honor to helpe his poore friends, that they may advantage themselves and reape benefit by him from the common-wealth. Thus did Themistocles after the battell at Marathon; for feeing one of them that 30 lay dead in the field to have hanging at his necke chaines, and collars, with other bracelets of gold about his armes, passed by, and would not seeme for his owne part to meddle with them, butturning backe to a familiar friend of his, one of his folowers; Here (quoth he) off with thefe ornaments and take them to your felfe, for you are not yet come to be fuch an one as Themifooles. Moreover the affaires and occurrences daily incident in the world, doe prefent vnto a magistrate and great ruler such like occasions, whereby he may be able to benefit and enrich his friends: for all men cannot be wealthy nor like to you o Menemachus. Give then unto one friend a good and just cause to plead unto and defend, which he may gaine well by and fill his purse; unto another, recommend the affaires and businesse of some great and rich personage, who hath neede of a man that knoweth how to manage and order the fame better than himfelfe; for ano-40 ther, harken out where there is a good bargaine to be made, as namely, in the undertaking of fome publicke worke, or helpe him to the taking of a good farme at a reasonable rent, whereby hemay be a gainer. Epaminondas would do more than thus; for upon a time he fent one of his friends who was but poore unto a rich burgesse of Thebes, to demannd a whole talent of money freely to be given unto him, and to fay, that Epammondas commanded him to deliver fo much; The burgeffe woondring at fuch a meffage, came unto Epaminondas, to know the cause why hee should part with a talent of filver unto him; mary(quoth he)this is the reason; The man whom I sent is honest, but poore, and you by robbing the common-wealth are become rich. And by report of Xenophon, Agefilaus tooke no final joy & glory in this, that he had enriched his friends, whiles himselfe made no account at all of money. But forasmuch according to the saying of simonides, as all larks ought to have a cap or crest upon the head, so every government of State bringeth with it enmitties, envices, and litigious jealousies; this is a point wherein a man of estate and affaires ought to be well enformed and instructed. To begin therefore to treat of this argument, many there be who highly praise Themisteles and Arifides, for that when foever they were to goe out of the territorie of Attica, cither in embaffage or to manage warres together; they had no sooner their charge and commission, but they presently laid downe all the quartels and enmitte betweene even in the very confines and frontiers of their countrey, and afterwards when they were returned, tooke up and enterteined them againe. Some also there are who be wonderfull well pleased with the practise and fashion of Cresinas the Magnesian. This Cretinas had for his concurrent an adversary in the government of State, a noble man of the same citie named Hermias, who although he were not very rich, yet ambitious he was, and caried a brave and hautie minde: Cretinas in the time of the warre that Mithridates made for the conquest of Asia, seeing the citie in danger, went unto the faid Hermias, and made an offer unto him to take the charge of captaine generall for the defence of the citie, and in the meane while himselfe would go foorth to retire to some other place; or otherwife, if he thought better that himselfe should take upon him the charge of the warre, then he would depart out of the citie into the countrey for the time, for feare left if they taried both behinde and hindered one another as they were woont to doe by their ambitious minds they should vidoo the state of the citie: This motion liked Hermias very well, who confeffing that Cretinas was a more expert warrior than himselfe, departed with his wife and chil. dren out of the citie: Now Creunas made meanes to fend him out before with a convoy, putting into his hands his owne money, as being more profitable to them who were without their houses and fled abroad, than to such as lay belieged within the citie, which being at the point to be loft, was by this meanes preserved beyond all hope and expectation: for if this be a nobleand generous speech proceeding from a magnanimous hart, to say thus with a loud voice:

My children well I love, but of my hart,

My native foile by farre hath greater part. Why should not they have this speech readier in their mouthes, to say unto every one ? I hate 10 this or that man, and willing I would be to doe him a displeasure; but my native countrey I love fo much the more? For not to defire to be at variance and debate still with an enimie, in such causes as for which we ought to abandon and cast off our friend, were the part of a most fell, savage, and barbarous nature: yet did Phocion and Cato better in mine opinion, who enterteined not any comitic with their citizens in regard of difference and variance betweene them about bearing rule and government; but became implacable and irreconcilable onely in publike causes, when question was of abandoning or hurting the weale publike; for otherwise in private matters, they caried themselves kindly enough, without any ranckor or malice even toward them, against whom they had contested in open place, as touching the State; for we ought not to esteeme or repute any citizen an enimie, unlesse such an one be bred amongst them as 10 Aristion, or Nabis, or Catiline, who are to be reckoned botches rather, and pestilent maladies of a citie than citizens; for all others if haply they be at a jarre or discord, a good magistrate ought to bring them into tune and good accord againe, by gently fetting up and letting downe, asa skilfull Mufician would doe by the strings of his instrument; and not in anger to come upon those that are delinquents, roughly and after an outragious maner, even to their detriment and differace; but after a more milde and civill fort, as Homer speaketh in one place:

Certes, faire friend, I would have held, That others for your wit you had exceld.

As alfo in another:

You know, if that you lift (iwis) Totell a bester sale than this.

Yea, and when they shall either say or do that which is good and convenient, not to shew himfelfe to grieve and grudge at their credit and reputation which they win thereby, nor to be sparie in affoording them honourable words to their commendation and advantage: for in fo doing, thus much will be gained, that the blame which shall be laied upon them another time when they deserve it, will be better taken, and more credit given to it: and besides, by how much more we shall exalt their vertues, so much the more we may beat downe and depresse their vices when they do amisse, by making comparison of them both, and shewing how much the oneis more worthy and beforming than the other: for mine owne part, I holde it meet and good, that a man of government should give testimony in the behalfe of his adversaries in righteous & just 50 causes; also affilt and helpe them out of troubles, in case they be brought into question by some leawd fycophants, yea, and difcredit and difable the imputations charged upon them, namely, when he feeth that fuch matters for which they are molested, be farre from their intention and meaning. Thus Nero, a cruell tyrant though he was, a little before he put Thraseas to death, whom he hated and feared most of all men in the world, notwithstanding one laied to his charge before him that he had given a wrong dome or unjust sentence: I would (quoth he) that I could be affured that Thraseas loved me so well as I am sure he a is most upright and just Judge. Neither were it amille for the altonishing & daunting of others, who be of a naughty nature, when they doe commit any groffe faults, to make mention other-whiles of some adversarie of theirs who is of a more modelt behaviour and civill carriage, by faying: Such an one (I warrant you) would never have faid or done thus. Moreover, it were not impertinent to put some, who doe offend, in minde of their fathers and ancestours, that have bene good and honest, like as Homer did:

And Appin Claud in being the concurrent to Scipio Africanus, when they flood both for one magistracic, said unto him as he met him in the street: O Paulus Aemilius, how deeply wouldest thou figh for griefe and forow, in case thou wert advertised that one Philomew a Publicane or Banker and no better, accompanied and guarded thy fonne thorow the city, going downe toward the affembly of Cornices for to be chosen Censour? This maner of reprehension, as it admonitheth the offender, foit doth honour unto the admonisher. Nessor likewise in a Tragedie of Sophseks, answereth as politickly unto Ajax; when he reproched him, faying:

I blame not you fir Ajax, for your speech, Naught though it be; your words are nothing liceh.

Semblably, Care who had conteffed against Pompey, for that being combined and in league with Julius C.efar, he affaulted and forced the citie of Rome, when as afterwards they were growen to 20 open warre one against the other, opined and gave his advice to conferre the charge and regiment of the common weale upon Pompeius, faying withall : That they who could doe most mischiefe, were the fittest men to stay the same : for thus a blame or reproofe mingled with a praise and commendation, especially, if the same grow to no opprobrious tearmes, but be conrained within the compatie of a franke and free remonstrance, working not a spightfull stomacke, but a remorfe of confcience and repentance, feemeth kinde and dutifull; whereas despiteousteproches are never feemely and decent in the mouth of a magistrate and man of honour. Marke the opprobrious termes and taunts that Demosthenes let flie against Aefchines, those also that Aeschenes gave him; likewise the bitter frumps which Hyperides wrote against Demades; and fee if Solon ever delivered fuch, or if there came the like out of the mouth of Pericles, of Lyeur-30 gm the Lacedamonian, or of Pittaem the Lesbian; and as for Demofibenes, he forbare fuch Tharpe and cutting tearmes otherwife, and never used them but in pleading against some criminall causes; for his orations against Philip are electe and voide of all nips, flouts, and scoffes whatfoever and in truth fuch maner of dealing diffameth the speaker more, than those against whom they bee spoken; they bring confusion in all affaires; they trouble affemblies both in counsell house and also in common hall; In which regard, Phoeion yeelding upon a time to one that was given to raile, brake off his oration, held his peace for a while and came downe; but after, the other with much a doo held his tongue and gave over his foule language, he mounted up into the place of audience againe, and going on in his former speech which was interrupted and discontinued, faid thus: Now that I have already my masters spoken sufficiently of horse-40 men, men of armes, and foldiours heavily armed at all peeces, it remaines th to discourse of light footemen, and targuatiers nimbly appointed.

But for as this is an hard matter unto many, to beare with such broad language, and to conteine, and oftentimes these taunting scoffers meete with their matches, and have their mouthes stopped, and are put to silence by some pretie replies; I would wish that the same were short, pithie, and delivered in very fewe words, not shewing any heate of anger and choler, but a kinde of sweete mildenesse, after the maner of a grave laughter, yet withall somewhat tart and biting; and such ordinatily be those that are returned firly in the same kinde against them that first began: for like as those darts which are recharged upon them that flung them first, seeme to be driven with good will, and fent backe againe with great force and firme flrength of him 30 who was stroken with them 3 even so it seemeth that a sharpe and biting speech retorted against him who first spake it, commeth forceable and with a power of wit and understanding from the partie who received it; such was the replie of Epaminondas unto Callistratus, who reproched and upbraided the Thebanes and Argives with the parents of Oedipus and Orestes, for that the one being borne in Thebes slew his owne father, and the other at Argos killed his mother: true indeed quoth Epaminondas, and therefore we banished them out of our cities, but you receive them into yours. Semblable was the answer of Antaleidas a Lacedæmonian unto an Athenian, who faid unto him after a boatting and vaunting maner: We have driven you oftentimes from the river Cephasus; but we (quoth he) never yet drave you fro the river Euroras: In like for treplied Phoeion pleasantly upon Demades when he cried aloud, The Athenians will put thee to death if they enter once into their raging fits: But they (quoth he) will doe the same by thee, if they were in their right wits: and Crassia the oratour whe Domition demanded this question of him; When the lamprey which you keprand sed in your poole was dead, did you never weepe for it, and say true? E came upon him quickly againe in this wise: And you sir when you had buried three of of your wives one after another, did you ever shed teare for the matter, & tell troth? And verilie these rules are not onely to be practised in matters of State-affairs, but they have their use also in other parts of man life.

other parts of mans life. Moreover, somethere be who will intrude and thrust themselves into all forts of publike af- to faires, as Cato did; and there are of opinion, that a good citizen should not refuse any charge or publike administration fo farre foorth as his power will extend: who highly commend Epaminondas; for that when his adversaries and evill willers upon envie had caused him to be chosen a bailife and receiver of the citie revenues thereby to doe him a spight and shrewd turne; hee did not despile & thinke basely of the said office; but saying, that not onely magistracie snewth what maner of man one is, but also a man sheweth what the magistracie is, he brought that of fice into great dignitie and reputation, which before was in no credite and account at all, ashaving the charge of nothing els but of keeping the streetes cleane, of gung farming and carying dung foorth out of the narrow lanes and blinde allies, and turning water-courses. And even I Plutarch my felfe doubt not, but I make good sport and game unto many who passe through 10 our citie, when they fee me in the open streetes otherwhiles busic and occupied about the like matters; but to meete with fuch, I might helpe my felfe with that which I have found written of Antisthenes; for when fome there were that meruailed much at him for carrying openly in his hands through the market place a peece of falt fifth, or flock-fifth which he had bought: It is for mine own felfe (quoth he alowd) that I carie it; but cotrariwife mine answer is to such, as reprove me when they finde me in proper person present, at the measuring and counting of bricks and tiles, or to see the stones, fand, and lime laid downe, which is brought into the citie; it is not for my selfe that I builde, but for the city and common wealth, for many other things there be, which if a man exercise or manage in his owne person and for himselfe, hee may bee thought base minded and mechanical; but in case he do it for the common-wealth and the State, and for 10 the countrey and place where he liveth, it cannot be accounted a vile or ungentleman-like fervice, but a great credite even to bee serviceable, ready and diligent to execute the meanest functions that be. Others there are, who thinke the fashion that Pericles used to be more stately, grave, and decent, and namely Critelaus the peripateticke among the reft, who was of this mind, that as the two great galiaffes, to wit, Salaminia at Athens, and Paralos were not shot or lanched into the sea for every small matter, but onely upon urgent and necessarie occasions; even so a man of government should be emploied in the chiefe & greatest affaires, like as the soveraigne and king of the worlde, according to the poet Euripides,

For God himfelfe doth manage and diffence things of molt weight, by his fole government.
But matters high and of finall confequence, he dothreferre to fortunes regiment.

For we cannot commend the excessive ambition, the aspiring and contentious spirit of Theogenes, who contented not himselfe to have gone through all the ordinary games with victory, and to have wonne the prizes in many other extraordinary mastries and seats of activity, to wit, not onely in that generall exercise Paneration, wherein hand and soote both is put to the uttermost at once, but also at buffers, & arrunning a course in the long race: Finally, being one day at a solemne anniversarie feast or yeeres-maund in the memorial of a certaine demi-god (as the manner was) when he was set, & the meat served up to the boord, he would needs rise from the 50 table for to performe another general Paneration: as if forsooth it had belonged to no man in the world to atchieve the victoric in such feats but himselfe, if hee were present in place: by which prosession he had gotten together as good as twelve hundred coronets, as prizes at such combats, of which the most part were of small or no valew at all; a man would say they had beene chaste or such results and risteraste. Like unto him for all the world be those, who are readic (as a man would say) at all howers to cast of all their clothes to their verie single wastcot or shirt, for to underteke all affaires that shall be presented; by which meanes, the people have enough and too much of them; they become odious and ytkelome unto them; in such fort that if they chance to do well and prosper, they envie them; if they do otherwise than well and miscarrie, they rejoice and be glad at heart therefore. Againe, that which is admired in them at their first entrance into government, turneth in the end to a jest and meere mockeric, much as ter this order, Metiochus is the Generall captaine; Metiochus looketh to the high maies; Metiochus bakes our bread; Metiochus grinds our meale; Metiochus doth everiething, and is all in all; finally, Metiochia thall pay for this one day, and crie woe is me in the end, Now was this Metiochus one of Pericles his followers and favorites, who making use of his authoritie out of measure and compasse, by the countenance thereof, would employ himselfe in all pub-10 like charges and commissions whatsoever, untill at the last he became contemptible and despifed. For in truth a man of government ought fo to carrie himselfe, as that the people should evermore have a longing appetite unto him, he in love with him, and alwaies defirous to fee him againe, if he be absent. This policie did Scipio Africanus wilely practife, who aboud the most part of the time in the countrey; by this meanes both easing himselfe of the heavie loade of envie, and also giving those the while, good leasure to take breath, who seemed to beekept downeby his gloric. Timefine the Clazomenian, was otherwise a good man and a sufficient polititian, howbeit little wift he, how he was envied in the citic, because he would feeme to do everie thing by himselfe, untill such time as there befell unto him such an accident as this. There chanced to be playing in the mids of a street as he passed by, a companie of boies, and their 20 game was, who could draw with a cudgell a certaine cockall bone our of an hole. Some boies there were who held, that the bone lay still within; but he who had smitten it, maintained the contrarie (and faid with all) I would I had as well dashed out Time fins braines out of his head, as I am fure this bone was fitticken out of the hole: Time fias ouerheard this word, and knowing thereby what envie and malice all the people bare unto him, returned home prefently to his house, and told his wife the whole matter, commaunding her to trusse and packe up all both bag and baggage, and to follow after him; who immediately went out of doores, and departed for ever out of the citie Clazomene. It should feeme also that Themistocles was almost in the fame plight, & wanted but a litle of the like shrewd turne from the Athenias, when he was driven thus to fay unto them: Ah my good friends and neighbours, why are you wear leand thinke much to 30 receive fo great good at my hands? But as touching these persons above said, some words of theirs were well placed, & others not. For a wife States man, in care, affection & forecast, ought not to refuse any publik charge what soever, bur to take paines in having an cice oall, & to underfland and know everie particular, and not to referve himselfe close, as it were, some holy anchor or facred tackling laid up in some secret cabin of a ship, and not to attend onely upon extremities, and to tarrie untill he be emploied upon occasions of great necessitie and utmost danger. But like as good patrons or matters of a thip, lay their own hands to some businesse, but others they performe fitting themselves a farre off by the meanes of their tooles and instruments, and by the hands of other fervitors, turning about, stretching and winding up, or letting downe and flacking the ropes as they fee cause, employing the mariners, some to row, others to attend and 40 be occupied in the proo and forethip; and others against o crie unto their fellowes to ply their worke; and some of them they call many times into the poope, and putting the helme into their hands, let them to steere and guide the sterne; even so ought a wife governor of the common-wealth to yeeld now and then anto others the honor of commaund, and otherwhiles to call them after a gratious and courteous fort to the pulpit or publike place of audience, to make orations to the people, and not to moove all matters belonging to the State by his owne perfonall speeches nor by his decrees, sentences, and arts (and as it were) with his owne hands execute everiething; but to have about him faithfull and truffie persons to be his ministers, who might fecond and affift him; and those he should employ, some in this charge, and others in that, according as he feeth them to be sufficient meet and fit for employment. After this manso ner did Pericles use Memppus for his expeditions and conduct of warre affaires: thus by the meanes of Ephisites he tooke downe and abridged the authoritie of the high court Areiopagus. Charinus he employed in compassing and contriving the law or decree that passed against the Megarians; and Lampon he fent with a colonie for to people the citie of Thurit. And in this doing, he not onely diminished the envise of the people against himselfe, in that it seemed that his power and authoritie was thus divided and parted among manie; but also hee managed the affaires of the State better and more commodiously by far. For like as the division of the hand into fingers enfecbleth not the force of the whole hand, but maketh it more fit for use, to handle Hh3 all tooles and inftruments, or to worke any thing more artificially; even so, he that in matters of government doth communicate part of the management of the publike affaires with his friends, causeth by this participation all things to be better done, and with more expedition; whereas that man, who upon an unfatiable define to shew himselfe, to have credit, and to winne name and authoritie, laieth all the weight of the State upon his owns shoulders, and willbee doing of everie thing; undertaking oftentimes that charge, whereunto he is neither framed by nature, nor fitted by exercise; as Cleen did in leading an armie; Philopamenes in conducting a navie; and Annial in making orations to the people, maketh himselfe inexcusable, if happly ought fall out otherwise than well. To such an one may well be applied a verse out of Entiplace:

You worke not in timber, but in other matter Being your selfe but onely a Carpenter.

even so, you not able to deliver an eloquent speech, have undertaken an embassage; being idle and given to take your case, you will needs have the charge of a steward and governe an house: nor skilfull and readie in cafting accounts, you will needs be a Treasurer or receiver, being aced and fickly, you are become a commaunder and generall of an armie. Perioles did farrebener than fo; for he parted the government with Cimon; and retaining to himselfe the whole power of ruling within the citie, he left unto Cimon full commission and authority to man the Armado, and in the meane while to make war upon the Barbarians, because he knew his owne selfemore fir for civill regiment at home, & the other more meet for warlike command abroad. In this re-10 spect Eubalus the Anaphlystian is highly commended, who, notwithstanding the people hada great affiance and trust in him, yea and gave him as much credit as no man more, yet could hee never be brought to deale in the forraine affaires of Greece, nor to take upon him the conduct of an armie; but refolving with himselfe ever fro the beginning to attend & be emploied in manie matters he mightily encreased the revenewes of the citie, and enriched the State exceedingly. But tohierates for exercifing & practifing to make declamations at home in his owne houle in the presence of many others made a foole of himselfe, & was laughed to skorne for his laborsfor fay that he had prooved no bad orator, but a most excellent speaker; yet should he have stood contented with the reputation that he had woon of a good warrior, by feats of armes, and have left the schooles of Rhetoricke, for sophisters, orators, and such professors.

But for a smuch as all common people are by nature malignant, especially to those who are in place of authoritie, taking pleafure to quarrell and finde fault with them; and suspecting ordinarily that many profitable acts and ordinances by them fet downe, unlesse they be debated by factions & with some contradiction, are contrived by secret intelligence under hand, & by way of conspiracie; even this is the thing that most of all bringeth the private amities and societies of States-men and governours into an ill name and obloquie: howbeit, for all this, we are notto admit or grant unto them any true enmittie in deed or difcord, as did fometimes a popular man and a governour of Chios; named Onomademus, who after he had in a certeine feditious tumult gotten the upper hand of his adverfaries, would not banish out of the citie all those who had uken part against him: For fearelest that (quoth he) we fall out with our friends, when we have 40 no more enemies: for furely this were meere follie. But when foever the people shall supect any ordinance or act proposed which is of great consequence and tending to their good, it behosveth not at fuch a time, that all (as it were) of one complot should deliver one and the same sentence; but that two or three opposing themselves without violence, should contradict their friend, and afterwards being convinced and overweighed by found reasons, change their minde and raunge themselves to his opinion; for by this meanes they draw the people with them, namely, when they seeme themselves to be brought thereto in regard of a publike benefit and comoditie. And verily in trifling matters & of no great importance, it were not amiffe to fuffer our very friends in good earnest to differ and disagree from us, and to let every one take his way and follow his owne minde, to the end that when some maine points and principall matters of 50 greatest moment shall come in question and be debated, it might not be thought that they have complotted together, and so growen to a point and accord about the best.

Moreover, we are thus to thinke: That a wife man and a politician is by nature alwaiesthe governour and chiefe magistrate of a citie, like as the king among the Bees: and upon this perswalion he ought to have evermore the reines in his hand, and to sway the affaires of State: howbeit he is not very often nor too hotly for to seeke after and pursue the offices and dignities which the people doe nominate and chuse by their free voices: for this office-managing, and defire to be alwaies in place of authoritie, is neither venerable for his person, nor yet plausible to the people; and yet must not he reject the same, in case the people call him lawfully to it, and conferre the same upon him, but to accept thereof, although peradventure they be offices somewhat inseriour to the reputation that he hath already, yea, and to employ himselfe therein willingly and with good affection; for reason it is and equitie, that as we our selves have bene honoured already by places of great dignitie, so reciprocally we should grace and countenance those which be of meaner qualitie; and whensoever we shall be chosen to superame magnitraties, to wit, unto the estate of L. Governour and generall captaine in the citie of Ashens, or the Prytanship in Rhodes, or Boeotarchie which is here in Bootin, it may be seem us very well in moto destine to yeeld and rebate a little of the sovereigne power in our port, and with moderation to exercise the same; but contrariwise unto meaner roomes to adde more dignity, and shew greater countenance, to the end that we be not envied in the one or despited in the other.

Now for a man that entreth newly into any office whatfoever it be, he ought not onely to call to remembrance, and use the speeches that Pericles made the first time that he tooke upon him the rule of State, and was to fnew himselse in open place: namely, Looke to thy selfe Perieles, thou ruleft free men and not bond-flaves 5 thou governest Greeks and not Barbarians 5 nay, thou art the head magistrate of the citizens of Athens; but also he is to reason and say thus to himselse: Thou are a commander and yet a subject withall; thou are the ruler of a citie under Romane Proconfuls, or els the Procuratours, Lieutenants and Deputies of C. sfar. Here are not 20 the plaines (as he faid) of Lydia for to runne with the launce, nor the ancient city Sarden, ne yet the puissance of the Lydians which was in times past. The robe must not be made so large, it must be worne more straite; your eie must be alwaies from the Emperours pavilion unto the tribunal feat of justice; and you are not to take fo great pride, nor trust so much unto a crowne flanding upon the head, feeing how horned thoes of the Romane Senators are above the fame: but herein you ought to imitate the actours and plaiers in Tragedies, who adde fomewhat of their owne to the roll or written part that they do play, to wit, their passionate affection, getture, accent and countenance which is fit and agreeable to the person that they do represent; and yet withall, they forget not to have an eie and care both, to the prompters. This (I fay) we mult do, for feare left we paffe those bounds and exceed the measures of that libertie which is given us 30 by those who have the power to command us, for I affure you, to goe beyond those precincts and limits, bringeth with it danger; I fay not to be hiffed from off the stage, and to be laughed out of our coats; but many there have bene

as it befell to Pardatus your countrey-man, with those about him, for stepping a little at one side without their limits. And such another also there was, who being confined into a certaine desert isle, became (as Solon faith)

A Sicinitan or Phologandrian,

Who borne sometime was an Athenian. We laugh hartily at little children, to fee how otherwhiles they goe about to put their fathers shoots upon their owne feete, or to set crownes upon their heads in sport; and governors of cities relating foolishly oftentimes unto the people, the woorthic acts of their predeceffors; their noble courage and brave minds, their notable enterprifes atchieved, farre different and disproportioned to the present times & proceedings in their daies, and exhorting them to follow the fame, fet the multitude aloft: but as they doe ridiculously, so afterwards (beleeve me) they suffer not that which deserveth to be laughed at, unlesse haply they be so base minded, that for their basenesse there is no account made of them. For many other histories there bee of ancient 50 Greece, which affoord examples to bee recounted unto men living in this age, for to inftruct and reforme their manners; as namely, those at Athens which put the people in remembrance, not of the prowelle of their ancestors in martial affaires, but for example to decree of that generallabolition and oblivion of all quarrels and matters past, which sometimes was concluded there after that the citie was delivered and freed from their captivitie under the thirtie Tyranes, as also another act, by vertue whereof they condemned in a grievous fine the Poet Phryrichus, for that he represented in a Tragedie the winning and racing of the citie Miletus. Likewise, how by a publike ordinance, every man woare chaplets of flowers upon their heads, when they head fay that Cassander reedified Tbebes : and how, when intelligence came of the cruell execution and bloody massacre committed in Arges, wherein the Argives caused to be put to death 1500, of their owne citizens, they caused in a solemne procession and generall assembly of the whole citie, an expiatoric sacrifice to be carried about, that it might please the gods to avert and turne away such cruell thoughts from the harts of the Athenians; semblaby, how at what time as there was a generall search made throughout the citie in everic house for those who banded with Harpalus, they passed by one house onely of a man newly married, and would not suffer it to be searched. For in these precedents & such like, they might well enough in these daies imitate and resemble their ancient forefathers. But as for the battell of Marahon: the field fought neere the river Eurynedon, and the noble fight at Platea, with other such examples which doe nothing else but blow and puffe up a multitude with vanitie, they should leave such stories for the schooles of Sophisters and masters of Rhetorike.

Well, we ought not in our feverall governments to have a due regard onely to mainteine our selves and our cities so wisely, that our sovereignes have no occasion to complaine; but we must take order also to have one great Seigniour or other, who hath most authoritie at Rome, and in the court of the emperour, to be our fast and speciall frend; who may serve us in fteed of a rampier to backe us, and to defend all our actions and proceedings in the government of our countries: for such lords and great men of Rome stand ordinarily passing well affected to those affaires, which their dependants and favorits doe follow, and the fruit which may bereaped by the amitie and favour of fuch grand-Seigniours, it were not good and honest to convent 10 into the advancement and enriching of our felves, and our particular private frends; but to imploy the fame as Polybian did fometime and Panatius, who by the meanes of the good grace of Scipio wherein they stood, did benefit and advantage their countrey exceeding much: in which number may be ranged Arius, for when Cafar Augustus had forced the citie Alexandria, he entred into it, holding Arim by the hand, and deviling with him alone of all his other friends what was to be done more: afterwards when the Alexandrians looked for no other but fackage and all extremities, and yet befought him to pardon them; I pardon you (quoth he) and receive you into my grace and favour, first in regard of the nobilitie and beautic of your city; secondly tor Alexander the great his fake, the founder thereof; and thirdly for the love of this my friend Arius your citizen. May a man with any reason compare with this gracious favour, the most 20 large and gainfull commissions of ruling and governing provinces, which many make so great fuit for at the court, and that with fuch abject fervitude and base subjection, that some of them have even waxen old in giving attendance thereabout, at other mens gates; leaving in the meane while their owne home affaires at fixe and feven? were it not well to correct and amend a little the fentence in Euripides, finging and faying it thus? If it bee honest and lawfull to watch and make court at the gates of another, and to be subject to the fute of some great Stigniour: furely most commendable and behoovefull it were so to doe, for the love and benefit of a mans country, in all other cases to seeke and embrace amities, under just and equal con-

Moreover, a governour in yeelding and reducing his country unto the obedience of mightie sovereignes abroad, ought to take good heed that he bring it not into fervile subjection, lest when it is once tied by the legge, he suffer it to be bound also by the necke: for some there be who reporting all things both little and great unto these potentates, make this their servitude reprochable; or to speake more truely, they deprive their country of all policie and forme of government, making it so fearefull, timorous, and fit for no authoritie and command at all; and like as they who afe themselves to live so physically, that they can neither dine nor suppe, nor yet bath without their physitian, have not so much benefit of health as nature it selfe doth affoord them; even so those cities and States which for every decree and resolution of their counsell, for all grace and favour, yea and for the smallest administration of publike affaires, must needs adjoigne the consent, judgement, and good liking of those Seigniours and good 50 mafters of theirs, they even compell the faid great lords to be more powerfull and absolute over them than they would themselves. The causes hereof commonly be these; to wit, the avarice, jealousie, and emulation of the chiefe and principall citizens in a State; for that being desirous otherwhiles to oppresse and keepe under those who be their inferiors, they constraine them to abandon their owne cities, or elfe being at fome debate and difference with other citizens their equals, and unwilling to take the foile one at anothers hand in their owne citie; they have recourse unto other superior lords, and so bring in forreiners who are their betters. Heereupon

it commeth to passe, that Senate, people, Judiciall courts, and all that little authoritic and power which they had is unterly loft. A good governour therefore ought to remedy this mifchiefe, by appealing such burgesses as be private and meane citizens, by equalitie, and those who are great and mightie, by reciprocall yeelding one to another; and fo by this course to keepe all affaires within the compaffe of the citie, to compose all quarrels, and determine all controverfies at home, curing and healing fuch inconveniences as fecret maladies of a common-wealth, with a civill and politicke medicine; that is to fay, to chuse rather for his owne part for to be vanquished and overthrowen among fellow-citizens, than to vanquish & win the victorie by forren power, & not to offer wrong unto his natural country, and be a cause to overto throw the rights and priviledges thereof; as for all others, he is to be eech them, yea and to perfwade with them particularly one by another, by good reasons and demonstrances, of how manie calamities peevish obstinacie is the cause; and now because they would not ech one in his turne & courfe frame and accommodate themselves at home to their fellow-citizens, who manietimesbeof one minde and linage to their neighbours and companions in charges and offices, and that with honour and good favour; they are come to this passe, as to detect and lay open the fecret diffentions and debates of their owne citie, at the gates of their advocates, and to put their causes into the hands of pragmaticall lawyers (at Rome) with no lesse share and ignominie, than loffe and damage.

Physicians are wont when they cannot expell and fully exclude out of the bodie inwardlie Physicians are wont when they cannot expell and fully exclude out of the bodie inwardlie 20 some kinds of maladies, to turne and drive the same without forth to the superficiall parts; but contraiting, a man of government, if he be not able to keepe a citic altogether in peace & concord, but that some troubles will arise, yet at least wise he must endevour to conteine that within the citic which is the cause thereof, and nurceth the sedition, and in keeping it close to labour for to heale and remedicit; to this end, that if it be possible he have no need either of physician or physicke from forren parts; for the intentions of a man of State and governments ought to be these, namely; to proceed in his affaires surely, and to slie the violent and surious motions of vaine-glorie, as hath beene said alreadie, howbeit in his resolution,

A courage bold and full of confidence
Undaunted heart, and fearlesse must have
Which will not quaile for any consequence,
But see the end: much like to sculdiors brave
In field themselves who mans do behave,
And hazard lims and life for to de send

and not onely to oppose himselfe against enemies, but also to be armed against perilous troubles and dangerous tumults, that he may be readie to resist and make head: for he ought not in any case himselfe to moove tempess and raise commotions, no nor when he seeth boisterous stormes comming, for sake and leave his countrey in time of need. He must not (I say) drive his citie under his charge upon apparent danger, but so some as ever it once begin to be to sled, and to sloat in jeopardie, than is it his part to come to succor, by casting out from himselfe (as it were) a sacred Anchor, that is to say, to use his boldnesse and libertie of speech, considering that now the maine point of all lieth a bleeding, even the safetie of his countrey. Such were the dangers that hapned unto Pergamm in Nervest time, and of late daies to the Rhodians, during the Empire of Domitian, as also before unto the Thessalians, while Augustus was Emperour, by occasion that they had burned Petraus quick. In these and such like occurrences, a man of State and government, especially if he be woorthie of that name:

nor drawing his foote backe for feare, no nor to blame and lay the fault of others, ne yet to make to fhift for one, and put him felfe out of the medley of danger, but either going in embaffage, or embarked in some ship at fea; or else readie to speake first, and to say not onely thus

Wewe Apollo, have this murder don

but although himselse be not culpable at all with the multitude, yet will be put his person into danger for them. For surely this is an act right honest, and besides the honestie in it selse, it hapneth divers times; that the vertue and noble courage of such a man hath beene so highly admired, that it hath daunted the anger conceived against a whole multitude, and dispatched all the fiercenesse.

fiercenesse and surie of a bitter menace: like as it befell unto a King of Persia in regard of Bulis and Sperthis two gentlemen of Sparta: and as it was feene in Pompey to his hoft and friend Sthenon: for when he was fully determined to chaffice the Mamertines sharpely, and to proceede against them in all rigor, for that they had rebelled, the faid Sthenon stept unto him, and thus frankly spake: That he should do neither well nor justly, in case he did to death a number of innocents, for one man who alone was faultie; for it is I my felfe (quoth he) who caufed the whole citie to revolt and take armes, inducing my friends for love, and forcing mine enemies for feare. These words of his went so necre unto the heart of Pompey, that he pardoned the citie, and most courtcoully entreated Sthenon; femblaby, the hoft of Sylla, having thewed the like valour and vertue, although it were not to the like person, died a noble death: for when Sylla had woon to the cine Pranelle by affault, he meant to put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword, excepting onely one holf of his, whom in regard of old holpitalite he spared and pardoned: but this holf & friend faid flady unto him, that he would never remaine alive to fee that bloudy maffacre, nor hold his life by the murtherer of his countrey; and fo cast himselfe into the troupe of his fellowcitizens in the heate of execution, and was killed with them. Well, pray unto the gods we ought to preserve and keepe us that we fall not into such calamities and troublesome times; to hope alfo and looke for better daies.

Morcover, we are to esteeme of everie publike magistracie, and of him who exerciseth it, as of a great and facted thing, and in that regard to honour the fame above all. Now the honour which is due unto authoritie, is the mutuall accord and love of those who are set in place to exet-20 cife the fame together: and verily this honor is much more worth, than either all those crownes and diadenes which they beare upon their heads, or their flately mantles and roabes of purple, wherewith they be arraied. Howbeit, they that laid the first ground and beginning of amine; their fervice in warres, when they were fellow-fouldiors, or the paffing of their youthfull yeeres together, and contrariwife, take this a cause now of enmitte, that they either are joined captaines in commission for the conduct of an armie, or have the charge of the Common wealetogether, it can not be avoided, but that they must incur one of these three mischieses. For either if they effects their fellowes and companions in government to be their equals, they begin them felves first to grow into tearmes of diffention; or if they take them to be their betters, they fall to be envious; or elfe in cafe they hold them to be inferiour unto them in good parts, they de 30 fpife,& contemne them. Whereas they should indeed make court unto the greater, honor and adorne their equals, and advance their inferiors, and in one word to love and embrace all, as having an amitic and love engendred among themselves, not because they have eaten at one table, drunke of the same cup, or met together at one feast, but by a certaine common band and publike obligation, as having in some fort a certaine fatherly benevolence, contracted and growen upon the common affection unto their countrey. Certes, one reason why Scipio was not so well thought of at Rome was this; that having invited all his friends to a folemne feaft at the dedication of his temple to Hercules, he left out Mummius his colleague or fellow in office: for lay that otherwise they tooke not one another for so good friends; yet so it is that at such a time and upon fuch occasions, they ought to have honored and made much one of the other, by reason 40 of their common magistracie. If then Scipio, a noble personage otherwise, and a man of woonderfull regard, incurred the imputation and note of infolencie and prefumption, because heforgator omitted fo finall a demonstration and token of humanitie: how can it be, that he who goeth about to impaire the dignitie and credit of his companions in government, or discrediteth and digraceth him in those actions, especially which proceed from honour and bountie, or upon an arrogant humour of his owne, will feeme to do all, and attribute the whole to himfelfe alone, how can fuch an one (I fay) be reputed, either modest or reasonable? I remember my felfe, that when I was but of yoong yeres, I was fent with another, in embaffage to the Proconful; and for that my companion staid about (I wor not what behind) I went alone and did that which we had in commission to do together: after my returne, when I was to give an account unto the 50 State, and to report the effect of my charge & meffage back againe; my father arose, and taking me apart, willed me in no wife to speak in the singular number, & say, I departed or went, but We departed, Item, not I faid, or (quoth I) but We faid; & in the whole recitall of the rest to joine alwaies my companion, as if he had been affociat & at one hand with me in that which I did alone. And verily this is not onely decent, convenient, and civill, but that which more is, it taketh from glorie that which is offensive, to wit envie, which is the cause that great captaines attribute and alkribe their noble acts to fortune and their good angell, as did Timoleon, even he who overthrew the Tyrannies established in Sieille; who founded and erected a temple to Good-Fortune. Pr the also when he was highly praised and commended at Athens for having flaineking Cotys with his owne hand; It was God(quoth he) who for to doe the deed used my hand. And Theopampus king of the Lacedemonians, when one faid unto him that Sparta was faved and flood vpright, for that their kings know how to rule well; Nay rather (quoth he) because the people know how to obey well: and to fay a truth, both these depend one upon the other; howbeit, most men are of this opinion, and so they give out; that the better part of policie or knowledge belonging to civill government lieth in this, to fit men, and frame them meete to be well ruled and commanded; for in every citie there is alwaies a greater number of fubjects than rulers, and 10 ech one in his turne (especially in a popular state) is governour but a while, and for it, afterwards continueth governed all the rest of his life, in such fort, that it is a most honest and profitable apprentiship (as it were) to learne for to obey those who have authoritie to command, although haply they have meaner parts otherwise, and be of lesse credite and power than our selves: for a meer abfurditie it were, that (wheras a principall or excellent actour in a Tragedie, fuch as Theodorus was or Potus, for hire waiteth oftentimes upon another mercenaric plaier who hath not above three words in his part to fay, and speaketh unto him in all humilitie and reverence, because peradventure he hath the roiall band of a diademe about his head, and a seepter in his hand) in the true and unfained actions of our life, and in case of policie and government, arich and mightie person should despise and set light by a magistrate for that he is a simple man o-20 therwife, and peradventure poore and of meane estate, yea and proceede to wrong, violate and impaire the publike dignitie wherein he is placed, yea and to offer violence thereby unto the authoritie of a State; whereas he ought rather with his owne credite and puissance; helpe our the defect and weakenesse of such a man, and by his greatnesse, countenance, his authoritie: for thus in the citie of Lacedemon, the kings were woont to rife up out of their thrones before the Ephori, and who foever els was furnmoned & called by them, came not an ordinary foot-pace, or faire and foftly, but running in great hafte, in token of obedience, and to shew unto other citizenshow obeifant they were, taking a great joy and glorie in this, that they honour their magistrates, not as some vaine-glorious and ungracious sots, voide of all civilitie and manners, wanting judgement and difcretion, who to thewe forfooth their exceeding power upon which 30 they stande much and pride themselves, will not let to offer abuse unto the judges and wardens of the publike games, combats, and pastimes, or to give reprochfull termes to those that leade thedance, or fet out the plaies in the Bacchanale feast, yea and mocke captaines, and laught at the prefidents & wardens of the publik exercises for youth, who have not the wit to know; That to give honour is oftentimes more honorable than to be honored: for furely to an honourable person who beareth a great sway,& carieth a mightic port with him in a citic, it is a greater ornament & grace to accompany a magistrate, and as it were to guard and squire him, than if the said magistrate should put him before or feeme to waite upon him in his traine; and to say a truth, as this were the way to worke him displeasure and procure him envie from the hearts of as manie as fee it; fo the other would win him true glorie which proceedeth of love and benevolence: 40 And verily when fuch a man is feene otherwhiles in the magistrates house, when he faluteth or greeteth him first, and either giveth him the upper-hand, or the middle place as they walke together, he addeth an ornament to the dignitie of the citie, and loofeth thereby none of his own. Moreover, it is a popular thing, and that which gaineth the hearts of the multitude, if fuch a perfon can beare patiently the hard tearmes of a magistrates whiles he is in place, and endure his cholericke fits; for then he may with Diomedes in Homer fay thus to himselse:

> How ever now I little do say, It will be mine honor another day.

Or as one faid of Demost benes; Well, he is not now Demost benes onely, but he is a law-giver, he is a prefident of the facred plaies and folemne games, and a crowne he hath upon his head, &c. 50 and therefore it is good to put up all nowe, and to deferre vengeance untill another time; for either we shall come upon him when he is out of his office, or at least wife wee shall gaine thus much by delay, that choier will be well cooled and allaied by that time.

Moreover, in any government or magistracie whatsoever, a good subject ought to strive (as it were) a vie with the rulers, especially if they be persons of good fort and gracious behaviour, in diligence, care, and fore-cast for the benefit of the State; namely, in going to them, to give socice and intelligence of whatsoever is meet to be done, in putting into their hands for to be executed that which he hath with mature deliberation rightly resolved upon, in giving meanes unto them for to win themselves honour, and that by the benefit of the common-weale: But if fuch persons they be, as either for seare & false heart, or upon a froward peevishnesse & disposition give no eare to such motions, and are not willing to putthat in execution which is present ted unto them; then it is his part himselfe in person to go and declare the same in publike place to the body of the people, and in no wife to neglect, difanull, or paffe with connivence any thing that concerneth the weale-publike, and never to pretend any colourable excuse, by fav. ing, it appertained unto none other but the head magistrate, thus to deale curiously and be bus. he occupied in medling with the affaires of States for a general law there is which giveth alwajes the first and principall place of rule in a common-wealth unto him who dealeth justly, practifeth righteousinesse, and knoweth what is expedient and profitable, as we may see by the example of to Xenophon, who in one place writeth thus of himselfe: There was in the armie (quoth he)onenamed Xenophon, who was neither Lord Generall, nor Lieutenant; but for skill and knowledge of that which was to be done, and for resolution to enterprize and execute the same, put himselfe forward and gave charge unto others, wherein he so behaved himselfe that he saved the Greeks. And the most glorious feate of armes that ever Philopemen atchived was this, that when her heard newes how king Agis had furprized the citie of Meffene, and that the generall of the Achaeans would not go with aide and rescue, but drew backe for feare; he with a troupe of the most forward and resolute gallants, without warrant or commission from the State, delivered the faid citie from out of the hands of Agu: which I write not as if I allowed innovations or fuch newe enterprizes and extraordinary attempts upon every finall and light occasion, but 10 onely either in time of need and extremitic, as Philopemen did then, or for honest occasions, as Eparimendas, who continued in his Beotarchie fower moneths longer than was ordinary by the lawes of the countrey, during which time he put on armes, and entred into Lacoma, reedified Meffene, and peopled it, to the end that if afterwards there should ensue any complaint or imputation, we may answer with credit, and either alledge for excuse, necessitie, or set against ithe perill to which we exposed our selves, the bravenesse of the exploit, and the service so well performed, to make amends and recompence.

There is reported a fentence of Jason who long fince was the Tyrant or Monarch of Sielle, which he had often in his mouth, and alwaies repeated so often as he did violence or outrages to any of his subjects, that they cannot choose but commit unjustice in sinal matters, who would go justice in great causes; as if a man would say, that necessarie it is for him to offer wrong in detaile who mindeth to do right in the grosse. But a stouching this sentence, a man may some perceive at the first sight, that it is a speech meet for him that intendent to make himselse and folute lord, and to ulurpe tyrannie. Yet is this rule more civill and politike, that a governour to gratisfe the peole, is to passe by small matters, and to winke at them, that hee may in greater things stand against them, and stay them from breaking out to farre. For he that in everiething will be peering and looking too narrowly without any yeelding or relaxation, but is alwaies severe rigorous and inexorable, doth by his example traine and accustome the people likewise to be quarrelsome and contentious with him, yea and to be readie upon all occasions to take of sense and discontentionent:

But lofily for to strike the saile Or stacke the helme doth much availe With violence when billowes great Arise and on the ship do beat.

and even so a governour ought in somethings to yeeld, and not to bee so precise and straight laced himselfe, but to sport as it were and take his passimes graciously with his people, as namely to celebrate settivall facrifices, beholde solemne plaies, games, and combats, and to sit in the theaters with them, partly in making semblant as though he neither saw nor heard many things, like as we are wont to doe by the saults at home of our little children; to the end that the authoritie of reproving them roundly, and admonishing them frankely, like unto the vertue of a me so dicine not dull and enervate with much use, but remaining still in sully sign and strength, may be more effectuall, carie the greater credite, touch the quicke indeed, and sting in matters of greater consequence. Alexander the great, when he heard that his sister had beene too samiliarly acquainted with a lustie yoong gentleman and a beautifull, was nothing displeased therewith, but said; Weimust give her also a little leave to enjoy somewhat the pleasure and prerogative of a prince; which was neither well done of him to allow such things in her, nor yet with good respect of his owne honour and dignitie; for we ought not to thinke this the fruition, but the ruine and dishonour rather of a princely State. And therefore a wife governour will not permit as much as possibly lieth in him, that the bodie of the people shall doe injurie to any particular inhabitants, as namely in confifcation of other mens goods, or in distribution and parting among themselves the money of the common stocke; but to resist such courses with all his power, and with remonstrances, perswasions, threats, and menaces withstand the inordinat defires of a multitude: contrarie to the practife of Cheon and his followers at Uthens, who feeding and foftering fuch foolish appetites and corrupt humors of the people, caufed many drone bees (as Plato faith) to breed in the city, who did no other good but fling and pricke one or other. But if the people at any time take occasion by solemnising some festivall to day, according to the cultome of the countrey, or by the honour of fome god or goddeffe, to fer out any goodly fliew, play or stately spectacle, or to distribute some small dole, or to exhibit a pleafant gratuitie, honest courtesie, or publicke magnificence; lawfull it is and reasonable, that they should in such cases enjoy in some fort the fruit both of their libertie, and also of their wealth and prosperitie. For in the governments of Pericles and Demetrius Phalereus, there bee many examples extant of the like nature; as for Cimon he beautified the market place of Athens with rowes of palme trees, planted directly, and raunged by him, with pleafant walkes and faire allies. And Cate feeing about the time of Carilines conspiracie, that the commons of Rome were in a commotion and hurliburly by the faction of Julius Calar; and growen in manner to these tearmes, for to bring in a change and alteration of the whole State; perswaded the Senate 20 to ordeine, that there fhould be some pery dole of money given among the poore commoners; which comming in fo good and fit a time, appealed the tumult, and repressed the sedition and infurrection that was like to grow. For like as a learned and expert physician, after hee hath taken away a great quantitie of corrupt blood from his patient; giveth him anon fome little nourishment that is good and holsome; even so a discreet and well advised ruler of a popular State. when he hath put the people by fome great matter which tended to their thame and loffe, will againe by fome light gratuitie and pleafure which he is content to graunt, cheere and recomfort them, yea and allay their moode when they bee readie to whine and complaine. And otherwhiles, good pollicie it is, of purpose to withdrawthem from fome soolerie, unto which without all sense and reason their minde and affection standeth, to draw and leade them unto other 20 things that be good and profitable; like as Demades his practife was, at what time as he had the receit of all the revenues of the citie under his hands; for when the people of Athens were fully bent to fend foorth certeine gallies, for to fuccour those who had taken armes and rebelled against Alexander the great, and to that effect commaunded him to disburse money for the charges, hee made this speech unto them; My matters, there is money ready for you, for I have provided fo, that I purpose to deale among you at this feast of Bacchanales, that everie one of you may have halfe a Mua of filver now if you lift to employ the fame money to the fetting out of a fleet, you may doe what pleafeth you with your owne, use it, or abuse it at your pleasure, it is all one to mee: by this cunning device, having turned them from the rigging and manning of the armado which they purposed to set out, and all for feare 40 they should lose the benefit of the foresaid dole or largeste which hee promised and pretended. he staied them from offending king Alexander, that he had no cause to finde himselfe greeved with them. Many fuch fits and humors are the people given unto, both hurtfull and dammageable unto them; which it were impossible to breake them of, going directly to worke; but a man must go about with them, & by turnings & windings compasse them to his mind-like as Phoeion did upon a time when the Athenians would have had him in al hafte to make a road & invade the countrey of Benia; for he caused incontinently proclamation to be made by found of trumpet; That all citizens from fourteene yeeres of age upward unto threefcore, should shew themfelves in armes and followhim; upon which proclamation, when there arose a great noise and flirre among the elder fort, who began to mutine, for that he woulde force them at those yeeres 50 to the warres: What a strange matter firs is this (quoth he) I my selfe am fourescore yeeres of age, and you shall have me with your for your captaine. By this meanes a politicke governour may put by and breake the ranke of many unfeafonable and needleffe embaffages; namely, by joining many of them in commission together, and those whom he seeth to be unfit altogether for fuch voiages; thus may he stay the enterprises of going in hand with many great buildings unnecessary and to no purpose, in commanding them at such times to contribute money thereto out of their owne purfes, also hinder the processe of many uncivill and undecent sures, namely, by affigning one and the fame time for apparance in court, and for to be emploied in follici-

ting causes abroad in forren parts: & for to bring these things about, he must draw and affociate unto him those principall authors who have drawne out in writing any such bils to be proposed, or have incited the people and put those matters in their heads; and to them he shall intimate those crosse courses above said; for either if they start backe and keepe out of the way, they shall feeme themselves to breake that which they proposed; or if they accept thereof and be present, they shall be sure to take part of the trouble and paines that is imposed upon them. Now when there shall be question of any exploit to be done of great consequence, and tending much to the good of the State, which requireth no finall travell, industrie, and diligence; then have a foe, ciall regard and endevour, I advise you, to chuse those friends of yours who are of most sufficiencie, and of greatest authoritie, and those among the rest which are of the mildest and best na. 10 ture; for fuch you may be fure will croffe you least, and affift you most; so long as they have wit at will, and be withall voide of jealousie and contention. And heerein it behooveth a man to know wel his owne nature, and finding that whereunto he is leffe apt than an other, to chuse for his adjuncts those rather who he perceiveth to be better able to go through with the businessein hand, than fuch as otherwife be like unto himfelfe: for fo Diomedes being deputed to go inefviall for to view the campe of the enimies, chose for his copanion the warieft & best advised perfon of all the Greeks, & let passe the most valiant souldiours. By this meanes all actions thallbe counterpoifed best, & lesse jealousie and emulation will grow betweene them who are desirous to have their good parts & valor feeme indifferent in vertues & qualities. If you have a caple to plead, or be to go in embassiage; chuse for your companion & affistant (if you find your selfenot 20 meet to speak) some man that is eloquent, like as Pelopidas in the like case chose Epaminondas. If you thinke your felfe unmeet to enterteine the common people with courtefie & affability, and of too high and loftie a minde for to debase your selfe and make court unto them, as Callitratidas the captaine of the Lacedemonians was; take one unto you who is gracious, and can skill to court it and give enterteinment. If your bodie be weake or feeble, and not able to endure much paines; have one with you who hath a stronger bodie, and who can away with travell, as 24 juins did Lamachus. For this is the reason that Geryones was so woonderfull, because that having many legs, many armes, and many eies, yet hee with all them was ruled and governed by one foule. But wife governors if they accord and agree well, may conferre and lay together not onely their bodies and goods, but also their fortunes, their credits and their vertues, and make 10 use of them all in one affaire, in such for that they shall compasse and execute fully whatsoever they enterprise, much better than any other whatsoever; and not as the Argonautes did, who after they had left Hercules, were constrained to have recourse unto the charmes, socceries and enchantments of women for to fave themselves, and to steale away the golden sleece.

Certaine temples there be, into which who foever did enter, must leave without doores all the gold that they had about them; and as for iron they might not prefume to goe with all into any one what foever. Confidering therefore that the tribunall and judiciall feat of justice is the temple of Justice, furnamed the Counsellor and Patron of cities, of Themis also and Dice, that is to fay, equitie and justice; before ever thou set foote to mount up into it, presently rid and cleete thy soule of all avarice and covetous nesses of monie, as if it were iron, and a very maladie full of 40 rutt, and throw it faire from thee into the merchants hall, into the shops of tradelinen, occupi-

Thun it I say as far off as you can, & make this reckoning, that who soever enricheth himselfe by the managing of the common-weale, is a church-robber, committing sacrilege in the highest degree, robbing temples, stealing out of the sepulchers of the dead, picking the coffers of his friends: making himselfe rich by treachery, treason, & false-witnes: thinke him to be an untrusty and faithlesse connseller, a perjured judge, a corrupt magistrate, and full of briberie; in one word polluted and defiled with all wickednesse, and not cleere of any sinne whatsoever that may be committed; and therefore I shall not neede to speake more of this point.

As for ambition, although it carrie with it a fairer shewe than avarice, yet neverthelesse bringeth after it a traine of mischieses and plagues, no lesse dangerous and pernitious unto the government of a common-wealth: for accompanied it is ordinarily with audatious rashnesse more than it; inasmuch as it useth not to breed in base mindes, or in natures seeble and idle, but principally in valiant, active, and vigorous spirits; and the voice of the people, who by their praises list it up many times and drive it forward, maketh the violence thereof more hard to be restrained, managed, and ruled. Like as therefore Plate written, that we ought to accustom yong boies even from their verie infancie to have this sentence resounding in their cares: That it is not lawfull for them neither to carrie gold about their bodies as an outward ornament, nor fo much as to have it in their purses, for that they have other golde as a proper coffer of their owne, and the same incorporate in their hearts: giving us to understand by these anigmaticall and covert speeches (as I take it) the vertue derived from their auncestors, by descent and continuation of their race; even fo wee may in some fort cute and remedie this defire of glorie, by making remonstrance unto ambitious spirits, that they have in themselves gold, that cannot corrupt, bee wasted or contaminated by envie, no nor by Monus himselfe the reproover of the gods, to wit Honour, the which we alwaies encrease and augment, the to more we discourse, confider, meditate, and thinke upon those things which have beene performed & accomplished by us in the government of the common-weale; and therefore they have no need of those other honours, which are either cast in moldes by founders, or cut and graven in braffe by mans hand, confidering that all fuch glorie commeth from without foorth, and is rather in others than in them, for whom they were made. For the statue of a trumpeter which Polycletus made, as also that other of an halbarder are commended in regard of the maker, and not of those whom they do represent, and for whose sake they were made. Certes, Cato at what time as the citie of Rome began to be well replenished with images and statues, would not fuffer any one to be made for himfelfe faying: That he had rather men would aske, why there was no image fet up for him, than why it was ? For furely fuch things bring envie, and the com-20 mon people thinke themselves indebted stil & beholden unto those, upon whom they have not bestowed such vanities: and contrariwise, such as receive them at their hands are odious & troublefom unto them, as if they had fought to have the publike affaires of the State in their hands, in hope to receive fuch a reward and falarie from them againe. Like as therefore he that hath failed without danger along the gulfe Syrtis, if afterwards hee chaunce to bee call away and drowned in the mouth of the haven, hath done no fuch doughty deed, nor performed any speciall matter of praise in his voyage and navigation; even so, hee that hath escaped the comon Treasurie, and done well enough and faved himselse, from the publike revenewes, customes, and commodities of the State; that is to fay, hath not defiled his hands, either with robbing the citie-money, or dealt underhand with the farmers and undertakers of the cities hands, reve-30 newes,&c. and then shall suffer himselfe to be overtaken and surprised with a defire to be a prefident and fit higheft, or to be the head man and chiefe in counfell of a citie, is runne in deed upon an high rocke that reacheth up a loft, but drenched hee is over the eares, and as like to finke as the rest, neverthelesse. In best case he is therefore, who neither seeketh nor desireth any of these honours, but rejecteth and refuseth them altogether. Howbeit, if peradventure it bee nocalie matter to put backe a grace and favour, or some token of love, that the people otherwhiles defire to show unto them who are entred into combat, as it were in the field of government, not in a game and maisterie for a filver prize, or for rich presents, but in the game in deed which is holy and facred, yea and woorthie to be crowned, it may fuffice and content a man to have some honourable inscription or title, in a tablet, some publike act or decree, some branch 40 of lawrell or the olive : like as Epymenides who received one branch of the facred olive, growing in the castle of Athens, because he had cleansed and purified the citie: and Anaxagorus resisfing all other honours which the people would have ordained for him, demaunded onely, that upon the day of his death the children might have leave to play, and not go to schoole all that day long. The feven gallant Gentlemen of Persia, who killed the Tyrants, called Magi, were honoured onely with this priviledge, that both they and their posteritie might weate the Persian pointed Cap or * Turbant, bending forward on their heads: for this was the signall which they were agreed upon among themselves when they went to execute the said enterprise, Likewise the honor which Pitmens received, did shew some modesty & civilitie: for when his citizens had permitted & granted unto him to have and enjoy of those lands which he had con-50 que red from the enemie, as much as he would himfelfe; he ftood contented with fo much, & no more as lay within one fling or fhot of the javelin which he launced himselfe. And Cooles the Roman tooke fo much ground onely as he in his owne person could care with a plow in one day, being as he was a lame and maimed man. For a civill honour ought not to be in the nature of a falarie for a vertuous act performed, but a token rather and a memoriall that the remembrance thereof might continue long, as theirs did whom erewhiles we named: whereas in those three hundred statues of Demetrius Phalereus, there gathered not so much as rust, canker, or any ordure or filth whatloever, but were all of them ere himselfe died, pulled downe and broken.

And as for the images of Demades, melted they were everie one, and of the mettall were made pispots and basins for closestooles: yea and many such honours have been defaced, as being displeasant and odious to the world, not in regard onely of the wickednesse of the receiver. but also of the greatnesse and richnesse of the thing given and received: and therefore the good. lieft and fureft fafegard of honour, that it may endure and laft longeft, is, the least cofflineffe and price beflowed thereupon: for fuch as bee excessive massie and immeasurall in greatnesse. may bee well compared unto huge coloffes or flatues not well ballaifed and counterpoifed, nor proportionably made, which soone fal downe to the ground of theselves. And here in this place I cal Honors, these exterior things which the common people (so far forth as beseemeth them, according to the faying of Empedocles) lo call. Howbeit I also affirme as wel as others, that a wife to governor & man of State ought not to despife true honor which consisteth in the benevolence & good affection of those who have in remebrance the services and benefits that they have received neither ought he altogether to contemne glorie, as one who forbare to pleafe hisneighbours among who he liveth, as Democratus would have him: for neither ought horse-keepers or esquierries of the stable, reject the affection of their horses lovingly making toward them; nor hunters the fawning of their hounds & spaniels; but rather seeke to win & keepe the same for that it is both a profitable, and also a pleasant thing, to be able for to imprint in those creatures who are familiar, & do live & converse with us such an affectio to us as Lysimachus his dogshe. wed toward his master; & which the poet Homer reporteth that Achilles horses shewed to Patro. elus. For mine own part I am of this mind, that Bees would be better entreated & escape better, 20 in case they would make much of those, & suffer them getly to come toward them, who north them and have the care and charge of them, rather than to sting and provoke them to anger as they do; whereas now, men are driven to punish them and chase them away with smoake: also to breake and tame their frampold and unruly horses with hard bits and bridles, yea and curst dogs which are given to run away, they are faine to lead perforce in collars, or tie up and hamper with clogs. But verily there is nothing in the world that maketh one man willingly obcifant and subject to another, more than the affiance that he hath in him for the love which hee beareth, and the opinion conceived of his goodnesse, honestie and justice; which is thereafon that Demosthenes said verie well: That free cities have no better meanes to keepe and preferve themselves from tyrants, than to distrust them; for that part of the soule whereby webe-10 leeve, is it, which is most case to be taken captive. Like as therefore the gift of prophesie which Caffandra had, stood her countrey-men and fellow-citizens in no steed, because they would no ver give credit or beleefe unto her: for thus the speaketh of her selfe, Godwould not have my voice propheticall When I for etell of things, to take effect, Nor do my countrey any good at all: Or why? alwaies they do my words reject. In their distresse and woes, they would correct Their folly past, then am I wife and sage: Before it come they say I do but rage.

even fo, on the otherfide, the trust and confidence that the citizens reposed in Archytas, the good will and benevolence which they bare unto Battus, ferved them in right good flead: for that they used and followed their counsell, by reason of the good opinion which they conceived of them.

This is then the first and principall good which lieth in the reputation of States-men, and those who are in government, namely, the trust and considence which is in them; for it maketh an overture, and openeth the doore to the enterprise and execution of all good actions. The second, is the love and affection of the people, which to good governours is to them a buckler and armor of defence against envious and wicked persons:

Much like unto a mother kind who keepes away the flies From tender babe whiles (weetly it a fleepe in cradell lies.

putting backe envie that might arise against them; and in regard of might and credit, making equall a man meanly borne & of base parentage, with those who are nobly descended, the poore with the rich, & the private person with the magistrates : and to be briefe, when vertue & vertiy are joined together with this popular benevolence, it is as mightie as a strong and steedy gale of a forewind at the poope, and driveth men forward to the managing and effecting of all publikeaffaires what foever. Confider now and fee what contrarie effects the disposition of peoples hearts, doth produce and bring foorthby these examples following. For even they of traffe when they had in their hands the wife and children of Denys the Tyrant, after they had vilanoully abused, and shamefully forced their bodies, did them to death, and when they had burnt them to ashes, threw and scattered the same out of a ship into the sea. Whereas one Menander who reigned graciously over the Bactrians, in the end, when he had loft his life in the warres was honorably enterred: for the cities under his obeifance joined altogether, and by a common accord folemnized his funerals and obsequies with great mourning and lamentation; but as tou-To thing the place where his reliques should be bestowed, they grew into a great strife and contention one with another, which at the last with much adoo was pacified upon this condition and composition, that his ashes should be parted and divided equally among them all, and that evericcitie should have one sepulcher and monument of him by it selfe. Againe, the Agrigentines after they were delivered from the Tyrant Phalaris, enacted an ordinance: That from thence foorth, it should not be lawfull for any person what soever to we are a roabe of blew colour, for that the Guard & Pensioners attending about the faid Tyrant, had blew cassockes for their liveries. But the Persians tooke such a love to their Prince Cyrm, that because he was hauke noted, they ever after and even to this day, affect those who have such noses, and take them to be best favoured. And verily of all loves, this is the most divine, holy and puissant, which cities and 20 States do beare unto a man for his vertue: as for other honors to fallely called, and bearing no true enfignes in deed to reftifie love, which the people bestow upon them, who have builded theaters and shew-places, given them largesses, congraires and other doles, or exhibited combats of Sword-fenfers at the sharpe: these wrong entituled honors do resemble the glosing flatteries of harlots and ftrumpets, who fmile upon their lovers, fo long onely as they give them any thing or gratific them in any pleafure; and fuch a glorie as this latteth not long, but after a day or two patieth away and is gone. He who foever he was, that faid first: That he who began to give money by way of largeste unto the people, taught the verie high way to overthrow a popular state, knew verie well, that the people lofe their authoritie, when they make themselves subject and inseriour by taking 30 fuch gifts: and even they also who are the givers must know thus much: That they overthrow themselves in buying their reputation so costly & at so high a price: & by that means they make the multitude more haughtie and arrogant, because thereby the people do presume, that it is in their power to give or take away fo great a thing. I write not this, as though I would have a man of estate in his lawfull expenses and allowable liberalities, to shew himselfe too neere and mechanicall, especially when his State will beare and maintaine the same: for that, in truth, the people carrie a greater hatted to a rich man, who will not part with any of his goods among them, than a poore man who robbeth the common cheft: for they suppose the one to proceed from pride and contempt of them, and the other from meere need and necessitie. I would wish therefore that first and principally these largestes should come by way of gratuitie and for no-40 thing, for that in fuch a fort, they make the authors thereof better efteemed and admired, and befides they binde and oblige the receivers fo much the more. Secondly, I would that they were done upon a good, honest, and laudable occasion, as namely for the honour of some god; a thing that draweth on the people more and more to devotion and religion, because withall, it imprinteth in the hearts of the people a vehement opinion and strong apprehension that the majestie of the gods, must need sbe a great and venerable thing, when they see those who honor them, and whom they repute for fo woorthie and noble personages, so affectionate unto them, as for their fervice and worthip to be at fuch coft and spend so liberally, Like as therefore Plato forbad yoong men who went to the Musicke schoole, that they should not learne either the Lydian & Phrygian harmony; for that the one stirred up in our hearts all lamentable, dolefull, and 50 dumpish affections, the other increased the inclination to pleasure, riot, and voluptuous sensualitie; even so, as touching these largesses and publike expenses, banish and chase out of your citie as much as you can, those which provoke in our hearts beaftly, barbarous, and bloody affections, or fuch as feed loofeneffe and scurrilie: or if you be not able to rid them out cleane, yet do your endevour at least wife to hold off and contest against the people, to your uttermost power, who cal upon you for fuch spectacles; & order the matter so alwaies, that the subject matter of your dispense may be honest and chast, the end and intention good and necessarie, or at

ture your State be but meane, and that the center & circumference of your goods containeand comprehend no more than to ferve and supply necessities, know well this: that it argueth neither a base mind nor an illiberall & ungentlemanlike heart to be known of your poverty, and so to give place unto other, who have wherewith to defray fuch ambitious expenses & liberalities, and in by endebring & engaging your felfe in the usurers books, to be a spectacle both to be pit. tied & laughed at, for fuch publike ministeries: for asmuch as they who soever they be that so do, cannot go to worke fo fecretly, but it will be thought and knowen how they enterprize above their abilitie, be driven to trouble and make bolde with their friends in borrowing of them, or els to flatter and court usurers to take up money at interest, in such fort as that they shall win so honour and credit, but rather shame and contempt by such expenses; in which regard, good it to were in these cases to set alwaies before your eies the examples of Lamachus and Phocion. For Photion one day when the Athenians at a folcome facrifice called inflantly upon him to contribute fome money toward the charges: I would be ashamed (quoth he) to give you any thing, and in the meane while not be able to keepe my credit, and paie that I owe to this man heere, and withall he pointed unto Callieles the userer unto whom he was then indebted. As for La. machus in his accounts of charges whiles he was lord generall of an armie under the Athenians in any expedition, put in alwaies, Thus much for a paire of shoes or pantofles for himselfe: Item, fo much for a garment. The Theffalians ordeined and allowed unto Hermon who refufed to be their captaine generall, because he was poore, a slagon or little runlet of wine moneth. ly, and a measure or bushell and halfe of meale every fower daies: whereby you see it is no to shame for a man to confesse his povertie; neither have poore men lesse meanes to winnecredit and authoritie in the government of cities, than they who lay out and fpend much in making fealts or exhibiting publike thewes and spectacles, for to gaine the good will and favour of the people; provided alwaies, that by their vertue they have gotten reputation and libertie to speake their mindes frankly and freely unto them. And therefore a good governour ought wifely to mafter and rule himfelfe in thefe cafes; he must not (I fay) enter into the plaine and champion ground on foote for to encounter with horsemen; nor being poore, to be seene in the race and shew-place for to set out games, or upon the scatfold & theater to represent plains, or in great hals full fet with tables to make feafts, and all to contend with rich men about gloric and magnificence; but he is to studie how to manage the people by vertue, by gentlenesse, by to wit and understanding joyned alwaics with wife words, wherein there is not onely honestic and a venerable port, but also a kinde of grace more amiable, attractive, and defireable,

Than Cræsius coine of silver and gold, Or all the money that can be told.

For to a good man it is not necessarie to have a surly, coy, and presumptuous looke; neither is it required that a wise and sober person should carie a sterne and rigorous countenance,

Who as he walks along the streets, in citie or in towne, Doth cast a strarpe and hideous eie, and on his neighbours frowne. But contrariwife, a good man is first and formost affable and lightfome of language, of easte acceffe, and readie to be spoken withall who soever comes, having his house open alwaies, (as it were) an haven or harbour of refuge, to as many as have occasion to use him. Neither is this debonairity and care of his, feene onely in the bufineffe and affaires of fuch as employ him, but also in this; that he will as well rejoice with them who have had any fortunate and happie succeffe, as condole & greeve with those unto whom there is befallen any calamitie or misfortune; never will he be knowen to be troublesome, and looke for double diligence of a number of servitors and verlets to waite upon him to the baines or flouphes; nor to keepe a stir for taking up and keeping of places for him and his traine at the theaters where plaies and pastimes are to bee seene, ne yet desire to be conspicuous and of great marke above others in any outward signes of 50 excessive delights and sumptuous superfluities; but show himselfe to be equall, like and surable to others in apparell, in his fare and furniture at the table, in the education and nouriture of his children, in the keeping of his wife for her state and array, and in one word, be willing to carrie and demeane himselfe in all things, as an ordinary and plaine citizen, bearing no greater port and shew than others of the common multitude; moreover, at hand to give advise and counsell friendly to every man in his affaires, ready to enterteine, defend, & follow their causes as anadvocate, freely, and without taking fee or any confideration whatfoever; to reconcile man and wife when they be at ods, to make love daies and peace betweene friends, not fpending one littlepecce of the day for a fnew at the tribunall feat, or in the hall of audience for the commonwealth, and then afterwards all the day & the rest of his life, drawing unto himselfe al dealings, all negotiations and affaires from everie fide for his owne particular behoofe and profit, like unto the north-eaft winde Cecias, which evermore gathereth the clouds unto it; but continually bending his minde and occupying his head in carefull studie for the weale publike, and in effect making it appecre unto the world, that the life of a Statef-man and a governor, is not as the commonfort thinke it, easte and idle, but a continuall action and publike function: by which fashiops and semblable courses that he taketh, he gaineth and winneth unto him the hearts of the to people, who in the end come to know, that all the flattering devifes and entifements of others be nothing else but false baits and bastard allurements, in comparison of his prudence and carefull diligence. The flatterers about Demetrius vouchfafed not to call any other princes and potentates of his time, Kings, but would have Seleuen to be named the Commander of the clephants; Lyfmachus the keeper of the treasurie; Ptolomeus the admirall of the sea; and Agathoeles the governour of the iflands. But the people although peradventure at the first they reject a good wife and fage person among them; yet in the end after they have seene his truth, and knowen his disposition and kinde nature, they will repute him onely to bee popular, politike, and woorthie to be a magistrate indeed, and as for the rest, they will both repute and call one, the warden and fetter out of the plaies; another the great feaster; and a third, the president of 20 games, combats, and publike exercises. Moreover, like as at the feasts and bankets that Callias or Alcibiades were at the cost to make, none but Socrates was heard to speake, and all mens eies were cast upon Socrates; even so in cities and States governed aright, well may Ismenias deale largesfes; Lichas make feasts, and A iceratus defray the charges of plaies, but Epaminondas, Aristides, Lylander, and such as they, are those which beare the magistracie, they governe at home, they command and conduct armies abroad. Which being well and duly confidered, there is no cause why you should be discouraged or dismaid at the reputation and credit that they win among the people, who have for them builded theaters, and erected flew-places, founded halles of great receit, and purchased for them common places of sepulture, for to burie their dead: all which glorie lafteth but a while, neither hath it any great matter, or venerable substance in it, 30 but vanisheth away like smoke, and is gone even associate the places in such theaters, or games in shew-places are done and ended.

They that have skill and experience of keeping and feeding bees, doe hold opinion and faie, that those hives wherein the bees yeeld the biggest found, make most humming and greatest stir within, like best, are most found, healthfull, and yeeld most store of honie: but he upon whom Godhath laid the charge and care of the reasonable swarme (as I may say) and civill societie of men, will judge the happineffe and bleffed state thereof most of all by the quietneffe and peace therein, and in all other things he will approove the ordinances and statutes of Solon, endevoring to follow and observe the same to his full power; but doubt hee will and marvell what hee should meane by this, when he writeth, that he who in a civill fedition would not range himselse 40 to a fide, and take part with one or other faction, was to bee noted with infamie: for in a naturall bodie that is ficke, the beginning of change toward the recoverie of health, commeth not from the diseased parts, but rather, when the temperature of the found and healthie members is so puissant, that it chaseth and expelleth that which in the rest of the bodie was unkind & contrary to nature; even so in a citie or State where the people are up in a tumult & sedition, so it be not dangerous and mortall, but fuch as is like to be appealed and ended, there had need to be a farre greater part of those who are found and not infected, for to remaine and cohabit still; for to it there commeth and hath recourse that which is natural and familiar, from the wise and discreet within, and the fame entreth into the other infected part and cureth it: but fuch cities as be in an univerfall uprore and hurly-burly, utterly perish and come to consussion, if they have not 50 some constreint from without, and a chastisement which may force them to be wise and agree among themselves. Neither is my meaning, that I would have you a politike person and Statef-man in such a fedition and civill discord to sit still, insensible and without any passion or feeling of the publike calamitie, to fing and chaunt your owne repose and tranquillitie of bleffed and happie life, and whiles others be together by the eares, rejoice at their follie; for at fuch a time especially you are to put on the buskin of Theramenes, which served as well the one legge as the other; then are you to parley and common with both parties, without joyning your felfe to one more than to the other; by which meanes, neither you shall be thought an adversarie, because you are not ready to offend either part, but indifferent to both, in aiding as well the one as the other, and envie shall you incurnone, as bearing part in their miserie, in case you seeme to have a fellow-feeling and compassion equally with them all: but the best way were to provide and forecast, that they never breake out to tearmes of open sedition; and this you are to thinke for to be the principall point, and the height of all pollicie and civill government; for evident it is, and you may easily see, that (of those greatest blessings which cities can desire, to wit, peace, libertic, and freedome, plentie and fertilitie, multitude of people, and unitie and concord) as touching peace, cities have no great need in these daies of wise governors, for to procure or mainteine the same, for that all wars both against the Greekes and also the Barbatians are chased away and gone out of sight; as for libertie, the people hath as much as it pleases their sovereignes and princes to give them, and peradventure if they had more it would be woorse for them; for the fertility of the earth, and the abundance of all fruits, the kind disposition and temperature of all seasons of the yeere,

and that children fo borne may live and be live-like, every good and wife men, wil crave at Gods hands in the behalfe of his owne fellow citizens. Now there remaineth for a States-man and politike governour, of all those works proposed one onely, and that is nothing inferiour to the 20 rest of the blessings above-named, to wit, the unitie and concord of citizens that alwaies dwell together, and the banishing out of a citie of all quarrels, all jarres and malice, as the maner isin composing the differences and debates of friends; namely, by dealing first with those parties which seeme to be most offended, and to have taken the greatest wrong, in seeming to be injuried as well as they, and to have no leffe cause of displeasure and discontent than they; afterwards by little and little to fecke for to pacific and appeale them, by declaring and giving them to understand, that they who can be content to strike faile a little, do ordinarily go beyond those who thinke to gaine all by force; furmount them I fay not onely in mildeneffe and good nature, but also in courage and magnanimitie, who in yeelding and giving place a little in small matters, are masters in the end and conquerors in the best and greatest; which done, his part is to make 30 remonstrance both particularly to every one, and generally to them all, declaring unto them the feeble and weake estate of Greece, and that it is very expedient for men of found and good judgment to enjoy the fruit and benefit which they may have in this weakenesse and imbeciline of theirs, living in peace and concord one with another as they does confidering that fortune hath not left them in the midft any prize to winne or to strive for. For what glorie, what authoritie, what power or preeminence will remaine unto them that haply should have the better hand in the end, & be mafters over their adversaries, but a proconfull with one commandement of his will be able to overthrow it, and transport it unto the other fide, as often and when so everit pleafeth him; but fay that it should continue stil, yet is it not woorth all this labour and travell about it. But like as scare-fires many times begin not at stately temples and publike edifices, but 40 they may come by fome candle in a private and little house, which was neglected or not well looked unto, and so fell downe and tooke hold thereof, or haply straw or rushes and such like stuffe might earth fire and suddenly flame, and so thereupon might ensue much losse, and a publike wafting of many faire buildings; even so it is not alwaies by meanes of contention and variance about affaires of State, that feditions in cities be kindled, but many times braules and riots arifing upon particular causes, and so proceeding to a publike tumult and quarrell, have beene the overthrow and utter subversion of a whole citie. In regard whereof, it perteinethunto a politike man, as much as any one thing els, to foresee and prevent, or else to remedy the fame, to fee (I fay) that fuch diffentions do not arife at alsor if they be on foot to keep them down from growing farther and taking head, or at leaftwife that they touch not the State, but reft fill to among whom it began: confidering this with himfelfe & giving others to understand, that private debates are in the end causes of publike, and, small of great, when they be neglected at first, and no convenient remedies used at the verie beginning. Like as by report the greatest civill diffention that ever hapned in the citie of Delphos, arose by the meanes of one Crates, whose daughter Orgilaus the sonne of Phalus was at the point to wed : now it hapned by meere chance that the cup, out of which they were to make an effay or effusion of wine in the honour of the gods first, and then afterwards to drinke one to another, according to the nuptiall ceremonies ofthat place, broke into peeces of it felfe, which Orgilaus taking to be an evill prefage, for fooke his espouled bride, and went away with his father, without finishing the complements of marriage. Some few daies after, when they were facrificing to the gods; Crates conveied covertly or underhand a certaine vessell of gold, one of those which were facred and dedicated to the temple, unto them, and so made no more adoo, but caused Orgilans and his brother, as manifest church-robbers, to be pitched downe headlong from the top of the rocke at Delphos, without any judgement or forme and processe of law: yea and more than that, killed some of their kintfolke and friends, notwithft anding they entreated hard, and pleaded the liberties and immunitie of Minerones temple, furnamed Provident, into which they were fled and there tooke functuarie. 10 And thus after divers fuch murders committed, the Delphians in the end put Crates to death and those his complices, who were the authors of this sedition, and of the money and goods of these excommunicate persons (for so they were called) seazed upon by way of confiscation, they built those chapples which stand beneath the citie. At Syracuse also, of two young men who were verie familiarly acquainted together, the one being to travell abroad out of his countrey, left in the custodie of the other a concubine that he had, to keepe untill his returne home againe; but he in the absence of his friend abused her bodie: but when his companion upon his returnehome knew thereof, he wrought fo, that for to crie quittance with him he lay with his wife and made him cuckold: this matter came to hearing at the counfell table of the citie, and one of the ancient Senatours mooved the rest, that both twaine should be banished out of the 20 citie, before there arose further mischiese, and lest the citie by occasion of their deadly sewd should be filled with parts taking of both sides, and so be in danger of atter destruction; which when he could not perswade and bring to passe, the people grew into an open sedition, and after many miserable calamities, ruinated and overthrew a most excellent State & government. You haue heard I am fure of domesticall examples, and namely the enmitte of Pardalus and Tyrrhenus, who went within a verie little of overthrowing the citie of Sardis, and upon finall and private causes, had brought the same into civill war and open rebellion by their sactions and particular quarrels. And therefore a man of government ought alwaies to be watchfull and vigilant, and not to neglect, no more than in a bodie naturall the beginnings of maladies, all little heart-burnings and offences that quickly paffe from one to another, but to flay their course, and reme-30 diethe same with all convenient speed. For by a heedfull eie and carefull prevention, as Cato faith, that which was at first great, becommeth small, and that which was small commeth to nothing. Now to induce and perfwade other men fo to doe, there is not a more artificiall device, nor a better meanes, than for a man of government to fhew himselfe exorable, inclined to pardon, & easie to be reconciled in like cases; in principal matters of weight & greatest importance resolute and constant without any rankor or malice, and in none at all seeme to be selte-willed, peevish, contentious, cholerike, or subject to any other passion which may breed a sharpnesse and bitterneffe in neceffarie controverfies, and doubtfull cafes which can not be avoided. For in those combats at buffets which champions performe for pleasure in manner of foiles; the manner is to binde about their filts certaine round mustles like bals, to the end that when they 40 come to coping and to let drive one at another, they might take no harme, confidering the knocks and thumps that they give are so fost, and can not put them to any paine to speake of; even so in the sutes, processes and trials of law which passe betweene citizens of the same citie, the best way is to argue and plead by laying downe their allegations and reasons, simply and purely, and not to tharpen or envenime their matters like darts and arrowes, with poiloned taunts, railing tearmes, opprobrious speeches and spightfull threats, and so to make deepe wounds, and the fame feltured with venim, whereby the controverfies may grow incurable, and augment still in such fort, that in the end they touch the State. He that can so cary himselfe in his owne affaires, as to avoid these foresaid mischies and dangers, shalbe able to compasse others in the like, and make them willing to be ruled by reason: so that afterwards, when once the particular occasions of privile grudges be taken away, the quarrels and discords which touch a common-wealth, are sooner pacified and composed, neither doe they ever bring any inconveniences hard to be cured or remedilefle.

NAGE PUBLICKE AFFAIRES.

The Summarie.

He title of this discourse discovereth sufficiently the intention of the Author: but, for that they who manage affaires of State, and namely men in yeeres, fall oftentimes I into one of these two extremities as touching their duetie, namely, that they be either 100 flacke and remisse, or else more stiffe and severe than they ought; these precepts of 20

100 flacke and remije, or eye more juye and you to be flacke, and who (as we may gather Plutarch, a man well conversed in high places and offices, and who (as we may gather to be dilivently read consider by his words)was well striken in age when he wrote this Treatise, ought to be diligently read considered and practifed by men of authoritie. And albeit this booke containeth some advertisements in that behalfe, which fort not wholy with the order of government put in practife in these our daies: yet foit is, that the fundamentall reasons are sowell laid, that any politician or States-man building therupon, may affure himselfe that he shall raise & edific some good piece of worke. Now he beginneth with the refutation of one common objection of certaine men, who enjoine & command elder folke to fa If ill and remaine quiet, and he prooveth the contrarie, namely, that then it is meet that they should put themselves foorth more than ever before; but he addeth this correction and caveat withall, that they have beene a long time alreadie broken (as it were) to the world, and beaten in publike affaires, to 30 the end that they be not taxed and noted for their slender carriage or light vanitie, nor proove the cause of some great mischiefe, medling as they do in that which they had not wel comprehended before, After this he proposeth and laieth abroad the examples of men well qualified, who have given good proofe of their sufficiencie in old age: whereupon he inferreth, that those be the persons indeed unto whom government doth appertaine, and that to go about for tomake such idle now in their latter dates, were as absurde and as much injurie offered unto them, as to confine a prudent Prince and wife King to some house in the countrey: and this he inforceth and verifieth by eloquent comparisons, and by the example of Pompoius. Which done he settesh downethe causes which ought to put forward, and moove a manwell flept in yeeres to the government of a common-weale, confusing those who are of the contrarie opinion, and prooving that elderly persons are more fit therefore than younger, be 40 cause of the experience and authoritie that age doth association, as also in regard of many other rea-Jons: then he returneth the objection upon them, and sheweith that young folke are unmeet for publike charges, unleffethey have beenethe disciples of the aged, or be directed and guided by them: be refuteth those also who esteeme that such a vocation resembleth some particular trafficke or negotiation: and when he hath so done, he takethin hand againe his principall point, detecting and laying open the folly of those who would bereave old men of all administration of publike matters: and then he exhorteth them to take heart and skunne idlenesse (which he doth dissame wonder fully) and setteth before their eles their duetie, which he also considereth inparticular: then he adviseth them not 10 take so much upon them; not to accept any charge unworthie, or not beseeming that gravitie which time and age hath given them, but to occupie and busie themselves with that which is honora- 50 ble and of great consequence; to endevour and strive for to serve their country, and above all in matters of importance; to use good discretion as well in the refusal as the acceptation of dignities and of ffices carying themselves with such dexterity among yoong men that they may indust & set them into the way of vertue. And for a conclusion, he teacheth all persons who deale in State affaires what resolution they foould put on and carry thither sthat they have an affured testimonie in themselves; that they be affectionat fervitours of the common-weale.

WHETHER

WHETHER AN AGED MAN ought to manage publike affaires.

E are not ignorant ô Euphanes that you are woont highly to praise the poet Pindarus, and how you have oftentimes in your mouth these words of his, as being in your conceit well placed and pithily fpoken to the point,

When cames of price and combats once are set, Who (krinketh back and doth pretend some let, In darkneffe hides and deepe obscurine His fame of vertue and activitie.

But forafmuch as men ordinarily alledge many causes and preten-

fes, for to colour and cover their floth & want of courage to undertake the businesse and affaires of State, & among others, as the very laft, and as one would fay, that which is of the facred line & race, they tender unto us old age, & suppose they have found now one sufficient argument to dull or turne backe the edge, and to coole the heat of feeking honor thereby, in bearing us in hand & faying. That there is a certein convenient & meet end limited, not only to the revoluti-20 on of yeeres, proper for combats and games of proofe, but also for publike affaires and dealings in State. I thought it would not be impertinent nor besides the purpose, if I should fend and communicate unto you a discourse which sometimes I made privately for mine owne use, as touching the government of common-weale managed by men of yeeres; to the end that neither of us twaine should abandon that long pilgrimage in this world which we have continued in travelling together, even to this present day, nor reject that civill life of ours, which hither to we have led in fwaying of the common weale, no more than a man would cast off an old companion of his owneage, or change an ancient familiar friend, for another with whom he hath had no acquaintance, & who hath not time sufficient to converse & be made familiar with him. But let us in Gods name remaine firme & constant in that course of life which we have chosen 30 from the beginning, & make the end of life & of well living all one and the fame, if we will not (for that finall while which we have to live) diferedit, & diffame that longer time which we have alreadie led, as if it had bin spent foolishly and in vaine, without any good & laudable intention. For tyrannicall dominio, is not a faire monument to be enterred in, as one faid fomtime to Dems the tyrant: for unto him this monarchicall & absolute sovereigntie gotten & held by so unjust & wicked meanes, the longer that it had continued before it failed, the greater & more perfect calamitie it would have broughts according as Diogenes afterwards feeing the faid Diony fius his son become a poore privat man, & deposed fro the princely & tyrannicall dignity which he had. O Diony fine (quoth he) how unworthy art thou of this estate, & how unfitting is it for thee! for thou oughtest not to live here in liberty, & without any feare or doubt of any thing with us, 40 but remaine there stil as thy father did, immured up & confined (as it were) within a fortresse all thy life time, untill extreme old age came. But in truth, a popular government which is just and lawfull, wherein a man hath beene conversant and shewed himselfe alwaies no lesse profitable to the common-wealth, in obeying than in commaunding, is a faire fepulcher for him, to be buried honorably therein, and to bestow in his death the glorie of his life : for this is the last thing (as Simonides faid) that descendeth and goeth under the earth; unlesse we speake of them whose honour, bountie and vertue dieth first, and in whom the zeale of performing their duetie doth faile and cease before that the covetous defire of things necessarie to this life giveth over: as if the divine parts of our foule, & those which direct our actions were more fraile, & died sooner than the fenfual & corporal; which neither were honestie to fay, nor good to beleeve, no more 50 than to give credit unto those who affirme that in getting and gaining onely, we are never weary:but rather we are to bring that faying of Thueydides to a better purpose, & not to believe him who was of minde that not ambition alone and defire of glorie, aged in a man but alfo (and that much rather) sociality or willingnes to live & converse with company, & civility or affection to policy & managing of publik affaires; a thing that doth perfevere & cotinue alwaies to the very end, even in ants and bees: for never was it knowen that a bee with age became a drone; as some there be who would have those who all their life time were employed in the State, after the vigor & strength of their age is past to six still & keepe the house, doing nothing els but eat & feed as if they were mued up, suffering their active vertue, through ease and idlenesse to be quenched & marred, even like as iron is eaten and consumed with rust & canker, for want of occupying. For Cato said verie wisely: That since old age had of it self miseries ynough of the one, they ought not to adde moreover thereunto the shame that proceedeth from vice, for to mend the matter. Now among many vices that be, there is not one that more shameth and defameth an old man than reflivenesse, sold this, delicacie and voluptuous selfe: namely when he is seene to come downess from the hall and courts of suffice, or out of the counsell chamber and such publike places, for to goe and keepe himselie close in a corner of his house like a woman, or to retire into some farme in the countrey to oversee onely his mowers, reapers, and harvest folke, of whom it may be well said, as we reade in Sephodes:

What is become of wife Ocdipus, In riddles a-reeding who was fo famous?

For to begin to meddle in affaires of State in olde age, and not before (as it is reported that one Epimenials: laied him downe to fleepe when he was very yoong, and wakened an olde man fiftie yeeres after) and ere he have shaken off and laied aside so long repose and rest that hath sucke so close unto him by use and custome, to goe and put himselie all at once upon a studen into such travels and laborious negotiations, being nothing trained nor inured therein, not framed nor exercised thereto in any measure, without conversing at all beforehand with men experienced in matters of Estate, nor having practised worldly affaires, might peradventure give good occasion to one that were disposed to reproove and finde sault, for to say that which the 20 prophetesse systems answered once to one who consulted with the oracle of Apollo about the like case:

For government and rule of citie flate, Who ever thou be, thou commest too late: An houre this is undecent and past date, Thus for to knocke at Court or Pallace. gate, like an unmanerly gueft, who commeth to a fealt; or a rude traveller, who feeketh for lodging when it is darke night; for even fo thou wouldest remoove not to a place, nor to a region, but to a life whereof thou hast no proofe and triall. As for this sentence and verse of Simonides,

True it is, if it be meant of them who have fufficient time to be taught and to learne any science which is not gotten but hardly and with much ado after great studie, long travell, continual exercise and practise provided also, that it meet with a nature painfull and laborious, patient and able to undergo all adversities of fortune. These reasons a man may seeme very well and to the purpose to alledge against those who begin when they be well stricken in yeeres to deale in publike affaires of the State. And yet we see the contrary, how men of great wisedome and judgement diverte hildren and yoong men from the government of common weale, who also have the testimonie of the lawes on their side, by ordinance whereof, at Athens the publicke Ciri or Bedle calleth and summoneth to the pulpit or place of audience, not such as yoong Alcibiadst or Pytheus, for to stand up first and speake before the assemblie of the people, but those that be 40 above fiftie yeeres of age; and such they exhort both to make orations, and also to deliver their minds, and counsell what is most expedient to be done.*

And Carobeing accused when he was fourescore yeeres olde and upward, in pleading of his own cause, thus answered for himselse: It is an harder matter my masters (quoth he) for a man to render an account of his life, and to justifie the same before other men, than those with whom he hath lived. And no man there is, but he will confesse that the acts which Casar August a achieved a little before his death in defaiting Antonius, were much more rotall and profitable to the weale-publicke, than any others that ever hee performed all his life-time before: and himselse in restraining and reforming secretly by good customes and ordinances, the dissolute riots of yoong men, and namely, when they mutined, said no more but thus unto them: Listen 50 yoong men, and heare an olde man speake, whom olde men gave eare unto when he was but yoong. The government also of Pericles was at the height and of greatest power and authoritie in his olde age, at what time as he perswaded the Athenians to enter upon the Peloponesiacke watte: but when they would needs in all haste and out of season, set forward with their power to encounter with threescore thousand men all armed and well appointed, who forraied and wasted their territorie, he withstood them and hindered their dessigned enterprise, and that in maner by holding sure the armour of the people out of their hands, and (as one would say) by keeping the gates of the citie fall locked and fealed up. But as touching that which X enophon hath winten of Agefilam, it is worthy to be delivered word for word, as he fetteth it downe in these teatmes: What youth (quoth he) was ever lo gallant, but his age surpassed it? what man was there ever in the flower and very best of all his time, more dread and terrible to his enemies, than Age silaus was in the very latter end of his daies ? whose death at any time was more joyfull to enemies than that of Agefilaw, although he was very olde when he died? what was he that emboldened allies and confederates, making them affured and confident, if Agefilaus did not, notwithstanding he was now at the very pits brincke, and had in maner one foot already in his grave? what yoong man was ever more miffed among his friends, and lamented more bitterly no when he was dead, than Agesilans, how olde so ever he was when he departed this life? The long time that these noble personages lived, was no impediment unto them in atchieving such noble and honourable fervices; but we in these daies play the delicate wantons in government of cities, where there is neither tyrannie to suppresse, nor warre to conduct, nor siege to be raised; and being fecured from troubles of warre, we fit still with one hand in another, being roubled onely with civill debates among citizens, and fome emulations, which for the most part are voided and brought to an end by vertue of the lawes and justice onely with words. Weeforbeare (I fay) and draw backe from dealing in these publicke affaires for seare, confessing our felves herein to be more cowardly and falle-hearted (I will not fay) than the ancient captaines and governours of the people in olde time, but even worfe than Poets, Sophisters and Plaiers in Tragedies and Comedies of those daies. If it be true, as it is, that Simonides in his olde age wan the prize for enditing ditties and fetting fongs in quires and dances, according to the epigram made of him, which tellifieth no leffe in the last verses thereof, running in this maner:

Fourescore yeeres olde was Simonides The Poet, and sonne of Treoprepes, Whom for his carrols and musicall vaine, The prize he won and honour did gaine.

It is reported also of Sophoeles, that when he was accused judicially for dotage by his owne children, who laied to his charge that he was become a children, and had need therefore of a guardian; being convented before the judges, hereheasted in open court the entrance of the chorus, belonging to the Tragedie of his, entituled Occupa in Colono, which beginneth in this wise:

Wel-come stranger at thy entrie,
To villages best of this countrie,
Renowmed for good steeds in sight,
The tribe of faire Colonus sight;
Where nighting alc doth of trefort,
Her dolefull moanes for to report:
Amid greene bowers which she doth hauns,
Her sandrie notes and laies to chaunt,
With voice so strain of sound,

And for that this canticle or fonet wonderfully pleafed the judges and the reft of the company, they all arole from the bench, went out of the Court, and accompanied him home to his house with great acclamations for joy, and clapping of hands in his honour, as they would have done in their departure from the Theater where the Tragedie had bene lively acted indeed. Also it is confessed for certaine, that an epigram also was made of Sophoeles, to this effect:

When Sophocles this somes wrote To grase and honour Herodote, His daies of life by just account, To fiftie five yeeres did amount.

Philemon and Alexis, both comicall Poets, chanced to be atrefted and surprised with death even as they plaied their Comedie upon the stage for the prize, and were about to be crowned with garlands for the victorie. As for Paulus [or Polus] the actour of Tragedies, Eratos sheets and Philochorus do report, That when he was threescore yeeres olde and ten, he acted eight Tragedies within the space of soure daies, a little before his death. Is it not then a right great shame, that olde men who have made prosession either to speake unto the people from the tribunal sear, or to sit upon the bench for to minister justice, should shew less generositie and Kk magnanimitie magnanimitic than those who play their parts upon a scaffold or stage? and namely, in giving over those facred games and combats indeed, to cast off the person of a politician and man of honour, and to put on another (I wot not what) in flead thereof: for I affure you, to lay downe the roiall dignitic of a king, for to take up the personage of an husbandman, were very base and mechanicall: and confidering that Demosthenes faid how the facred galley Paralus was unworthily and thamefully mifuled, when it was put and emploied to bring home for Meidias, wood and timber, flates and tiles, fed muttons or fuch like fatlings: if a man of honour and estate should at any time give up and refigne his dignitie of superintendencie over the publicke feafts of Baotarchie, or government over Baotia, of prefidentship in that great counsell or affemblie of citates called Amplyttiones, and then afterwards be feene occupied in measuring and felling to meale, or the refuse & cakes either of grapes and olives after they be pressed, or to weigh sleeces of wooll, or to make merchandife of their felles; were not this as much altogether, as (according to the olde proverbe) to put on the age of an olde horse without constraint of any persons Moreover, to go to any base and vile occupation or handicrast, or to trafficke in merchandise, after one hath borne office of government in the common-weale, were all one as to turne a gentlewoman well descended, or a sober matron, out of all her faire and decent apparell, forto give her an apron onely and a fingle peticoatto cover her shame, and so to fet her for to keepe in some taverne or victualling house; for even so, all the dignitie, majestie and continuance of vertue politike is quite lost, when it is debased to any such vile ministeries and trades, smelling onely of lucre and gaine. But in case (which is the onely point remaining behinde) they call 20 this a fweet and healthfull life, and the true enjoying and ufe of goods, to be given over to delicacies and pleasures, and doe invite and exhort a politician or man of State, in aging therein, and spending his olde yeeres so, to waste and consume by little and little to nothing: I wot not well unto which of these two pictures, dishonest and shamefull both twaine, this life of his were better to be likened; whether to that of the mariners, who would folemnize the feast of Penus all their life time, being not yet arrived with their ship into the haven or harbour, but leaving it Itill under faile in the open fea; or to the painted table of Hercules, whom fome painters merily and in fport, but not feemely and with reverence, depaint how he was in the roiall Palace and Court of the Lydian queene Omphale, in a yelow coat like a wench, making winde with a fanne, and fetting his minde with other Lydian damofels and waiting-maids, to broid his haire and 10 tricke up himfelfe: even so we despoiling a man of estate of his lions skin, that is to fav, of his magnanimous courage and a minde to be alwaies profiting the common-wealth, and fetting him to take his case at the table, will make him good cheere continually, and delight his eares with pleafant fongs, with found of flutes and other muficall instruments; being nothing at all athamed to heare that speech which sometime Pompeius Magnus gave unto Lucullus, who (afrer his warres and conducts of armies, giving over all regiment of State, wholly was addicted to banes and flouphes, to feafling, to wantonnesse and company with women in the day time, to all diffolute life and superfluous delights, even so much, as to build sumptuous edifices, befeeming rather men of yoonger yeeres) reproved Pompeius for his ambition and defire of government above that which became his age; for Pompetus answered unto him, and said: It is more 40 unfeafonable for an aged man to live loofely and in fuperfluitie, than to governe and bearerule. Againe, the fame Pompey being one day fallen ficke, when his Physician had prescribed hima blacke-bird for to eat, which was at that time out of feafon, and could not be had in the market for any money, and one made answere that Lucullus had good store of them, for he kept and fed them in mue all the yeere long; hee would neither fend to him for one, nor receive any from him, faying withall: What? unleffe Lucullus be a belly-god and glutton, can not Pompey tell how to recover and live? For fay that nature feeketh by all meanes possible to take her pleasure and delight, yet furely the difableth the bodie of old folke, and denieth it the fruition of all pleafures, unlefte it be in some sew necessities of this life; as Eurypides the Poet faith, but also their appetite to eate and drinke is for the most part dull and overthrowen with mosse, and as one would say toothlesse, in such fort as they do but mumble, touch their victuals a little aloft, and hardly and with much adoo enter and pierce inwardly into the same. In which regard they ought to be furnished and provided of pleasures of the mind, not such as are base, illiberall, and vile as Simonides saide unto those who reproched him for his avarice: for being bereft of all other slessly and corporall pleasures by reason of his yeeres, he entertained one still which fed and maintained his old age, and that was the delight which he tooke in getting money & gathering good : but the life politike of those who manage affaires, hath many pleafures, and thole right great and honeft, in which onely or principally it should seeme that the gods themselves take joy and contentment; and these be they that proceed from beneficence, or doing good unto many, and the glorie of fome worthic and noble act. For if the painter Nicias pleased his owne mind so well in his workemanship, and was so affectionate to the operation of his art, that oftentimes he forgat himselfe, and would aske his fervants whether he had washed, and whether he had dined or no: If Archimedes also was so bent & intentive unto the table before him, in which he drew his figures geometricall, that his to fervitours were faine to plucke him from it by force, for to walh and annoint him, and yet in the meane time that they were annointing of him, he would be drawing and describing of new figures upon his owne bodie: If Canus likewise the plaier of the fluit (a man whom you know well enough) was woont to fay: That men wish not how much more mirth he made unto himselfe in his playing, than he did unto those that heard him found; and that they that came to heare his mulicke, ought rather to receive a reward of him, than bestow any money upon him. Do wee not conceive and imagine in our felves, what great pleasures vertues do yeeld unto those who effect any commendable action tending to the good of their countrey, & turning to the profit of the common-weale? they tickle not, they itch not, neither do they after a stroking manner give contentment, as do these sweete motions, and gentle prickes of the flesh; for such bring 20 with them a certaine impatient itch, an unconstant tickling mingled with a furious heat and inflammation; but those pleasures which come from notable and praise woorthie deeds, such as they be, whereof the ordinarie workman and author is he, who governeth a common-weale aright, and asit appertaineth unto him for to doe, lift up and raife the foule to a greatnesse and haughtinesse of courage accompanied with joy, not with gilded plumes (as Furipites faith) but with celeftiall wings (as Plato was woont to fay) And that the truth hereof may the better appeere; call to remembrance your felfe, that which oftentimes you have heard concerning Epaminondas, who being asked upon a time what was the greatest pleasure that ever he selt in all his life answered thus: Marie even this (quoth he) that it was my fortune to win the field at the battell of Leuctres, my father and mother both being yet living. And Salla, the first time that he 30 came to Rome after he had cleered Italy from civill and dometticall warres, could not fleepe one winke, nor lay his cies together a whole night, for exceeding great joy and contentment wherewith his spirit was ravished, as if it had beene with a mightic and violent wind: and thus much he wrote of himfelfe in his owne Commentaries. I can therefore hold well with Xenophon in that hee faith: That there is no found or speech more delectable to a mans eare, than the hearing of his owne praifes; and even fo it must bee confessed: That there is no spectacle no fight, no report and memoriall, no cogitation, nor thought in the world, that bringeth fo great pleasure & delectation to the mind, as doth the contemplation and beholding of those good and laudable deeds, which a man hath performed whiles he was employed in the administration of State and in bearing offices, as being conspicuous, eminent, and publike places to be 40 seene afarre off, True it is moreover, that the amiable grace and favour thereby gotten, accompanying alwaies vertuous acts and bearing witneffe therto; the commendation also of the people who strive a vie and contend who can give out greatest praise and speake most good (the verie guide which leadeth the way of just and due benevolence) doth adde a glosse and lustre (as it were) unto the joy proceeding from vertue, for to polish and beautifie the same. Neither ought a man by negligence to suffer for to fade and wither in old age, the glorie of his good deeds, like unto a coronet or garland of greene leaves which was woon at some games of prize; but evermore to bring foorth some fresh and new demerites, to stir up and awaken (as a man would fay) the grace of the old deeds precedent, and thereby to make the fame both greater, and also more permanent and durable. For like as the carpenters and shipwrights who had the 50 charge to maintaine the ship called the Gallion of Delos evermore made supply of new pieces of timber, as anie of the olde began to decaie, keeping it in continuall reparation by putting in one ribbe and planke for another, and so preserved it alwaies entire and whole, as it was the verie first daie when it was built; even so a man is to doe by his reputation and credit. And no harder matter is it for to maintaine glorie once up and on foote, than to keepe a fire continually flaming which is once kindled, by putting effloones fresh fewell under (bee it never fo little) for to feede the same: but if they bee once out and throughly quenched indeede, then it is no small matter to set either the one or the other a burning againe. And like as Lampas the rich merchant, and shipmaster, being demaunded how he got his goods: Marie (quoth he) my greatest wealth I gained soone and with ease, but my smaller cflate with exceeding much paine and flowly; even foit is no easie matter at the beginning to acquire reputation, or to win credit and authoritie in the managing of civill affaires, but to augment it after the foundation is laid, or to preferve and uphold the fame, when it is once come to greatnes, is not fo hard, for every little thing, & the smallest meanes wil do it. And so we see that a friend when he is once had, requireth not many great pleafures & offices of kindnesse & friend. thip for to be kept and continued a friend fill, but petie tokens & final fignes of curtefie, paffine continually from time to time betweene, are sufficient to preserve mutuall love and amity, Semblablic, the good will and affection of the people, their truft & confidence which they have conceived towards a man, although he be not able evermore to give largeffes among them, al. though he doe not alwaies defend and mainteine their causes, nor fit continually in place of magistracie and office, yet neverthelesse it holdeth still, if he doe but shew himselse onely to carie a good heart unto them, & not to cease for to take paines & care for the common good, nor refuse any service in that behalfe: for even the very expeditions and voiages in warre, have not alwaies battailes araunged, nor fields fought and bloudie skirmishes, ne yet besieging and beleaguing of cities; but they affoord betweene whiles, festivall facrifices, parlies & enterviewes, fome leafure also and time of rest, to follow games, disports, and pastimes. How then commeth it, that an old man should be afraid to meddle in State affaires, as if it were a charge unsupportable, full of infinite and innumerable travels, without any comfort and confolation at all ? confi-20 dering that there be allowed at times, varietie of plaies and games, goodly fights and shewes, folgime precessions, and stately pompes, publike doles and largesses, daunces, musicke and feafts, and ever and anon the honorable fervice and worship of one god or other, which are able to unknit the fromnes and unbend the browes, to dispatch and dissipate the cloudy cares and aufleritie of the judges in court hall, and of fenatours also in counfell chamber, yeelding unto them much more pleafure & contenument in proportion to their travels and paines belonging to their place. As for the greatest mischief which is most to be feared in such administrations of the common weale, to wit, envy, it fetleth & taketh least hold upon old age of any other; for like as Heraclitus was wont to fay: That dogs do baie & barke at those whom they know not; even to envie affaileth him who beginneth to governe, just at the dore as it were, and the entrie of 10 the tribunall and throne of estate, seeking to impeach his accesse and passage thither; but after it is accustomed and acquainted once with the glorie of a man, and when it hath beene nourithed and fed therewith, it is not to troublefome and churlish, but becommet more kinde and gentle; and this is the reason that some have likened envie unto a smoke, which at the first when the fire beginneth to kindle, ariseth grofse and thicke, but after that it burneth light and cleere, vanisheth away and is gone. In all other preeminences and superiorities, men are wont ordinarily to debate and quarrell, namely, about vertue, nobilitie of blond and honour, as being of opinion, that the more they yeeld unto others, the more they doe abridge from themselves; but the prerogative or precedence of time, which properly is called Presbeion, as if a man would fay; the Honor of age, or Time-right, is voide of all jealousse and emulation, and there is no man 40 but will willingly yeeld it to his companion; neither is there any kinde of honour whereunto fo well forteth this qualitie, namely to grace him more who giveth the honour, than the party who is honoured, as to the prerogative which is given to old men. Moreover, all men doe not hope nor expect to have credit one time or other by their riches, by their eloquence or wisedome; whereas you shall not see so much as one of those that rule in common-wealth, to despaire of comming one day to that authoritie and reverence which old age bringeth men unto. He therefore who after he hath wrestled long against envie, retireth in the end from the administration of the common-weale, at what time as it is well appealed and at the point to be extinguished or laid along, should doe like unto that pilot who in a tempest having winde and waves contrarie, spreadeth saile and roweth in great danger, but afterwards when the weather is faire, and a 50 gentle gale of forewinde ferveth, doth goe about to strike faile and ride at anchor in the pleafant funne thine; he should I say in so doing, abandon together with his publike affaires, the societic, fclowship, alliance and intelligences which he had with his good friends; for the more time that he had, the more friends by good reason he ought to havegotten, for to stand with him and take his part, whom he neither cannot all at once leade foorth with him, like as a mafter of carols his whole quire of finging men; nor meete it is and reason that he should leave and sorfake them all: but as it is not an eafie peece of worke to stocke up by the root olde trees, no more is it athing soone done to extirpe a long government in the common-weale, as having manie great rootes, and those enterlaced & enwrapped one within another, by reason of fundric and weightie affaires, the which no doubt must needs worke more trouble and vexation to those that retire and depart from it, than to those that tarrie still by it; and say there remained yet behind for old men some reliques of envic, emulation, and contention, which grew in the time of their government; it were farrebetter to extinguish and quench the fame by power and authoritie, than to turne both fide and backe unto them, all naked and difarmed: for envious persons and cyill willers never doe affaile them fo much with despight, who make head againe and stand their ground, as they doe by contempt those who yeeld backe and retire: and to this accordeth 10 well that which in times past that great Epaminondas faid unto the Thebans. For when the Arcadians had made offer unto them, yea and requested them to enter in their cities, during the winter feafon, and there to lodge and abide under covert; he would not permit them fo to doe, norto accept of their courtese: For now (quoth he) all while that they behold you exercising and wreftling in your armour, they have you in great admiration, as valiant and hardy men; but if they should see you once by the fire side punning and stamping beanes, they would take you to be no better than theinfelves; even fo I would make my application, and inferre heereupon; that it is a venerable and goodly fight to behold a grave and ancient personage speaking to the people, dispatching affaires of State, and generally to be honored of every man; but he who all the day long stirres not out of his warme bed, or if he be up, fitteth still in some corner 20 of a gallerie, prating and talking vainely, or elfe reaching, hawking, spitting, or wiping his nose that drops for cold; fuch an one I fay, is exposed to contempt. Homer verily himselfe hath taught us this leffon, if we will marke and give good care to that which he hath written. For old Nestor being at the warre before Troie, was had in honour and reputation; whereas contrariwise Peleus and Laertes who taried behinde at home were fet little by and despised. For the habitude of wisedome doth not continue the same, nor is any thing like it selfe, in those who give themselves to case, and doe not practife the same; but through idlenesse and negligence it diminisheth, and is dissolved by little and little, as having need alwaies of some exercise of the cognation and thought which may waken the spirit, cleere the discourse of reason, and lighten the operative part of the minde to the dealing in affaires,

Like as both tron and brasse is bright and cleere, All while mans hand the same doth use and weare: Where as the house wherein none dwels at all,

Intract of time must needs decay and fall. Neither is the infirmitie and feeblenesse of the bodie so great an hinderance unto the government of State, in those who above the strength of their age seeme either to mount into the tribunall, or to the bench, or to the generals pavilion and place of audience within the campe, as otherwise their yeeres bring good with them, to wit, considerate circumspection & staied wisedom: as also not to be troubled or driven to a non plus in the managing of any busines, or to commit an abfurditie & error, partly for want of experience, in part upon vaine-glorie, & so to draw 40 the multitude therewith and doe mischiese to the common-wealth all at once; like unto a sea toffed with windes; but to treat and negotiat gently, mildly, and with a fetled judgement, with those who come unto them for advice, or have any affaires or to doe with them. And heereupon it is, that cities after they have fulteined fomegreat shake or adverse calamitie, or when they have beene affrighted, desire streight waies to be ruled by auncient men, and those well experienced; in which cases they have many times drawen perforce an old man out of his house in the countrey, for to governe them, who thought or defired nothing leffe; they have compelled him to lay his hand upon the helme, for to fet all streight and upright againe in securitie, rejecting in the meane while greene headed generals of armies, eloquent oratours also, who knew well enough how to speake aloud, and to pronounce long clauses and periods with one breath, and 50 never fetching their winde; yea and beleeve me brave warriors and woorthie captaines indeede, who had beene able and fufficient to have affronted their enimies, and fought valiantly in the field. Like as upon a time at Athens, the oratours there shewing before Timothem and Iphierates, who were farre stept in veeres, one named Chares the sonne of Theochares, who was a luftie young man, in the flowre of his age, and mightic of bodie, ftripped out of his apparell, defired that, hee who was to be captaine generall of the Athenians, were fuch an one as he for yeeres and for person: God forbid (quoth Timothem) but rather I could with the generals varlet to be fuch an one, who is to carie after him his bed and the furniture thereto belonging. As Kk 3 for the commander and leader of an armie, he ought to be a man that knoweth how to fee into the State, both before and behinde, and who will not fuffer his counfels and refolutions for the weale publike, to be troubled and difordered by any paffion whatfoever: for Sophacles when he was now become aged: I am well appaid (quoth he) that I am now escaped from wanton love and the delights of Venus; as being delivered from the subjection of a furiouslord and raging mafter. But in the administration of the common-wealth, a man is not to avoid and fite one fort of masters, to wit, the love of boies and wenches, but many others which be more outragious than it, and namely emulation and a contentious spirit, desire of vaine-glory, and a longing to be alwaies and in every thing the first and the greatest; a vice that engendreth most of any other, envie, jealousses, conspiracies, and factions; of which old age doth let slack some, to and dull their edge, others it cooleth and extinguisheth cleane, neither diminisheth and intended affection to well doing so much, as it represents and entered in the inclination and affection to well doing so much, as it represents and cutteth off the passing which are too violent and over-hot, to the end that it may applie unto the care and shude about affaires, the discourse of reason, sober, staied, and well settled: howbeit in very truth, and in the judgement of the readers, let this speech of the poet be alledged and spoken for to distinate and distract him, who would with his grisled beard and graic head begin now to be yoong and plaie the youth, as also to taxe and reproove an old grand-fire, who after long repose in his house, out of which he hathnot stirred, no more than 20 in the time of a languishing disease, will needs start up now on a sudden, and all at once bestire his old bones to be a captaine for sooth in all haste, to leade an armie, or els to take upon him the charge of governing a citic. But he that would call away and reclaime one, who hath been trained and employed all the daies of his life in polit ike affaires, and throughly beaten to the world, and the administration of the common-weale, not suffering him to runne forward in that course of life untill he have atteined the goale, nor untill he have gained the prize of his victory, but will seeme to turne him out of his long journey for to take another way; he (Isay) is altogether selected and unreasonable, and nothing resembleth the man we speake of. Like as he who to divert an old man being set out like a youth, with a chaplet of fresh slowers on his head, perfumed with sweet odors, and already to be married, would alledge those verses which in a Tra-30 gadie were sometime said unto Philostetes,

Wall marry shee, to lic close by thy side $
Mas pooreman for pite, at this age
Thus for so wenture upon marriage?

were nothing abfurd nor out of the way, and befide the purpole; for even old folke themselves when they are disposed to be merrie, have manie such jests as these passe currant among them:

Imarrie old, how faire I am bested? Well wot I, for my neighbour I do wed.

But he that would perfwade a man alreadie married, to leave his wife with whom he hath lived fo 40 long in wedlocke, and dwelt together in one house without quarrels and complaints, supposing that because he is now growen in yeeres with her, he should for sake her, and live either a single life apartby himselfe, or else keepe alemon or concubine in stead of his lawfull wedded wife, in my conceit were a verie abfurd for in the highest degree; even so, it standeth to good reason, for to deale with an old man who having one foot already in his grave, or with one Cliden who had beene an husbandman all his life time; or with on Lampon the merchant venturer, who hath done nothing all his daies, but used shipping & trafficke beyond sea; or with some of these Philosophers out of Epicurus his orchard, who love a life to fit still and doe nothing, to admonish and diffiwade them from approching unto the publike affaires of the people, and to counfell them to hold them still to their former accustomed course of life, farre from troubles and busie 50 dealings in common-weale: marie, he that tooke fuch an one as Photion, Cato or Pericles by the hand, and faid: My friend of Athens or Rome, whoever you are, now that you be arrived to withered olde age, make a divorce with the common weale, quit from this day forward all publike administration, all cares and affaires, aswell of counsell as of warre; abandon both the tribunal feat in the citie and also the prætorie or pavilion of State in the campe, retire your selfe into an house in the countrey, and live the rest of your life there with one maid-servant to attend upon you; followyour husbandrie, or els imploy your selse in your private housholde, to take accounts and reckonings of your receivers and factours; furely he should persuade him to unjust things, and exact of a States-man and politician that which neither pleaseth nor yet beforement him. How then? will some man say unto me, never heard we the olde souldiour, how he speaketh thus in the Comedie?

My hoarie haires from warfare set me free, That from henceforth enroll a I shall not be.

Yesforfooth good fir, it is very true; for requisit it is, and fit, that the squites and servitours of Mars should be in the flower and full strength of their age, as those who make profession of warre and the painfull fervices belonging thereto, whose gray haires, although the head piece 10 and morion do hide and cover, yet inwardly their limmes are heavie and decaied by yeeres, and their strength is not to their good will, nor their hand answerable to their heart. But of the minifters of Jupiter furnamed Counseller, Oratour, and Patron of cities, we require not the works of feet not of hands, but of counfel, forecast & eloquence; and yet not such eloquence I meane, as should make aftirre, or raise a noise, out-crie and shout among the people, but that which is full of ripe understanding, of confiderate wisedome, and of good directions and plots well and furely laied. In which persons, the white head and gray beard (which some laugh and make good game at) the crow-foot about the cies, the furrowes in the forehead, the rivels and wrinekles in the face befides appearing, beare witneffe of long experience, and adde unto them areputation and authoritie, which helpe much to perfwade and to draw the minds of the hearers 20 unto their will and purpose. For to speake truely, youth is made (as it were) to follow and obey, but age to guide and command: and that citie or State is preferred, wherein the fage counfels of the elders and the martiall proweffe of the yonger, beare fway together. And for this cause highly and woonderfully are these verses following praised in Homer, and namely in the first upon the same reason also, that counsel of the wifest and principall men assistant unto the kings 30 of Laced emon, for the better government of the State, the oracle of Apollo Pythius first called Πρειγευγένους i. Elders : and Lyeurgus afterwards directly and plainly tearmed Γέρρνημε, i. Old men; and even at this very day, the counfell of Estate in Rome is named a Serate, that is to fay, an affembly of ancient persons. And like as the law and custome, time out of minde, hath allowed unto Kings and Princes the diademe, that is to fay, a roiall band or frontlet, the crowne alfo to fland upon their heads, as honourable mots & enfignes of their regall dignitic and fovereigne authoritie; even so hath nature given unto olde men the white head and hoarie beard as honourable tokens of their right to command, and of their preeminence above others. And for mine owne part, I verily thinke that this nowne in Greeke, 1/2004, which fignifieth a prize or reward of honour, as also the verbe register, which is as much to say, as to honour, continue still 40 in use, as respective to the honour due unto olde men (who in Greeke are called pewis) not for that they bathe in hot waters, or sleepe in softer beds; but because in cities well and wisely governed, they be ranged with kings for their prudence, the proper and perfect goodnesse whereof, as of some tree which yeeldeth winter fruit which is not ripe before the latter end of the yeere, nature bringeth forth late and hardly in olde age: and therefore there was not one of those martiall and brave couragious captaines of the Greeks, who found fault with that great king of kings Agamemnon for making fuch a praier as this unto the gods are

> Then to begin, a goodly fort of ancient captaines bold Affembled hein Nestors ship, acounsell there to hold.

That of the Greeian host which stood of many woorthie men, Such counsellers as Nestor was, they would vouchsafe him ten.

but they all agreed with him, and by their filence confessed, That not onely in policie and civill government, but also in warre, olde age carrieth a mightie great stroke: for according as the ancient proverbe beareth witnesse:

One head that knowes full wifely for toreed, Outgoesten hands, and maketh better speed.

One advice likewife, and fentence grounded upon reason, and delivered with perswasive grace, effecteth the greatest and bravest exploits in a whole State. Well, say that olde age hath many difficulties difficulties and discommodities attending upon it, yet is not the same therefore to be rejected: for the absolute rule of a king, being the greatest and most perfect estate of all governments in the world, hath exceeding many cares, travels and troubles; infomuch, as it is written of king Seleucus that he would often-times fay, if the people wish how laborious and painfull it were to reade and write onely so many letters as he did, they would not deine to take up his diademe, if they found it throwen in their very way as they goe. And Philip being at the point to pitch his campe in a faire ground, when he was advertised that the place would not affoord for age for his labouring beafts: O Hercules (quoth he) what a life is this of ours, that we must live (forfooth) and care to ferve the necessitie of our affes? Why, then belike it were high time to perswade a king when he is aged, for to lay downe his diademe, to cast off his robes of purple, to clad him. 10 felfe in fimple array, to take a crooked staffe in hand, and so to go and live in the countrey, for feare left if he with his gray haires raigned stil, he should feeme to do many superfluous and importment things, and to direct matters out of feafon? Now if it were unfeemely and a meete indignitic, to deale with Agesslaw, with N uma and Darius, allkings and monarchs, afterthis fort; unmeet likewife it is, that we should remove and displace Solon out of the counsell of Areopagus, or depote Cato from his place in the Romane Senate, because of their olde age. Why should we then goe about to perswade such an one as Perieles, to give over and refigne his go. vernment in a popular State? for over & besides, there were no sense at all, that if one have leapt and mounted into the tribunall feat or chaire of estate in his yoong yeeres, and afterwards difcharged upon the people & common-wealth those his violent passions of ambition and other 20 furious fits, when ripe age is now come, which is woont to bring with it difcretion and much wisdome gathered by experience, to abandon and put away (as it were) his lawfull wife, the government which hee hath fo long time abused. The foxe in Aesops sables would not suffer the urchin to take off the tiques that were fetled upon her bodie : For if (quoth she) thou take away these that be already full, there will come other hungry ones in their place; and even so, if a State rejected evermore from administration of the common-wealth those governours that begin once to be olde, it must needs be quickly full of a fort of yoong rulers, that be hungric and thirstie both after glory, but altogether void of politike wit and reason to governe : for how can it otherwise be? and where should they get knowledge, if they have not bene disciples to learne, nor spectatours to follow and imitate some ancient magistrate that manageth state af- 30 faires? The Cards at fea which shew the feat of failing and ruling thips, can not make good fea-men or skilfull pilots, if they have not beene themselves many times at the stearne in the poope, to fee the maner of it, and the conflicts against the waves, the winds, the blacke stormes and darke tempests,

What time in great perplexitie, The mariner doth wish to see Castor and Pollux, twins full bright,

Presaging safetie with their light. How then possibly can a yoong man governe and direct a citie well, perswade the people aright, & deliver wife counfel in the Senate, having but read one little booke treating of pollicy, 40 or haply written an exercise or declamation in the Schoole Lyceum touching that argument? unlesse besides, he have stood close unto the reines, or hard by the helme many a time, & by marking both citie rulers and martiall captaines, how they have but beene put to their trial, and according to the fundry experiences and accidents of fortunes, enclining now to the one fide and then to the other, after many dangers and great affaires, have gotten sufficient knowledge and inftruction before hand? I can not fee how it can be : but if there were no other thing at all besides; yet surely an ancient man is to manage still the affaires of State, and it were but to traine and teach the yoonger, that be to come up after him; for like as they who teach children musick, or to reade, do themselves Sol, fa,& sing the note, they singer& strike the key or strings they reade & spell the letters before them, & all to shew how they should do; even so the anci- 50 ent politician doth frame and direct a yoong man, not onely by reading unto him, by discourfing and advertifing him without foorth; but also in the very managing and administration of affaires, fathioning, forming and calting him (as it were) lively in a mold, as well by operation and example, as by words and precepts. For he that is schooled and exercised herein, not in the schooles of the Sophisters that can speake in number & measure, as in the wrestling hall where the body is annointed with a copolition of oyle & waxe together, against exercises performed without any dauger at all : but (as it were) at the verie publike games indeed, in the view of the whole world, fuch as the Olympicks and Pythicks were: he(I fay)followeth the tracts and footfleps of his mafter and teacher, as faith Simonides:

As suckling soale, that keepes just pace, And runnes with damineverie place.

Thus did Ariftides under Califthenes, Cimon under Ariftides, Photion under Chabrias Cato under Fabius Maximus, Pompeius under Sylla, and Polybius under Philopamen. For all these personages when they were yoong, drew neere and joined themselves with others that were ancient, and having taken root close by them, grew up together with them in their actions and administrations, whereby they got experience and were inured to the managing of the State with to honour and reputation. Aelehmes the Academique Philosopher, when certaine envious sophifters of his time charged him and faid: That he made a femblance and flew, that he had beene the disciple and hearer of Carneades, whereas he never was. I say unto you (quoth he) that I heard the man, when as his speech abandoning the bruit applause and tumultuous noise of the people, by reason of his old age was shut up close and housed (as it were) for to do good more familiarly in private conference. And even fo it is with the government of an aged person, when as not onely his words, but also his deeds be farre remote from affected pompe in outward fliewes, and all vaine glorie. Much like as is reported of the blacke Storke, called this, who by that time that the is become old, hath exhaled and breathed foorth all that firong and finking favour which she had, and beginneth to yeeld a sweet and arromaticall smel; even so, there 20 is no counfell nor opinion in old men, vaine, turbulent, or inconstant, but all grave, quiet, and fetled. And therefore in any wife (as I faid before) if it were but for yoong mens fake onely and no more; elder persons are to weld the affaires of State: to the end that as Plato speaking of wine mingled with water, faid that it was to make the furious god wife, by challifung him with another that was fober and temperate: the staid wifedome of old age tempered with youth, swelling and boiling before the people, and transported with the greedy defire of honour, and with ambition, might cut off that which is furious, raging and over violent.

But over and befides all that hath beene faid before, they who thinke, that to be employed in the managing of publike affaires, is all one as to faile for trafficke, or to go foorth to warre in fome expedition, are much deceived: for both navigation & alfo war, men undertake for a cer30 taine end, and no fooner have they attained thereto but they ceafe: but the managing of State affaires is not a commission or office pretending or intending any profit and commoditie for the scope that it shootesth at; but it is the lite and profession of a living creature, which is gentle, tame, civill, and fociable, borne to live so long as it pleaseth nature, civilly, honestly, and for the publike good of humane focietie. This is the reason, that of a man it should be faid, that he still is occupied in such affaires of common-weale, and not that he hath beene so employed: like as to be true, and not to have beene true; to be just and not to have beene just; to love his countrey and citizens, and not to have loved them, is his dutie and profession. For even nature her selfed directeth us hereto, and singeth this lesson in our eares (Ispeake to those who are not altogether corrupted and marred with floth and idlenesse)

Let us not cease nor any end finde

Thy father thee, aman hath once begat: To profit men alwaies, in thu or that. Againe:

As touching them who pretend and alledge for excuse, feeblenesse or imporencie, they do accuse sicknesses were aware persons and alledge for excuse, feeblenesse or imporencie, they do accuse sicknesses were aware persons simply from the adminstration of the bodie rather than age. For you shall see many young men sicke & feeble, and as many old solke lusty & strong; so we are not to remoove aged persons simply from the adminstration of the common-weale, but the imporent onely and unsufficient; not to call unto that vocation yong men, but such as be able to undergo the charge:

50 for Aridam was yong enough, and Antigonm in yeeres; and yet this man as olde as he was, went within a little of conquering all Asi; but the other had never but the bare name onely of a King, like as in a dumbe-shew upon a stage, making a countenance onely with a guard of partizans and halberds about him, without speaking one word; and so he was a ridiculous spagean and laughing stocke among his nobles and peeres, who were alwaies his rolers, and led him as they list. And even as he who would perswade Prodiem the Sophister, or Phileras the poet (yong men both, howbeit leane, feeble, fickly, and for the most part of their time bed-ridden) for to meddle with government of State, were a very soole and senselesses in the order the order shall essent on whit better, who should debarre such old men as Phoeian, as Masarisa the African, or Cato the Romane, from exercising publike magistracie in citie, or taking the charge of a Lord Generall in the steld: for Phoeian one day when the Athenians all in the haste, would needs have gone forth to warre at an unseasonable time, commaunded by proclamation that as many as were not above threescore yeeres of age, should arme and follow him now when they were offended and wroth hereat: Why? my masters (quoth he) what cause have you to complaine? I will go with you my selfe and be your captaine, who carie already above fourscore yeeres on my backe. And of Massarissa, Polybius written in his storie, that he died when he was fourscore and ten yeeres old, and left behind him at his death a sonne of his owne bodie begotten, but sower yecresold: also that a little before his dying day, he overthrew the Carthaginians in a raunged battell, so and the morrow after was seene eating savourly at his verie tent doore a piece of browne bread: and when some marvelled at him why he so did, he answered thus out of the Poet sophoeles:

For iron and brasse, be bright and cleare All while mans handshe same doth weare, But the bouse wherein none dwels at all

In time must needs decay and fall. and even as much may be faid, of the the luttre, gloffe and resplendent light of the minde, by which we discourse, we remember, conceive and understand. And therefore it is generally held and faid, that kings become much better in wars and militarie expeditions, than they be all the 20 whiles they fit still quietly at home. In such fort, that it is reported of King Atralus, the brother of Eumenes, how being enervate by long peace and rest, Philopemen one of his favourites led him up and downe as he lift by the nofe, and indeed being fed as fat as a beaft, he might do with him what he would; fo as the Romans were wont to aske by way of mockerie ever and anon, as any failed out of Afir, whether the king were in grace and favour with Philopamen, and might do any thing with him? There could not eafily be found many Romane captaines more sufficient warriours in allkinde of service than was Lucullus, so long as he was in action, and mainteined his wit and understanding entier; but after that he gave himselse over once to an idle life, and fat mued up (as it were) like an house-bird at home, and medled no more in the affaires of the common-weale, he became very dull, blockish and benummed, much like to sea spungesas-30 ter a long calme, when the falt water doth not dash and drench them; so that afterwards hee committed his olde age to be dieted, cured and ordered unto one of his affranchifed bondflaves, named Callifthenes, by whom it was thought he was medicined with amatorious drinks, and bewitched with other charmes and forceries, untill fuch time as his brother Marcus difplaced this fervitour from about him, and would needs have the government and disposition of his person the rest of his life, which was not very long. But Darius the father of Xerxes was wont to fay: That in perillous times and dangerous troubles, he became the better and much wiser than himselfe. * Aeleas a King of Seythia said, that he thought himselfe no better than his horse-keeper, when he was ilde. Dionysius the elder being demaunded upon a time, whether he were at leifure and had nought to do? God defend (quoth he) that ever it should be so with me: 40 for a bow (as they fay) if it be over-bent will breake, but the mind if it be over-flacke. For the verie musicians themselves, if they discontinue overlong the hearing of their accords; the Geometricians likewise, to proove & resolve their conclusions, the Arithmeticians also to exercise continually their accounts and reckonings, together with the verie actions do impaire by long time and age the habitudes that they had gotten before in their feverall arts, albeit they be not fo much practike as speculative sciences: but the politike habitude, which is Prudence, Discretion, Sage, advise, and Justice, and besides all these, Experience which can skill in alloccurrences how to make choise of opportunities and the verie point of occasions, as also a sufficiencie to be able with good words to perswade that which is meet; this habitude (I say) and knowledge can not be preserved & maintained, but by speaking often in publike place, by doing 50 affaires, by discoursing and by judgement: and a hard case (it were) if by discontinuing and leaving off these goodly exercises, it should neglect and suffer to voide out of the mind so many faire and laudable vertues: for verie like it is, that in fo doing all humanitie, fociable courtefie, and gratitude in time, for want of use and practise would decay and fade away, which in deed should never cease nor have an end. Now if you had Tithonus for your father, who indeed was innortall, howbeit by reason of extreme age standing in need continually of great helpe and carefull attendance, would you avoide all good meanes? would you denie or be weary of doing him dutifull fervice, namely, to wait upon him, to fpeake unto him, to find talke with him, and to fuccour him everie way, under a colour and pretenfe that you had ministred unto him long enough? I trow you would not. Our countrey then, resembling our father, or our mother rather according to the tearme Mires, which the Candiots give it, which is more aged, and hath many more rights over us, and straighter obligations of us, than hath either father or mother, how durable and long lived so ever it be, yet notwithstanding subject it is to age, and is not sufficient of it selfe, but hath alwaies need of some carefull eie and good regard over it, and requiresh much succour and vigilance; she (I say) plucketh unto her aman of honour and policie, the takes sure hold and will not let him go,

That aged men ought to governe the common-wealth.

you know well that there be many Pythiades, that is to fay, five yeeres terames gone over my head, fince I began first to minister as Priest unto Apollo Pythias: but yet (I suppose) you would not say thus unto me: Plutareh, you have facrificed enough now; you have gone in procession often enough, already, or you have lead a sufficient number of dances in the honour and worship of your god; now you are growen in yeeres and become aged; it were time now, that you laid off the coronet which you weare on your head in token of your priestshood, and give over the oracle by reason of your old age. Neither would I have you thinke that it is lawfull for you, notwithstanding you be farre stept in yeeres, to relinquish and resigne up your 20 holy service of supster the tutor and patron of cities, the president of civill assemblies and counfels; you (stay) who are the sovereigne high priest, and the great prophet of the sacred ceremonies of religion politike wherein you thus long time have bene entred and prosessed.

But laying afide if you thinke good, these arguments that may distract and pull an old man from the administration of the State; let us discourse philosophically, and consider a little upon this point: namely, that we doe not impose upon old age any enterprise and travel, which is cither too greevous or unbeferning, confidering that in the univerfall government of the common-weale, there be many parts befitting well enough and agreeable to that age whereunto both you and I at this prefent be arrived. For like as if of dutie we were commanded to continue finging all our life long, we are not bound after that we be growen to great age for to reach un-30 to the highest, lowdest, and most shrill notes, considering that there be in musicke many divers tunes and different intentions of the voice, which the muficians call harmonies; but reason would that we make choife of that which is eafiest for our yeeres, and most surable to our nature and disposition; even so fince that to speake and manage affaires is to men more naturall during their whole life, than finging to fwannes even unto their houre of death, we multnot abandon that affection of faying and doing, as if we should fling away an harpe too high set, but we ought to let the same downe by little and little, taking in hand those charges and offices which be leffe painfull, more moderate, and better according with the strength and manners of old folke: for even our verie bodies, we that are aged doe not fuffer to rest still without all exercise, and allow them no motion at all, because we can no more handle the spade to dig the ground, 40 nor weld the plummets of leade in the exercise of dauncing, nor pitch the barre, fling the hammer, call the coit, or throw a stone farre from us, or fight and skirmish in our armour, or handle sword and buckler as we could have done in those daies; yet we can abide to swing and hang at a rope for to stretch our limmes, we can away with shaking of our bodies moderately in a pendant ship, coach, or easie horse litter; we like well enough of walking gently, and devising one with another upon the way, and mainteining pleasant discourses, wakening and reviving our vitall spirits, and blowing as it were the coles to kindle our naturall heat: and therefore let us not suffer our selves to grow over colde, nor stiffe and starke as if we were frozen and congealed through our floth and idlenesse; neither on the other side overcharge our selves with all offices, nor be readicto lay our hand to all ministeries and functions, nor enforce our old age 50 convinced of impotencie to come at length to these or such like words, Angood right hand, how gladly wouldft thou take The launce to couch, and pike in skirmift shake: But now alas, this forward will to fight, Thy seeblenesse doth checke, and worke thee spight.

For neither is the man himfelfe, who is able enough and in the floure of his yeres, commended, if he should undergo and lay upon his shoulders all the affaires of the common-wealer, and not suffer any man else with him to take some part (like as the Stoicks affirme that Jupiter is content to do)but engaging himselse in all things, and medling in every matter, either upon an unsatiable defire of glorie, or for envie that he beareth to those, who in some measure would have their part of honour and authoritie in the common-weale. But unto an auncient person I affure you, (although you should case him of infamic in this behalfe) yet it were a painfull ambition, and a most laborious desire of rule to be present personally at all elections of magistrates; yea and a miserable curiositie to wait and attend every houre of judgement in court, and all meetings and affemblies in counfell; also an intollerable humour of vaine-glorie to stand at receit and catch every occasion of embassage, or knowevery verduict of our grand-jurie, or undertake the patronage of all publike causes whatsoever; and say that all this might be performed with the favour and love of every man, yet greevous it is, and above the ordinarie strength of that age. 10 But what will you fay if they meet with the cleane contrarie? for to young men they be odious, because they let nothing passe their owne hands, but intercept from them all occasion and meanes of action, not giving them leave to arife and put themselves foorth; as for their equals, this covetous defire of theirs to hold the highest place in all things, and to have the fole authoritie every where, is no leffe hated of them, & accounted infamous, than either avarice or loofe life, and voluptuousnesse in other old folke. And therefore like as(by report) king Mexander the great, not willing to overcharge his horfe Bucephalus when he grew in age, used to mount other courfers before the fight began, for to ride up and downe to review his armie and all the quarters and regiments thereof, but after he had ranged it in array, & fet his fquadrons and companies in ordinance of battell, and given the fignall, he would alight and get upon his backe 20 againe as he was woont, and presently march directly affront his enemies, give the charge, and hazard the fortune of the field: even so a politike man of State, if he be wife and of found judgement, will favour his strength a little, when he feeleth himselfe aged, as he holdeth the reines in his owne hand, he will forbeare to deale in those charges which are not altogether so necessarie, and fuffer younger men to manage matters of lesse importance; but in weightic affaires of great consequence, he will lay to both his owne hands in good earnest, contrary unto the practife of the champions in publike games and combats of prife, who carefully looke unto their bodies without touching at all any necessary works, and all to employ and use them in needleffe, unprofitable, and superfluous feats: butwe contrariwise letting passe by the petie and fleight charges, are to referve our felves whole and entire unto those that be serious and of mo-30 ment indeed: for a yoong man as Homer faith, all things befeeme indifferently & alike, all the world finileth on him, every body loveth him; if he enterprise small matters, and many in number, they fay he is a good common-wealths man, he is popular, he is laborious, if he undertake great works and honorable actions, he hath the name of generous, noble & magnanimous; yea, and divers occurrences there be, wherein rashnesse it selfe and a contentious humour of emulation have a kinde of grace, and become gaily well fuch as be fresh and gallant youthes; but for a man of yeeres, who during the administration of the common-weale, undertaketh these and fuch like ministeries and commissions; namely, the letting to ferme the customes & revenues of the citie, the charge of mainteining an haven, or keeping of the market place and common hall in order and reparation; over and befides, the embaffies and voiages in forren parts to princes 40 and potentates, or the riding in poste thither, to treat about no matter of necessitie nor weighty affaires of any importance, but onely to falute them or make court unto them, or performe fome offices of course and courtefie: In my conceit, and be it spoken unto you my good friend, he is to be pitied for it, and his case is rather lamentable than commendable. To others haply it may seeme an odious trouble & a burdensome matter for him so to be emploid; for surely this is not an age wherein a man should be encumbred with any offices, but such as wherein there is dignitic, grandence & reputation, such as that is, which your selfe at this time do execute in Athens, to wit, the prefidence of the counsell or senate called Arionagus, and verily of that kinde also is that dignitic of being one of that honorable counsell and affemblie of the States, called AmphyEtiones, which your countrey hath conferred upon you by patent to hold all your life 50 time, the labour belonging whereto is pleasant, the paines easie, and the travell tolerable. Howbeit I would not have an auncient person to range and hunt after these offices, nor to accept them, as demaunding the fame, but to receive them by way of refufall, fo as he may feeme to take them volens nolens, not as meanes for to be himselfe in honor, but as one that meant by his acception to grace and honour them. For it is no shame as Tiberius Cafar was woont to fay, for men above three-score yeres of age to reach forth their hand to a physician for to have their pulse felt; but rather to stretch out their hands to the people, in praying them to give their voices or fuffrages with them at the election of magistrates; for this is a very vile and base thing: as contratiwise there is in this a certeine venerable majestie, and a dignitie right honotable; that when the countrey hath elected one to bee a magistrate, when they call upon him and give attendance at his doore, heeshould then come downe unto them out of his house, with a kinde of reciprocall honour of his part, a cheerefull countenaunce and courteous behaviour to the people againe, to falute, embrace, wel-come, and accept this their present, woorthy indeed and beseeming honourable old age. Semblablic also in some fortan auncient man ought to use his speech in the congregation and assemblie of the people, not running ever and anon and leaping up into the pulpitor place of audience to make an orato tion unto the people, nor readic alwaies like as a cocke croweth againe when hee heareth others, to counterchaunt (as it were) to all those that make any speech, nor in fashing upon them, and striving to take hold and vantage of their words, to unbridle the reverence that yoong men beare toward him, nor to breed in them by that meanes matter to exercise and accustome themselves in disobedience and unwilling nesse to heare him: but hee must otherwhiles feeme topaffe by, and make femblance as though hee faw and heard nothing, and give them leave a little to brave it, to fling out, and cast up the head like a wanton yoong horse, neither to bee present, among or to learch curiouslie into everie thing that is done or saide, especially when the daunger is not great, nor a matter touching the fafetie of common weale, nor any honour and reputation; for there in such cases he ought not to stay untill he be cal-20 led, but to put foorth himselse and to runne even above the ordinarie strength of his age, or elle if hebe not able, to yeeld his bodie to be led by hand and fufteined up by folkes armes, yea and to be caried in a chaire; as the historied oth report of Appine Claudius, who having heard that the Senate of Rome after a great foughten field which king Pyrrhus had woon of the Romaines, inclined to accept of articles and capitulations tending to a composition and to peace, could not endure that indignitie, nor conteine himselfe, (blinde though he were of both hiseics) but would needs be carried through the common place even to the fenat house; and being entred in upon his feet, he stood in the mids of them all and faid: My masters, hitherto I have beene grieved for the loffe of mine eie-fight, in that I could not fee; but now I wish that I had loft the use also of mine earcs, and that I might not heare the shamefull counsels & cour-30 festhat you take, befides the lewd exploits that you performe; then partly by reprooving them flarply, and in part by his effectuall reasons and remonstrations exciting them, he wrought so, that perswaded they were presently to resume armes for to fight with Pyrrhus, for the leignorie and empire of Italy. And Solon at what time as the flatterers of Pilistrates wherewith he abused the people of Athens, were openly detected and discovered, and that it appeared once that he aimed at nothing else but to usurpe tyrannic over them, and when no man durst make head against him and empeach or crosse his dessignes, himselse alone bringing foorth armour out of his house, and laying the same in the street before his very doores; cried with a loud voice unto the citizens for to aide him; which when Pifitratus heard, hee fent unto him for to demaund & know upon what affurance that he had, he durft be fo bold as thus to do? Mary (quoth 40 he) I prefume upon mine old age. Such occurrences as these so necessarie, doc rekindle and set on fire againe old men, who were in maner extinct and cleane dead before, provided, that there remained in them any sparke or breath at all: but in other smaller occasions, an auncient personage shall do well and wifely to excuse himselfe otherwhiles, and refuse base or vile ministeries, wherein greater toile and paines groweth unto them that be emploied therein, than profit and commoditie doth accrue unto the parties for whose sake they be undertaken. It salleth out also formtimes, that if he ftay untill he be called and fought unto, until he be defired, & that they fend to seeke for him at his house, he shall win more credit and authoritie among his citizens by comming among them in the end at their request: and fay that he be prefent in place, he shall be filent himselfe for the most part & suffer younger men to speake, as being the judge of civill 50 contention and emulation among them, provided alwaies that the fame exceed not a certaine meane; for then he shal reproove them mildly, after a kind & loving fort cut off all opinionative debates, all head-strong opinions, all opprobrious tearmes and heat of choler. Now the advices and opinions delivered of any matter in question, his part is to comfort and encourage him that commeth short of the point, not reprooving and blaming him at all, but rather teaching him how to do better against another time, yea and to praise him boldly, who hath done well, and fuffer his owne felfe willingly to take the woorfe and be overcome, giving the place to some many times, and not disdame to becovermatched and perswaded by reason: to the end that they may take the better heart and be more bold, and ready to helpe out and supplie others in their defects, and that with good words and faire language, like as that old 2x effor did in Homer:

Of all the Greeks there is no man, Who blame thefe words or gainfay can: But yet for footh you fay not all, N or come are to the finiall. For why? you feeme but young by your vifage, And wellmy sonne you may be for your age.

Moreover, this were more civilly done, not to reprove and checke them openly nor in pub. 10 licke place, although it be without any great biting and nipping, which is enough to abate and cast downe the courage of yoong men; but rather apart and privatly, especially such as be well framed and disposed by nature to government of State another day; instructing and leading them gently into the right way, fetting before their cies some excellent sayings, examples and inventions tending to policie, and inciting them alwaies to good and honest enterprises, heartening and imboldning them by that meanes, that they may thew a lively and lightfome spirit, and even at the beginning, making the people cast a liking and love unto them, and be more gentle and tractable afterwards; like as it is the maner of those, who when they teach yong men to fit and ride an horse, bring them first one that is gentle and easie to be mounted upon; now if peradventure one of them at his first entrance do faile and catch a fall, he must not let him lie 20 along, and so breake the heart of a youth for ever, but lifthim up and set him on his feet againe. yea, and give him comfortable and gracious words. Thus did Ariftides in times past by Cimon, and Mnesiphilus by Themistocles, whom the people at the first could not abide and brooke, as having but a bad name in the citie for their audaciousnesse and loose life; and yet these good men flood their friends, brought them into credit, and mightily encouraged them. It is reported also even of Demosthenes himselfe, that the first time he came to the barre, he suffered adisgrace, and was rejected by the people, which he tooke to heart & was wondroufly difmaied, untill fuch time as an ancient and fatherly citizen, one who had fometime heard Pericles making orations to the people, tooke him by the hand & faid unto him: That he refembled Pericles for all the world in speech and gesture, and that he did himselfe great wrong upon such an occasion to to be faint-hearted and cast downe. Semblably, Euripides after the same maner imboldned Timotheus the Musician, who athis first comming upon the stage was hissed out by the people, as one that by his novelties which he brought up, feemed to violate and breake the lawes of Muficke; but he willed him to be of good cheere for all that, saying: It would not be long after, but he should be able to draw and leade the whole Theater after him as he would, and have the people at his devotion. To be briefe, like as the terme of time limited and appointed for the veltall virgins or nunnes votaries at Rome, was divided into three parts: The first, to learne that which perteined to their religion; the second, to practise; and the third, to teach the yonger. And likewise, as in the citie of Ephesus every one of those maidens vowed to the service of Diana, was at the beginning called Melliere, which is as much to fay, as a Novice to be a priestresse hereal-40 ter; then Hiere, that is to fay, a full priestresse in deed; and last of all, Pariere, which signifieth one that had power to imitate and professe others in the same orders; even so, he that is a perfect polititian and States-man, at the first is but a learner and a questionist (as it were) to doehis acts, and so to commence in that profession; but in the end, he teacheth others, he is a regent over novices, and the weth them the fecrets of policie. For to be a prefident and overfeer of others that trie mafteries or combats, is not to be a fencer or champion himselfe; but he that instituteth and traineth a yoong man to publike affaires and matters of State, framing and fitting him for his countrey another day, in fhewing him how is a good and profitable member of the common wealth, not in a small and base kinde offervice, but in a ministerie of great consequence; and to which especially and principally, Lycurwhaving given himselfe and aimed at, accustomed yong men even from their infancie to o bey and doe reverence to every elder, no leffe than to a ruler and law-giver. For in what regard cls, and to what other purpose said Lylander? That there was no place in the world, where it was fo honourable for to be old, as in Lacedamon. Was it because it was permitted and lawfull there for elder persons more than for any other, to till the ground, to put out money to usurie, to play

That aged men ought to governe the common-wealth. ardice, being fet together, and to keepe good fellowship, drinke merily as they are close at their game, and playing hard at hazzard? I suppose neither you nor any man els will so fay. But it was because all such, being after a fort in place of rulers, of fatherly governours and tutours over youth, have not a vigilant eie ouer the publicke affaires onely, but a particular regard alfo alwaies to every action of yong men, enquiring and learning not fleightly, and as it were paffing by their whole demeanour, namely, how they exercise their bodies in publicke place; how they play and disport themselves; what their diet is, and how they converse and live together, thewing themselves dread and terrible to those that do ill, but venerable and desireable to the good; for in trueth yoong folke alwaies observe & looke after them, and to fuch they make 10 court; for that ancient perfons do labour for to make them better, & augment the generofity of their mind, without all envie. For this paffion, as it befeetneth no time of mans age, howfoever in yong men it be entituled with a number of faire and honest names, to wit, emulation, zeale, and defire of honour; fo in olde men it is altogether unfeafonable, abfurd, tude, favage, unman-Iy and base. And therefore a man of yeeres, who is a polititian, must be very farre off from this humour of envie, and not like unto old runt trees or dodils, which repining as it were at others, doe manifelly hinder and take away the spring and growth of yoong poles and plants which conceup under them, or grow neere about them: but contrariwife, he ought to admit and receive them kindly, yea, and to offer himfelfe lovingly unto those that make toward him and be glad to fort and converte with him; fuch he ought to enforme, to direct, to dade and leade by 20 the hand, yea, and to cherith and nourish them, not onely with good instructions, fage counfels and wife admonitions, but also in yeelding unto them the place and meanes to exercise fome functions of government, whereby there may grow unto them fome honour and glorie, in preferring them to those charges and commissions which be not hurtfull to the State, but pleafing and acceptable to the common people. As for others, which at the first entrie be untoward and shew some resistance, be difficult, dangerous and hard to be atchieved (like unto fome medicines and potions which prefently doe gnaw and wring the bellie, or make the ftomackeficke) and whereof the honour and profit enfueth long after; it is not good to put fuch into yong mens hands, nor to helpe them to such hard bargaines, ne yet to expose them raw as they be and unacquainted, to the mutinous exclamations and obloquies of the rude multitude, 30 which is hard to be pleased 3 but rather he himselse is to undergoe the displeasure and ill-will of the people for the weale publicke; for this will cause the yoonger fort to be more affectionate unto him, and better willing a great deale to enterprife all other fervices. But over and besides all that hath beene delivered already, this would be well remembred, that to administer and governe the common-wealth, lieth not onely in bearing an office, or going in ambaffage, or in crying with a loud voice to an affembly, or in the pulpit or tribunall for publicke orations, to fare as if he were mad and out of his wits, in vehement preaching to the multitude, or in penning a number of decrees, acts and edicts, wherein the common fort suppose that all policie and government doth confift, like as they imagine also; that to be a Philosopher, is nothing els, but to discourse and dispute in the schooles at certeine times of philosophicall points alost 40 in a chaire, and reade lecture at their houres out of their books, and in the meane while be ignorant of that civill administration and philosophie which is continually seene in works and daily actions. For this were all one, according to Dicearchus, as if one should say, that they only walked, who fetched many turnes up and downe in galleries, and not they, who went into the countrey on foot, or visited their friends. But wee must thinke, that to governe a commonwealth, is very like unto the profession of Philosophy: for Socrates was not to be thought a Philosopher onely, when he caused stooles and formes for to be made readie to fit upon, against a conference, or when he fat him downe himselse in a chaire, or when he observed precisely the houres of lecture, of disputation, or of walking in the schooles, which were appointed for his disciples and familiar followers; but also otherwhiles, when he was at his game and play, as it fell 50 out, when he dranke and eat, when he was in warfare or in the campe with some, bargaining, buying and felling with others; and finally, when he was in prison, and even then, when as he drunke that cup of hemlocke for his poison; having raught and prooved plainly before, that mans life at all times, in all parts, in every occasion and accident, and generally in all affaires admitteth the use of Philosophie. And even so, we are to make account of civill government; namely, to thinke that fooles or lend persons doe not administer the common weale, either when they be Generals of armies, or L L. Chancellors, or when they feeme to leade the people

flatter and infinuate into their favour, or declare for oftentation, or els execute fome charge and office, and do that which they do compelled by force. Whereas contrariwife, a good and true politician in deed, who affecteth his citizens, loveth his countrey, hath a care and heedfull regard of the weale publicke, although he never be clad in his rich coat of armes, nor have the roiall mantle of estate upon him, yet he is daily and hourely emploied in the administration of publicke affaires, inciting and exhorting to action those that are sufficient, instructing such as be unskilfull and wanting, affifting as many as come to him for counfell, reclaiming them who are ill given and about to practife mischiefe, confirming and encouraging those who be well minded, and shewing evidently in effect, and not for forme and fashion, that he is amused and wholly bent upon the good of the State: not because there is to grow thereby any interest to him or his, or in regard that he is called by name to go first into the Theater, or to be the principall and first man in the assemblie of counsell, or otherwise by way of recreation, as if he came thither to fee plaies & games, or to heare fome pleafant musicke when he is there; but contrariwife, when he cannot be prefent personally, yet to be there in spirit and advice; and after he hath intelligence of the proceedings there, to approve fome things well done, and to shew himfelfe difficated in other things. For neither Ariffides the Athenian, nor Cato the Romane, were in place many times of chiefe government, yet they ceafed not for all that, during their whole life, to be in action for the good and fervice of their countries. And Epaminondas atchieved (I mult needs fay) many noble acts and valiant exploits, whiles he was captaine generall for Bago. tin; howbeit, one act there is reported of his, when he was neither generall nor in any office at 20 all, which he exploited in Theffalie, not inferiour to any one of his other worthy deeds: for at what time as the captaines of Thebes had engaged a batailon or regiment fo farre into a difficult place and a ground of much difadvantage, whereby the enemies charged fore upon them fo violently, that they were in great affright, and ready to be defaited, he being in the forefrontamong the footmen heavily armed, was called backe, and at his first comming appealed all the trouble & affright of the army, and put them in affired hope with his very prefence: afterwards he fet in order and arranged in battel-ray, that fquadron which had broken their ranks and were in confusion, delivered them easily out of this streight and difficult passage, and made head againe upon the enemies, who hereupon were fo daunted, that they changed their minds andretired. Also when Agis the king of the Lacedæmonians led his armie in ordinance of battell 10 ready to fight with his enemies in Areadia, there was one ancient Spartane cried aloud unto him, and faid: My lord, you thinke to remedie one mischiese by another: (giving him thereby to understand, that his meaning was by this present and unseasonable forwardnesse of his, in giving battell unto the enemie, for to falve and cure (as it were) his former speedy retreat and departure from the flege before the citie Argos, according as Thueydides reporteth in his storie) which when Azis heard, he gave credit unto the man, retired presently, but afterwards he had the victorie. This Agis caused his chaire of estate to be set every day before his palace gate, and many times the Ephori would rife from their Confiftorie, and repaire unto him thither, forto aske his advice, and confult with him about the affaires of greatest importance; for he feemed to be a man of great reach, and is tenowined in the histories for a most wife and sage prince. 40 And therefore upon a time, after that the strength of his bodie was utterly decayed, in such sort as for the most part of the day he kept his bed and stirred not forth; when the Ephori sent unto him and requested that he would give them meeting in the common hall of the citie, he arose out of his bed, and strained himselfe to walke thither; but when he was gone a pretie way with much paine and difficultie, he chanced to meet with certeine little boies in the street, and demanded of them, whether they knew any thing more powerfull than the necessitie to obey their master; and when they answered No, he made this account, that his impotencie ought to be the end and limit of his obeifance, and fo returned backe immediatly to his owne house. For furely, ones good will ought not to shrinke before his power; but when might faileth, the good will would not be forced further. Certes, it is reported that Seipio both in war abroad & also in 50 civill affaires at home, used the counfell of Cains Lalizs, infomuch as some there were, who gave out and faid, that of all those noble exploits Scipto was the actour, but Letius the authour. And Cicero himselfe consessent, that in the bravest & most honourable counsels which he exploited during his confulthip, by the meanes whereof he faved his countrey, he confulted with Publim Nigidius the Philosopher. So that we may conclude, that in many kindes of government and publicke functions, there is nothing that impeacheth and hindereth oldemen, but that they may well enough them their fervice to the common-wealth, if not in the best simply, yet in good words, fage counfell, libertie and authoritie of franke speech and carefull regard, according as the Poets fay : for they be not our feet, nor out hands, nor yet our whole bodie and the ftrength thereof, which are the members and goods onely of the common-weale; but first and principally, the foule and the beauties thereof to wit, justice, temperance and prudence; which if they come flowly and late to their perfection, it were abfurd and to no purpose, that men should enjoy house, land and all other goods and heritages, and should not themselves procure fome profit and commoditie to their common countrey, by reason of their long time which bereaveth them not formuch of strength able for to execute outward ministeries, as it addeth fufficiencie of those faculties which are requisit for rule and command. Loe, what the reason 10 was that they portraied those Hermes, that is to say, the statues of Mercurie, in yeares, without either hands or feet; howbeit, having their naturall parts plumpe and fiffe; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that we have least need of olde mens labour and corporall travell, so that their words be active, and their speeches full of seed and fruitfull, as it is meet and conve-

F speech be the signe and lively picture of the minde, as it is indeed, a man may judge by these Apophthegmes or notable Sayings, and collected heere together, how excellent In feats of armes, in politike government, or otherwise particularly these personages were, who are heere represented unto us; like as some speciall acts enterlaced among their layings doe also kew. Two forts of people there be who abuse the fruit that good menmight draw out of the consideration & reading of these discourses. The one be certeine glorious persons, who upon a vaine desire of outward shew, and to be seene, and for no other intent, following Aclops crow, trim themselves with the plumes and feathers of others: these have gotten together a heape and store-house as it were of wife sayings from auncients in old time, whereby they might be 40 conspicuous, and seeme to be of some valour and reputation among those who have not wit enough to feeinto them, and know what they are. The other are hypocrites, who having a loth some slinks and bitter gall in the heart, pretend sweetnesse and home at the end of their toong, and all to seduce their neighbours, or rather to deceive their owne selves, for that they have never any regard of their omne dutie.

But beere in this discourse there is to be seene nothing affected, nothing borrowed from others, nor farre fet, but there is represented unso us a certeine open, simple & admirable nature in this diversitie of grave pleasant of learned speeches wherein sweetnesse is mingled with profit, for to fit all persons, and to be aptly applied unto their maners and behaviour, of what calling and degree soever they be in the world. Item, heerein are represented acts proceeding from great wit, despereach, and high con-30 ceit, of valour, of equitie, modestie, good disposition, and singular carriage in the whole course and management of mans life: the which are proposed and manifested unto us to this end, that the wisedome and bountie of the almightie might somuch the better appeare, in that he hath vouch safed such ornaments to publike States, for temamraine and uphold mans life amid those confusions which were brought into the world by occasion of sm. Moreover, this fir st collection may well be devided into five principall parts, whereof. The first conteineth the norable fayings & deeds of the kings of Perfia, and other strange nations. The second of the governors and potentates of Sicilic. The third of the Macodonian kings, and namely of Alexander the great and his successors. himselfe wounded in fight, he seized upon his enemies body, & brought him perforce armed as he was alive, out of his galley into his owne. Being encamped in the land of his friends and confederates, yet nevertheleffe he fortified his campe with a deepe trench and high rampar round about verie carefully; and when one faid unto him, what needs all this? and whom are wee to feare? The woorlt speech (quoth he) that can come out of a captaines mouth is this; Had I wish or I never looked for fuch a thing. As he was putting his armie in array, for to give battell unto the Barbarians; he faid that he feared nothing at all, but that they should not take knowledge of Iphierates, whole veriename and presence was enough to affright all their enemies. Being accufed of a capitall crime, he faid unto the Sycophant who had enformed and drawen a bill of enditement against him: Canst thou tell what thou doest good fellow? when the citie is envi-10 roned with warre on everie fide, thou perfwadeft the people to confult about me, and not to take counfell with me. Harmodius (who was descended from the race of that ancient and noble Harmedius) reproched him one day for his meane parentage, as being come from an house of base degree: The nobleneffe (quoth he) of my line beginneth in me, but thine endeth in thee. An oratour making a folemne speech in the affembly of the people, grew to these tearmes with him before them all: And what are you fir, if we may be fo bold as to know, that you beare your felfe to bigge, and thinke fo well of your felfe, are you a man at armes, are you an archer, a pike man. or a footman or what are you? I am not indeed (quoth he) any of these; but he I am, who knowes how to command and direct all thefe?

TIMOTHEUS had the name to be a fortunate captaine, rather than otherwise a speciall warriour; and some who envied his good estate, shewed him a picture, wherein certaine cities were entrapped, and of then selves fallen into the compasse of net and toile, whiles hee lay afleepe; whereupon he faid unto them: Confider now, if I can catch and take fuch cities lying afleepe, what fhall I be able to doe when I am awake? When one of these venturous and too forward captaines, thewed upon a glorious braverie unto the Athenians, what a wound • It is no com he had received upon his bodie: But I (quoth he) my felfe was a greatly abashed and ashamed mendable part one day, being your captaine generall before the citie of Samos, that a thot discharged from the us a captaine walles, light but neere unto me. When the oratours highly praifed and recommended captaine telie withilly Chares, flaying: Lo what a brave man is here to make the generall of the Athenians, shewing his goodly perforage. Timothem answered agains with a loud voice: Never fay Generall, butra- 30

> CHABRIAS was woont to fay, that they were the best captaines who had most intelligences of their enemies defleignes & proceedings. Being accused together with Iphierates of treafon, he gave not over for all that, to frequent the publicke place of exercises, and to take his dinner at his accustomed howers: and when Iphicrates rebuked him for being so rechlesse, standing in such danger as he did; hee answered him in this manner: In case the Athenians proceede against us otherwise than well, they shall put you to death, all soule and fasting, but me full and faire cleane washed, anointed, and having well dined. This was his ordinarie speech: That an armie of flags and hindes having a lion for their leader, was better than an armie of lions led by

HEGESIPPUS furnamed Crobylus, folicited and incited the Athenians to take armes against King Philip: and when one spake unto him alowd from out of the affembly: What Sir, "Love of he will you that we draw upon us war: Yea verily (quoth he) and bring in bamong us blackemoutrendombre e.; ming roabes, folemne and publicke obsequies, yea and funerall orations too, if we defire to live examinet for free still, and not to be servile and subject to the Athenians.

PYTHEAS being but yet verie yoong, presented himselfe one day in open place to crosse and contradict the publike decrees which had paffed by the peoples voices, in the honour of King Alexander; what faith one unto him: Date you prefume, to young as you are to fpeake of thele to weightie matters? And why not (quoth he) feeing that Alexander whom you will needs make a god by your fuffrages, is yoonger than my felfe?

Pho Cion the Athenian was a man of to stated and constant behaviour, that he was never seene of any person, either to laugh or weepe. Upon a time in a great assembly of the citie, one faid unto him: You are verie fad and penfive Phocion, it feemeth you are in a deepe studie. Gueffe againe (quoth he) and gueffe not fo; for I am indeed fludying and deviling with my felfe how I may cut-off somewhat of that which I have to speake unto the Athenians. The Athenians underflood by an oracle that they had one man among them in the citie, who was thwart & contrary to the opinion & advice of all others : Now when they caused diligent search & enquirie to be made for this fellow, and cried out upon him in great furie who foever he was ; Photion flood up, and with a loud voice: I am the very man (quoth he) feeke no further; for I am he calone, who am nothing at al pleafed with whatfoever the people either doth or faith. One day, - Wife men when he had delivered his advice in a frequent affembly of the people, he pleafed the whole au and fooles when ne natural and feeing that they all with one accord approoved his fpeech, he was abathed together. thereat, and turning toward his friends: What? (quoth hee) have I let fall and escaped some words that are not good, and otherwise than I meant? The Athenians were minded upon a time to folemnize a great and festivall facrifice; and for the better furnishing of this folemnitic, they demanded of every man a contribution of money toward it: all others gave liberally, only Photo tion after he had bene called upon by name fundry times to do the like, in the end faid thus unto them: 4 I would be abashed to give any thing (I trow) unto you, and not be able to pay him 4 Povenie is there, pointing with his finger to an usurer, unto whom he was indebted. When Demades faid to thank to a unto him: The Athenians will one of these daies kill thee, if they fall once into their furious vertuous man, fits: True indeed (quoth he) they will kill me in their mad mood, but thee they will put to death when they be come againe into their right wits. Ariflogiton the fycophant or falle promotor, being condemned to death for troubling men with wrongfull imputations, and at the point to be executed within the prison, sent unto Phoeion, requesting him to come and speake with him; but Photons friends would not let him goe to talke with fuch a leaud and wicked wretch: Why (quoth heunto them) in what place may honest men more willingly and better speake with A-20 ristoguon? When the Athenians were highly offended and angrie with the Bizantines, for that they would not receive into their citie captaine Chares, whom they had fent with a power for to aid them against king Philip, Phoeion came among them, and faid: That they were not to be displeased with their confederates for being mistrustfull, but rather with such captaines as they mistrusted: upon which remonstrance of his, hee was immediatly himselfe chosen captaine; who being admitted and well trusted by the Bizantines, defended them so valiantly against king Philip, that he forced him to raise his stege, and retire from thence without effect. King Alexander the great fent unto him a prefent of one hundred talents; but he demanded of the messengers that brought it, why the king their master sent unto him alone, colidering there were fo many Athenians besides himselfe; they answered: It was because he esteemed him to be 30 the onely honest and vertuous man among them all: Why then (quoth he) could not hee let me both to feeme and also to be a good man still? Alexander upon a time demanded of the Athenians certeine gallies; whereupon the people called unto Phoeion by name, for to give his advice, and to counfell them what was best to be done in this case: then he stood up and said: My counfell unto you is this; That you make meanes either to be your felves the e stronger in In warre we armes, or els at the leaft-wife friended by them who are mightier than you. When a britte was mult lay to be blazed abroad, without any certeine authour, that king Alexander the Greatwas deceased, the freeded by oratours at Athens mounted the pulpits by and by, and strave avie who could perswade the sheshongest people most, even in all hasteto put themselves in armes and rebell; but Phoeion was of a conhistenment. trarie minde to them all; and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, until more ters of great 40 affured newes came of his death: For (faith he) if he be dead to day, he will be fo to morow, yea confequence, and afterwards also. When Leofthenes had fet the citicall upon warre, feeding the peoples there is no hearts with great hopes of recovering their freedome and the fovereigntie of all Greece, Photi- loffe by delay, on compared these projects of theirs s unto the Cypres trees: For they (quoth hee) be faire, is dangerous, ftreight and tall, but not a whit of fruit do they beare: howbeit, when the Athenians at the first rations be like fped well in fundrie battels and wan the field, whereupon the citie made facrifices unto the gods to fraidelle for the good newes thereof, fome would come unto him, and fay: How now Phocion, are you trees, not pleafed heerewith? and would you with all undone againe? I am h contented very well h A wife man (quoth he) that it hath fo fallen out, but yet I repent never a whit of my former counsell. The wil not repeat Macedonians, immediatly after this, maderodes into the countrey of Artica, and beganne to of his good counfell, al-50 overun, harrie and spoile all the sea coasts for remedie whereof, he caused all the lustie men of though the st the citie, who were of age to beare armes, to enter into the field; and when many of them came the and event be not answered. running unto him, fome calling upon him to feize fuch an hill, others as instant with him to rable thereto. put his men in battell-ray in such a place : O Hercules (quoth he) what a number of captaines doe I see, and how few good souldiers? howbeit, he gave the enemies battell, wan the victorie, and flew 2 icion the captaine generall of the Macedonians in the place. Not long after, the A thenians being vanquished in warre, were constrained to receive a garrison from Antipater, and Menillus captaine of the faid garrison sent unto him in free gift certeine money; wherewith he

When Antipater was in hand with they & thavery him to do a thing which was not just : You cannot (quoth he) ô Antipater, have me to be your well regether, friend and a flatterer to. After the death of Antipater, when the Athenians had recovered their well regether, friend and a flatterer to. libertie and free state or popular government, concluded it was and pronounced in a generall affembly and councell of the people, that Phoeion together with his friends and affociats, must Photion marched gravely, and gave not a word: now as he was going upon the way, one of his enemies met him and spet upon his face; whereupon he turned backe to the magistrates, and faid: Is there no man here to represse the insolencie and villanie of this wretched varlet? one of them who were to fuffer with him, tooke on and tormented himselfe exceedingly: What Lisanho- (quoth he to him) o Europus, k doth it not thee good that thou goest to take thy death with Phocion? And when the deadly cup was presented to him to drinke his last draught of hemlocke, he was asked the queition, whether he had any more to fay or no: then addressing his speech unto his fonne: I charge thee (quoth he) and befeech thee, not to cary any ranckor and malice in the PISISTRATUS, a tyrant of the Athaniens, being advertised that some of his friends has to ving revolted and conspired against him, had seised upon the fort called Phyle, went towards them, carying himfelfe about at his backe a fardell of his bedding, and the furniture thereto belonging : whereupon they demaunded of him what he would ? I come (quoth he) with an intent either to perswade you to returne with me, or esse with a resolution to tarrie heere with you my felfe; and therefore have I brought my baggage with me. He was advertised that his mother loved a yoong man, who fecretly kept her and used to lie withher; howbeit in great feare, and refuling her company many times; whereupon he invited the man to supper, and after supper, he asked him how he did, and how he liked his enterteinment ? Gaily well (quoth he: Thou shalt (quoth Pisistratus) finde no woorse every day so thou content and please my mother. Thrasfibulus cast a good liking and fancie to his daughter; and as he met her on a 20 time upon the way, bestowed a kiffe upon her; whereat her mother was offended, fo as she exasperated her husband against him for it: but he mildely answered her in this wife: Why woman, if we fet our felves against them that love us and grow to malice them, what shall we doe to those who hate us? and so he gave the maiden in mariage to Thrasibulus. Certeine luste yoonkers after they had taken their cups well, went in a maske and plaid the fooles through the citie, and chauncing to meete with his wife, abused her both in worde and deed very unseemely and dishonestly; but the morrow after they came weeping before Pisistratus, acknowledging their fault, and craving pardon; who made them this answer: As for you, endevour to be more A wife man wife and fober from hence foorth: " but I affure you, my wife yesterday went no whither abroad, nor flirred out of her dores. LYCHRGUS, who did fet downe and establishe the lawes of the Lacedæmonians, accustomed his citizens to weare their hairelong: For that (faith he) fide haire, maketh those who are faire, seeme more faire and amiable; but those who were foule more hideous and terrible. In 50 the reformation of the Lacedæmonian State, some one there was who perswaded him to etect the popular government called Democraty, wherein everie one in his course hath as much authoritic as another: unto whom hee answered: Begin thou first to set up this government in thine owne house. He ordeined that in building of houses there should be used nothing but the fawe & the axe: For that (quoth lie) it were a shame to bring into houses so simplie builded, any plate of filver and gold, rich hangings, carpets and furniture of beds, or costly and fumptuous tables. Likewise he debarred them from encountring often with their very enemies; for feare they should make them more warlike and better foldiers: Whereupon afterwards when king into defilates was brought out of the battell very greevoully wounded; one antalcidas faid unto him: You have met with a faire reward at the Thebans hand, and no leffe than you well deferve, for schooling and teaching them to fight whether they will or no.

CHARILLUS the king, being asked the question why Lycurgus made so few lawes? anfwered thus: That they who used few words, had no need of many lawes. One of those flaves to whom they call Elotes, had behaved himfelfe formewhat too infolently and knavithly against him: Now I sweare by the two twins (quoth he) Castor and Pollux, were I not angrie, I would doe thee to death out of hand, unto one who demaunded the reason why the Lacedemonians warelong haire: It is (quoth he) because of all trimming and ornaments of the bodie, it costeth leaft.

TELECHUS king of Lacedamon answered unto a brother of his, who complained unto him of the citizens of Sparta, faying: They use me more uncivilly and uncurreoutly, than they doe you: It is for nothing elfe (quoth he) but because you know not how to endure and put up

THEOPOMPUS, being in a certaine citie, was shewed by one of the inhabitants the wals, 20 and demanded whether he thought them not to be faire and high: Faire, (quoth he?) no in verie truth, kept though they be by none but women.

ARCHIDAMUS during the time of the Peloponnelian warre, when as the allies and confederates of Lacedamon requested him to set them downe a certeine taxe and rate which they were to contribute toward the charges thereof answered them in this manner: Warre knoweth not how to be gaged and feed within the teddar.

Brasidas chaunced to finde a mouse among certeine dried figs, which bit him so, as he was glad to let her goe; and thereupon faid to those about him: See, how there is nothing so little, but it is able to make shift and fave the owne life, if it have but the heart to defend it selfe against those who affaile it. In a certaine skirmish his hap was to be hurt with the head of a par-

30 tilane, or javelin, which went through his shield; and when he had drawne it out of his wound, with the very staffe and steile of it, he slew his enemie: now when one asked him how it came to paffe that he was thus wounded? For footh because my shield deceived and betraied me. His fortune was afterwards to die in the countrey of Thrace, whither be had beene fent to deliver and fet free the Greeks who inhabited those marches: and the embassadours who were sent from the faid parts to Lacedamon, went to visit his mother: who at the first asked them whether Brasidas her sonne did valiantly and like a man? the embassadors highly praised him, infomuch as they faid; That there would never be his like againe: Oh, you are mightily deceived (quoth fhe:) true it is that Brasidae was a brave and valiant man, but Lacedamon hath many farie better men than he by farre.

40 King Agrs was wont to fay, that the Lacedamonians used not to aske how many their enemies were, but in what place they were. At Mantua he was forbidden to strike a battell, because the enemies were many in number to one: It must needs be (quoth he) that who soever would rule and commaund many, should likewife fight with many. Unto them who greatly commended the Eliens for observing such good order and formality at the Olympick games: What great maruell is it (quoth he) if the Eliens in foure yeeres space use justice one day? but when they continued still in their praise and commendations: What woonder is it (quoth he) if the Eliens use a good thing well, to wit justice. A naughtie fellow there was and a troublesome, who importuned him exceeding much, by asking him oftentimes, who was the best man of all the Spartans? Mary even he (quoth he) that is most unlike to thee. To another who questioned 50 with him and would needs know how many the Lacedæmonians were in number: Enough (quoth he) to drive out all leud and wicked persons: And when another asked him the same question, he answered: Thou wouldest fay they were a great number if thou sawest them fight. LYSANDER would not accept of the rich and fumptuous roabes, which Dionyfus the Tyrant sent unto his daughters, saying: I am affraid that these garments will make them looke the fouler. Some there were who reprooved and blamed him, for that he exploited the most part of his acts by craft and subtilitie, as if it were an unwoorthie thing for one who vaunted himselfe to be of the race of Hercules: unto whom he answered: That where the lions skin would not ferve, it were good to fow thereto a little piece of a foxes case. There was some difference and debate betweene the Argives and Lacedæmonians about their confines; and it seemed that the Argives alleaged better reasons, and brought foorth more pregnant evidences for the land in question; but he drawing out his sword: They (quoth he) who are the better men at handling this, are those who plead the better for the bonds of their territorie. The Lacedamonians found much difficultie in affaulting the walles of Corinth; and when he fawe them draw backe and go unwillingly about that fervice, he chanced to espie at the very same time an hateto start from within the trench and towne ditch; whereupon he tooke occasion thus to fay: why make you doubt to give the affault unto the walles of those men, who are so idle as to suffer hares to to fleepe within the verie precinct of their walles? There was a certaine Megarian, who in the ge-"Brave words nerall affembly of all the Sates of Greece, spake unto him his minde freely and boldly; unto without meanes to ef- whom he answered thus: Thy a words have need of a citie, that is to fay, that Megara, whereof he was a citizen, was not able to make good and maintaine his words.

A GESILAUS used to say: That the inhabitants of Asia, (to speake of free men) were but bad, & namely folong as they enjoyed libertie; marie they be passing good slaves (quoth he.) These Asians had a cultom to call the King of Persia the Great King: And why (quoth Agesilaus) is he a greater king than I, if he be not more just and temperat? Being demaunded his opinion as touching Fortitude & Justice, whether of them was the better vertue: We have no need or use (quoth he) of Fortitude if we were all just Being enforced to breake up his campe, and dislodge 20 one night in great hafte out of his enemies countrey, and feeing a boy whom hee loved well, weeping and all blubbered with teares, for that he was left behind, & could not follow by realin of weaknes: It is (quoth he) an hard matter to be pitifull and wife both at once. Menerales the phylician who would entitle himselfe with the name of Jupiter, wrote a letter unto him with this superscription; Mencerates Iupiter unto King Agesiland long life, &c. Unto whomhee returned this answere: King Age filaus unto Menecrates better health: meaning in deed that he was braine-ficke. The Lacedæmonians having defaited those of Athens with their allies and confederates neere unto the citie of Corinth: when he heard what a number of enemieslay dead in the field: O unhappie and unfortunate Greece (quoth he) that hath destroied so many men of her owne, as had beene able to have subdued all the Barbarians in the world. Having 30 received an answer from the oracle of Jupiter at Olympia, according to his minde; the great Lords controllers, called Ephori, willed him also to consult with the oracle of Apollo astouching the fame: when he was therefore at Delphos, he demaunded of the faid god, whether he were not of the fame minde as his father was? When he fued for the deliverance of a friend of · or Scarient. his who was taken prifoner, and in the hands of * Idrieus a prince of Carra, he wrote unto him about it in this manner: If Nicias have not trespassed, deliver him for justice sake; if he have transgressed, deliver him for my sake; but howsoever it be, in any wise deliver him. He wastequested one day to heare a man sing, who could maruellous lively and naturally counterfeit the voice of anightingale: I have heard (quoth he) the nightingale her felfe many a time. After the overthrow at the battell of Leuctres, the lawe ordained that as many as faved themselves 40 by their good footmanship, should be noted with infamy: but the Ephori fore-seeing, that in so doing the citie would be dispeopled and emptie, were willing to abrogat & disanul this ignominie, and for this purpose declared Agesilau for law-giver : who going into the market place, and mounting up into the pulpit, ordained that from the next morrow forward, the lawes should remaine in their ancient force and vertue. Sent he was upon a time to aide the King of AEgyt, where he together with the King was befreged by the enemies who were many more in number than they, & had begun to cast a great trech about their camp, & so beleaguered them that they could not escape: Now when the king commaunded him to make a fally upon them, and to keepe them battell: I will not (quoth he) empeach our enemies, but that they may (as I fee them go about it) willingly fight with us fo many to fo many : and finding that their trench 50 wanted but a little of both ends meeting and joining together; in that verie distance and space betweene, he fet his fouldiers in battell array, and fo comming to encounter on even hand he · Vertue im- defaited his enemies. When he died, he charged his friends to make no image nor statue of mortalizetha him: For if I have (quothhe) odone any thing in my life worthy of remembrance, that will be a fufficient monument and memoriall for me after my death: if not, all the statues and images battering peece which had beene newly brought out of Sieilie, cried out aloud: PO Hercules P The inventhe prowesse and valour of man I see well is now gone for ever. When Demades mocking at the Lacedamonian courtilasses, said merrily; That they were barrely valor. fo little and short, as that the juglers and plaiers at leger-demain, were able to swallow them downe whole as they be. A gas the yoonger answered verie fitly and faid : Yet as short as they be, the Lacedamonians can reach their enemies veriewell with them. The Euhori charged him upon a time to deliver up his fouldiers into the hands of a traitour: I will beware I trow (quoth he) to commit another mans fouldiers to him who betraied his owne. CLEOMENES when one promifed to give him certaine cocks of the game, so courageous, that they would with fighting die in the place and nevergive over: Give me not (quoth he) those that will die themselves, but such rather as in fight will make others to die.

PAEDARETVS miffing the place to be chosen one of the great councell confisting of three hundred, returned from the affembly very jocond merrie and finiling: I am well appaied (quoth he) that in the citie of Sparta there be found three hundred better men and more fufficient than my felfe.

DAMONIDAS being by the master of the Revels set in the last place of the dance: Well fare thy heart (quoth he) thou hast devised a good meanes to make this place honourable.

Nicos TRATUS captaine of the Argives, being follicited by Archidamus to take a good 20 round fumme of money for to deliver up unto him by treason, a place whereof he had the keeping, with a promise also, that he should espouse and wed what damosell he would himselse choose in all Sparta, excepting those of the blood-roiall, made him this answer: You are not (quoth he) of the race of Hercules; for that Hercules went thorow the world, punishing and putting to death in all places, malefactors and wicked persons: but you go about to make those naught and leaud who are good and honest.

*EYDAMONIDAS feeing in the great schoole Academie, Xenocrates an auncient man *Or Fudamiamong other yoong scholers, students in Philosophie, and understanding that he sought for dos rather, vertue: And when will he use vertue (quoth he) if he have not yet found it? Another time hearing a philosopher to mainteine this paradox: That a learned Sage was onely a good captaine: 30 Brave words (quoth he) and a marvelous position; but the best is, he that holdeth it, never in his life heard q the found of a trumpet in the campe.

ANTIO CHUS, one of those controllers in Sparta, named Ephori, being advertized that king meth not a Philiphad given unto the Messenians their territorie: But hath hee withall (quoth he) given of armes. them the meanes to vanquish in battell when they shall be put to it, for to defend the same?

Antalcidas aniwered unto an Athenian who termed the Lacedemonians ignorant persons: Indeed (quoth he) it may well be so, for wee are the onely men who have learned of you no evill. Another Athenian contested with him and faid; we have driven you manie a time from the river Cephifus, which is in Attica : but he replied againe and faid : And we never yet chased you from the river Eurotas which is necre Lacedemon. There was a certeine Rheto-40 rician would needs rehearfean oration which he had made concerning the praife of Hercules :

Why (quoth he) was there ever any man that blamed or despised him? · So long as EPAMINONDAS was captaine general of the Thebans, there was never feene in his campe any of these sudden soolish frights, without any certeine cause, which they call Panique Terrores. He was wont to fay, that no death was so honourable as to die in the warres: Also that a man of armes or warriour ought to keepe his bodie not exercised after the maner of champions, for to be faire and full; but rather hardned with travel, and made lanke as becommeth good foldiours. He loved therefore to fight with those enemies who were corpulent; and fuch foldiours as he found in his owne bands groffe & fat, he would be fure to caffier & displace them, if it were for nothing elfe: For he was wont to fay of them, that three or foure bucklers 50 would hardly cover their grand-panch, which bare out so bigge that they could not see for it their privy parts. Moreover, fo strict and precise he was in his living, and hated so much all exceffe & fuperfluity, that one time above the reft being bidde to fupper by one of his neighbors, when he fawin the house great provision of viands, cates, junquets, comfutures and sweet perfumes, he faid unto him: I had thought you made a facilitie, and not an expense of superfluitie, and so went his way & would not stay supper. When the head cooke or clerke of the kitchin gave up his account unto him and other his companions in government, of their ordinary charges for certeine dates; he milliked nothing in his bill but the great quantitie of oyle that was spent: and when his collegues wondered that he should fare so at that; he said unto them: That it was not the cost and expence that hee stood upon, but onely this, that so much oyle should goe down mens throats. The city of Thekes upon a time made a great publike feast, and belides, privately they were all in their bankets, inviting one another, and meeting in companies to make merrie together: he contrariwife all this while, without being either announced with oile and sweete perfumes, or clad in his best clothes, all pensive and fad, walked alone tho. row the citie; and when one of his familiar friends who met him, woondered thereat, and woulds needs know why he went to alone and out of order and formalitie: Mary (quoth he)that you all might in fecuritie follow your drinking and good cheere, and not bee troubled with thinking of any other cares. He had caused a meane man and of base condition to be put in 10 prison for some light trespasse that he had committed, and Pelopidas requested him for to set him at large, but he denied him flatly; howbeit afterwards a woman whom he loved, intreated him, and at her fute he granted his libertie, faying: That in fuch pettie favours and curtefies as these it became him to gratise concubines and harlots; but not generals and great warriours, When the Lacedemonians came with a puilfant power to make cruell war upon the Thebans, there were brought oracles unto the Thebans from fundric parts, fome promifing the victory, others menaling an overthrow: he went up therefore into the tribunal feat and commanded, that the oracles of victoric should be fet upon the right hand, and those of discomsiture on the left: when they were thus disposed and bestowed, he stood up, and in this wife spake unto the Thebans: If you will be directed by your captaines, fliew obedience unto them, and withall, put 20 on a refolution and good heart to encounter your enemies; these heere, (thewing the good oracles on the right hand) be yours; but if for want of courage you cast doubts and start backs for seare of perils, those there, (pointing to the bad oracles on the left hand) are for you. Asterwards as he led the armic into the field, for to meet with the Lacedemonians, it began to thunder; whereat they that were necreft unto him asked, what he thought this might prefage and fignifie: Surely (quoth he) it betokeneth thus much; That God hath aftonished our enemies, and put their braines out of temper, who having fuch commodious places neere unto them for to encampe in, have pitched here where they are. Of all the honorable and happie fortunes that ever befell unto him, he faid; This was most to his hearts joy and contentment; that he had defeited the Lacedemonians in the battell at Leuctres, whiles his owne father that begat him, and to mother who bare him were both alive. Being a man who otherwise all his lifetime used to be feene abroad, fine, neat, & wel anointed, with a cheeefull and metric countenance alfosthe morrow after the faid battell, he came foorth into the publicke place, all foule, fullied, heavy and penfive; whereupon, his friends by and by were in hand with him to know, whether any finither accident was come unto him: None (quoth he,) but I perceived yesterday that for the joy of my poy in prospe- victorie, my heart was lifted up more than it ought, and therefore to day I doe abate and cothe oughtto rece that which was the day before too excessive and out of order: knowing full well that the Spartans used to cover and hide as much as they could such misfortunes, and being desirous to make them fee and acknowledge the great loffe and overthrow which they had fuffeined, hee woulde not in any wife permit them to gather their dead all together, and pile them up in 40 one entire heape; but to every citie he gave leave one after another to enterre them; by which it appeared, that there were more of the Lacedemonians flaine by a thousand. Jason a prince and monatch of Theffalia, being allied and confederate with the Thebans, came one day into the citie of Tales, and fent unto Epaminondas a present of two thousand pieces of gold, knowing that indeed he was exceeding poore: this gold would not he receive at his hands; but the first time after that he saw Jason, he came unto him and said: You begun twife to offer me injurie; and in the meane while he borrowed of a certeine burgesse of the citie sistiedrams of filver, for to defray the charges of a journey or expedition which he entended; and therewith entred in armes and invaded Pelopone fus. After this, when the greatking of Persia sent him thirtie thousand pieces of gold called Dariques, hewas displeased highly with Diomedes, and 50 tharpely checked him, asking him if he had undertaken fo great a voiage, thinking to bribe and corrupt Epaminondas; and with that communaunded him to deliver this meffage backe unto the king his mafter; That fo farre foorth as he entended and procured good unto the Thebans, hee should make reckoning of him to be his friend without any pennie cost; but if he wrought or practifed any losse or displeasure unto them, he would be his enemie. When the Argives were entred into league and amitte with the Thebans, those of Athems sent their ambassadours into Areadie, to assay if they could draw the Areadians to side with them.

So thele ambaffadours began to charge and accuse unto them, aswell the Argives as the Thebans, infomuch, as Calliffratus the oratour, who was their speaker, upbraided both cities, and hit them in the teeth with Orestes and Oedipus : then Epaminondas who fat in this affembly of councell, rofe up and faid: We confesse indeed (my masters) that in times past there was in our cine one parricide who killed his owne father, like as another in Argos who murdered his owne mother; but when we had chaled and banished them for committing these facts, the Athenians received them both. And when the Spartans had charged the Thebans with many great and grievous imputations: Why my mafters of Sparta (quoth Epaminondas) these Thebans, if they have done nothing els, yet thus much they have effected, that you have forgotten your no maner of thort speech and using few words. The Athenians had contracted alliance and amitie with Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Theffalie, a mortall enemic of the Thebans, and who promiled to the Athenians for to ferve them flesh in the market at halfe an obolus a pound weight: And wee (quoth Epaminondas) will furnish the Athenians with wood enough for nothing, to roalt and feethe the faid fleth; for if they begin bufily to intermeddle more than we like of, we will fell and cut downe all the trees growing in that countrey. Knowing well enough that the Bosotians were loft for idlenefic, he determined and advised to keepe them continually in exercife of armes: now when the time approched for the election of governors, and that they were minded to chuse him their Baotarches, that is to fay, the ruler of Baotia: Be well advised my mallers (quoth he) what ye do, whiles it lieth in your hands; for if you elect me your captaine 20 generall, make this reckoning, that to warre you shall. He was wont to call the countrey of Baoria, because it lieth plaine and open, the stage and scaffold of warre, faying that it was impossible for the inhabitants to keepe and hold it, to long as they had not one hand within their thield and the other on their fword. Chabrias the captaine of the Athenians having put to foile and defaited some few Thebans about Corinth (who for heat of fight had run disbanded and out of aray) made a bravado: for which exploit, as if he had won fome great field, he caused a tropheæ to be erected in memoriall of this victoric: whereas Epaminondas fcoffed and faid: That hee should not have fet up a tropheum there, but rather an hecatefium, that is to fay, the statue of Proferpina, for that in times path, it was an ordinary thing to fet up the image of Preferpina in maner of acroffe, at the first carrefour or meeting of croffe waies which was found nere unto the gate 30 of acity. When one brought him word that the Athenians had fent an armie into Pelopone fur bravely fet out and appointed with new armour: Now furely (quoth he) Antigenidas wil weepe and figh when he knoweth once that Tellis hath gotten him new flutes and pipes to play upon: now this Tellis was a bad minstrell, and Antigenidas an excellent musician. He perceived upon a time that his esquire or shield-bearer had received a good piece of money for the ransome of aprisoner, which was in his hands; whereupon he said unto him: Give me my shield, but goe thouthy waies and buy thee a taverne or victualling house, wherein thou maiest leade the rest of thy life, for I fee well, that thou wilt no more expose thy selfe to the dangers of warre as before time, fince thou art now become one of these rich and happie men of the world. He was once demanded the question, whom he reputed to be the best captaine, himselfe, Chabrias, or 40 Interaces, his answere was: It is hard to judge, so long as we all be alive. At his returne out of the end of the country of Laconia, hee was judicially accused for a capitall crime, together with other country captaines joined in commission with him, for holding their charge longer by foure moneths than the lawes allowed: as for his companions and collegues above faid, hee willed them to derive all the fault from themselves, and lay it upon him, as if he had forced them so to doe; but in his owne defence he pleaded thus : * Albeit I can not deliver better words than I have per- A good coformed deeds, yet if I be compelled (as I fee I am) to fay fomewhat for my felfe before the jud. feeding all the formed to fairness the formed to feed ges, I request thus much at their handes, that if they be determined to put me to death, they would com and to been graven upon the fquare columne or pillar of my fepulchre, my condenation and the cause therof, to the end that all the Greekes might know how Epaminondass was 50 condemned to die; for that hee had forced the Thebans against their willes to waste and burne the countrey of Leconia, which in five hundred yeeres before had never bene forraied nor spoiled; also that hee had repeopled the citie of Meffene two hundred and thirtie yeeres after it had bene destroied and left desert by the Lacedemonians : Item, that he had reunited, concorporated and brought into one league all the States and cities of Arcadic; and last of all, that he had recovered and restored unto the Greeks their libertie: for all these acts have bene atchieved by us in this voiage: the judges when they heard this speech of his, rose from the bench, and went out of the court laughing heartily; neither would they so much as receive the voices or verdists to be given up against him. After the last battell that ever he fought, wherin he was wounded to death; being brought into his tent, he called first for Diophantis, and after him for Joli. das, but when he heard that they were both flaine, hee advised the Thebans to compound and grow to an agreement with their enemies, as if they had not one captaine more that knew how * They that ar, nor able to leade them to the warres; and in trueth, the event did verifie his words, and bare witneffe with to mainteine warre mult him that he knew his citizens best of any man.

PELOPIDAS joint captaine with Epaminondas in the charge of Baotia, when his friends found fault with his neglect in one thing right necessary, to wit, the gathering of a masse of money together: Money indeed (quoth he) is necessary, but for such an one as this 2 icomedes here, thewing a poore cripple, maimed, lame and impotent in hand and foot. When he departed from Thebes upon a time to a battell, his wife praied him to have a regard unto his owne 10 fafetie: This is (quoth he) an advertisement fit for others; as for a captaine who hath the place of command, he is to be put in minde for to fave those under his charge, and not himselfe. To one of his fouldiers, who faid unto him: We are fallen among our enemies: And why (quoth he) are we fallen among them more than they among us. Moreover, being trecheroufly held prifoner, and kept in yrons during a truce, against the law of armes, by Alexander tyrant of the Phe. reans, he grew to heat and gave him fome hard words, calling him perjured traitour: whereupon the tyrant asked him if he made fo great hafte to die: Yea (quoth hee) to the end that the Thebans may be more provoked against thee, and that so much the sooner thou maiest be punished for thy diflocaltie. Thebe the tyrants wife came to vifit him in prifon, and feeing him, faid to that thee marvelled how hee could be fo jocund, being as hee was, a prifoner and bound with chaines: Yea, but I rather woonder at you, that being as you are, at libertie and not bound, you can endure such a wicked wretch as Alexander. When Epaminondas had delivered himour of prison, he said that he tooke himselfe much beholden to Alexander: For now (quoth hee) by his meanes I have made a triall of my felfe and my resolution, more than ever before, and namely, how my heart is fetled not against the feare of warre onely but also of death.

MANIUS CURIUS, when one of his fouldiers complained, that of the lands conquered from the enemies, he had given to every fouldier very little, but had incorporated in the common weale the greatest part of the faid demeanes: I would it were Gods will (quoth he) that there were not a Romane who thought that land but little, which is fufficient to nourish and 30 mainteine one man. The Samnites, after that hee had vanquished them in a battell, sentunto him as a prefent, a good fumme of gold:him they found fitting by the fire fide, tending the pot, wherein he boiled certaine rape-roots; and when the Samnite embaffadors tendered unto him the faid prefent, he made them this answer: That hee who could content himselfe with such a supper, had no need at all of gold: also that he thought it more honorable to commaund them who had the gold, than to have gold himfelfe.

C. FABRICIUS hearing of the overthrow that King Pyrrhus had given the Romaines, * Some reade *faud: That Pyrrhus had overcome Lavinus & not the Epirotes vanquished the Romaines, Bethus: faid un- ing sent unto Pyrrhus to treat for the deliverance of certaine Romaines taken prisoners; the king offered him a great fumme of gold, but he would not receive it: the next morrow Pyr-40 and not the rhus commanded that the greatest Elephant which he had, should be brought and set just behind Fabricius without his knowledge, and that fuddenly he should be forced to bray, which was done accordingly: whereat Fabricius turning him about, and looking behind him, began to smile and say: Neither thy gold yesterday, nor this beast thy Elephant to day, hath once aftonied me. Pyrrhus thought to have perswaded him to take his part and to stay with him, with promife that he thould have all the authoritie in managing of the affaires next unto himfelfe; but he answered him in this fort: This would not be good and expedient for you: and why? when the Epirotes shall know us both well, they will rather have me than you to be their king. When Fabricius was created Confull of Rome, King Pyrrhus his phylician wrote unto him a letter, wherein he made promife unto him for to kill the king his mafter with poylonit 50 he would. Fabricius fent the verie fame letter incontinently unto King Pyrrhus, willing him to feeby that, how his judgement served not him well to discerne and to make choise of his enemies and his friends. When this ambush was discovered and directed thus unto Pyrrhus, which was laid for his life, he caused the faid physician to be apprehended, and sent backe those Romaines whom he had prisoners, unto Fabricius without any ransom paid: howbeit Fabricins would not receive them from him as in free gift; for he returned likewife as many of his men who remained prisoners with him: which he did, for that he would not be thought to take any thing at his hands by way of a reward or recompense for disclosing the foresaid treafon: for hee did it not fo much to gratifie King Pyrrhu and do him a pleasure, as for searce it should be thought that the Romaines practifed his death by treacherie, whom they could not vanquish by vertue.

FABIUS MAXIMUS not willing to fight a fet battell with Annibal, but by tract of time to spend his armie; which by that meanes grew to a great default of victuals and money: went alwaies as though he dogged and followed him, keeping the rough places and hilly grounds, coasting him otherwhiles, but evermore having him in his cie: for which manner of fervice many mocked him and called him the Pædagogue of Annibal: but he nothing at all 10 regarding fuch words, perfifted fill continually in his defeignes & counfels particular to himfelfe, faying thus to his friends: That he who could not abide a fcotfe, but feared frumps and reviling words, was a greater coward than he who fled before his enemie. When his collegue or brother in office Minutin, had discomfitted certaine of his enemies, in such fort, as there was no talke of him any more, but every man gave out of Minutius, that he indeed was a man woorthy of Rome: he faid: That he feared more the prosperitie than the advertitie of Minutius: and within a while after, when Minutius was fallen into the danger of an ambush that Annibal had fet for him, so as he and all his men had like to have left their bodies dead behinde them, Fabius came speedily to his rescue, and not onely delivered him out of this perill, but also slew a number of his enemies, whereupon Anniball faid then unto his familiars about him: Did not I fore-20 tell you many times, feeing as I did this cloud louring upon the tops of the mountaines, how it would one time or other powre downe a good showre upon our heads ? After the overthrow at Canna, when he was chosen confull of Rome together with Claudius Marcellus a valiant and couragious man, who defired nothing more than ever to be fighting with Anniball; he was of a contrary minde, and hoped, that if he were not fought with, his army within a while by delaies onely and holding off, would of it felfe come to nothing; so as Anniball would oftentimes say: That he feared more Fabius that fought not, than he did Marcellus who was ever fighting. It was tolde him that he had in his campe a Lucane, who was wont to steale out by night, forth of the campe, for the love of a woman whom he used to with, but otherwise he heard say, that the man was a right good fouldier and woonderfull have in armes; whereupon he gave comman-30 dement that the woman upon whom this fouldier was fo enamoured, should be secretly and without the mans knowledge attached and brought unto him: now when the was come, he fent for the fouldier aforefaid: I am advertised (quoth he) that thou against the lawes of military difeipline, ufeft many times to lie out of the campe; and I understand likewise ful well, that setting that fault afide, thou art a fouldier good enough: well, in regard of thy good fervices, I am content to pardon all that is past, but from hencefoorth thou shalt abide and tarie with me, for I have a good pawne and furetic within that thou shalt not start; and with that he caused the woman to come forth and appeare, and fo he gave her into his hands to be his wedded wife. Anniball held all the citic of Tarentum with a strong garrison, faving onely the castle, but Marcellus by a wile and subtile stratageme, trained him as farre as he could from thence, and then return-40 ing with all expedition, was mafter of the whole towne, and facked it: in the execution of which fervice his feribe or chancellour asked him what should be done with the facted images of the gods among the rest of the pillage: Mary let us leave (quoth he) unto the Tarentines their gods, being thus angred as they are with them. When M. Livius, who had the keeping of the castle, vanted and boasted that by his meanes the citic was woonne, all the rest who heard him, laughed and mocked him; but Fabius answered: Thou faiest trueth indeed, for if thou hadst not lost it once, I had never recovered it againe. After he was stepped farre in yeeres, his sonne was chosen confull, and as he was giving audience in open place and dispatching certaine publike affaires in the presence of many, Fabino his father being mounted on horsebacke, came toward him; but the some sent one of his lictors or hushers before, to command him to alight 50 from his horse: whereat all the rest there present were abashed, and thought it a great shame and unfeemly fight; but the olde man difmounting quickely from his horse, came toward his fonne as fast as his yeeres would give him leave, imbraced him and said: Thou hast well done my sonne, to know whom thou doest governe, and to shew that thou art not ignorant what the greatnesse is of that charge which thou hast undertaken.

Scipio the elder, when soever he was at any leasure and repose either from military affaires or politike government, emploied all that time in his private study at his booke; whereupon he was woont to fay: That when he was alone, he had most companie; and when hee was at leaIomereade, Lainantown m Spaine,
